It is a well-known fact that on December 4, 1950, the Interstate Commerce Commission approved a compromise agreement between the rail carriers and the Post Office Department which amounted to $312,000,000 (ICC Docket No. 9200), covering the period February 19, 1947, through December 31, 1950. That huge sum of money must come from postal revenues which presently fall short of equaling postal expenditures by approximately $500,000,000 each year. We have been reliably informed that public hearings before the Interstate Commerce Commission have just been concluded and that additional rate increases will undoubtedly be granted covering the period subsequent to January 1, 1951. Additionally, the Nation's airlines have pending requests before the Civil Aeronautics Board which aggregate in excess of $2,250,000 for transporting United States mails by air. This item, too, if approved by the Civil Aeronautics Board, will be charged against the revenue of the Post Office Department and will greatly increase the alleged operating deficit.

Meanwhile, postal workers everywhere find themselves in an economic strait-jacket because of the fact that those in authority, particularly in the Post Office Department, have made no provisions for upward wage adjustments to meet the ever-expanding cost of living. This association firmly believes that both service restoration and pay adjustments must be given immediate consideration. Reports reaching this office almost daily clearly indicate that the personnel turn-over in the field postal service is higher than at any time in history. In Detroit, Mich., alone, 732 employees, or 12 percent of the total personnel, have left the postal service since July 1, 1950. This does not include 104 Detroit postal workers who have entered the military service. Similar conditions prevail in practically all parts of the country.

We implore you to give serious consideration to taking whatever action deemed necessary to provide a complete service restoration and an upward wage adjustment for letter carriers and other postal people. Favorable action on your part will be deeply appreciated.

With every good wish, we are,
Sincerely yours,

OUR PRESENT POSTAL SERVICE

(By James J. Doran)

NATIONAL ASSOCIATION OF LETTER CARRIERS,
January 18, 1951.

MR. JAMES J. DORAN,
Chevy Chase, Md.

DEAR MR. DORAN: You are undoubtedly familiar with the present postal curtailment program and the existing controversy resulting from the orders contained in the Postal Bulletin of April 18, 1950. As one who has spent a lifetime in the United States Postal Service, I am convinced beyond words that a statement from you would be of great importance at this particular time.

I am in a position to publish whatever statement you care to make in the monthly organ of this association, the Postal Record. It goes without saying that whatever your approach to the postal problem, this association will publish your views verbatim.

It is my firm conviction that you will be rendering a great public service by making known your views on the present-day postal system.

With kind regards, I remain,
Sincerely yours,

W. C. DOHERTY,
President.

CHEVY CHASE, MD., February 11, 1951.

WILLIAM C. DOHERTY,
President, National Association of Letter Carriers, Washington, D. C.

DEAR MR. DOHERTY: I have given a great deal of consideration to your letter of January 18, 1951, in which you invite me to make a statement on our present-day postal service to be published in your official organ, the Postal Record. I note that you have agreed that anything I might offer in the way of an article will be published verbatim.

I have decided to accept your offer and I do so in the hope that some part of the article which I will submit may in a small measure lead to a settlement of the present-day postal controversy. Some of my friends will perhaps think that it was unwise on my part to become involved in this controversy, but to those who would form such an opinion, I call their attention to the possibility that any dispute, disagreement, or controversy stands a better chance of being adjusted and settled equitably if all of the truth is known and understood and not just a part of the truth. I believe that I have in my possession and I am setting forth, in the article certain features of the rate situation and the postal curtailment matter that have not been given very much publicity in the past.

I thank you for your offer.

Sincerely yours,

JAMES J. DORAN.

Until shortly after World War II the average American, and in fact all Americans, took our Postal Service for granted. It was looked upon with confidence and faith in its honesty and efficiency. Its rank and file could, if they so desired, boast of a fidelity not easily equalled and never surpassed. If its laws were broken or violated its inspection service went into action and stayed at it until the law breakers were in custody and punished. It could match its performance with any of its fellows in the National Government and do so without apology or explanation.

It was generally credited with doing a fine job during the war and was praised highly for contributing a great deal to our fighting men's morale by its prompt and efficient handling of the military mail. It did all this in spite of the absence of thousands of its best employees who were in the war. After the war rising costs of operation brought on staggering deficits which aroused Congress and brought considerable criticism from a variety of sources. This made a strange and not easily understood picture—with a less experienced force during the war we were praised; with our experienced and efficient men and women back at work, we were being charged with waste and inefficiency.

There had to be a reason for this change and the reason was not hard to find. The Department wanted a raise in postal rates and the publishers and heavy mail users said, "No. It was not justified. Cut your costs. Put in up-to-date methods. Avoid your duplication. Dispose of useless records," and on and on. The deficit had grown steadily until in each of the fiscal years of 1949 and 1950 it exceeded $550,000,000. All concerned became postal deficit conscious.

The Department and other parts of the Federal Government had been investigated by the Hoover Commission. After the task force that spent the greater part of a year in its work on the Postal Service made its report a claim arose that a yearly savings of more than 200,000,000 was possible if up-to-date methods were used and modern mechanical equipment bought for the field service. This was just the kind of charge the opponents of the increased postal rate bill wanted and they used it to the best of their ability and capacity.

Just about the time it seemed nothing more could happen to or be said about the Postal Service that would add to its worries and troubles, the Post Office Department, yes the Department itself, decided otherwise. The Department reached the conclusion it had to curtail and eliminate Postal Service throughout the country.

Accordingly on April 18, 1950, there appeared in the Postal Bulletin one of the most drastic orders ever written by a Postmaster General. You are familiar with the order which has been properly labeled the curtailment order.

Now for the reasons for the order. The Postmaster General said Congress and the Bureau of Budget have reduced his requests for appropriation by such amounts as to compel a curtailment in postal service all over the Nation. He explained there was no other way in which to meet the situation and the order was placed in effect despite the opposition of Congress, the public, business and the labor unions of postal employees. There had been substantial reduction in the amounts asked by the Department by the House of Representatives, and the Postmaster General took the viewpoint the Department would not be allowed to proceed on a deficit spending basis. The Senate had not yet acted on the appropriation bill.

If I or any other person were to say the order was a mistake, that there were other means of reducing the over-all costs of operating the postal service, and failed to produce evidence to support and substantiate such a contention, you the reader would promptly and properly proceed to the conclusion my views and opinions were worthless. In place of setting my views and opinions on whether the order was a mistake, I am going to place before you facts, clear undisputed facts, all of which have been published by the Department at one time or another. All that is contained in this article is public property and a matter of public record. If perchance some of these public documents conflict with or contradict the efforts and representations of the Department in its fight for higher postal rates, then the Department must truly accept the responsibility so created. And if these public papers or some of them cast an element of doubt on the validity of the Department's case before Congress and the people, then the Department can blame itself for a not too carefully prepared and presented line of evidence to establish the proof that higher rates and service curtailment were absolutely necessary.

Your organization contends the postal establishment is a public service and the need for a balanced postal budget is not as vital as the Department claims. You have called attention to other departments of the National Government that produce little or no revenue and yet obtain their appropriations without apparently too much trouble. All Americans use the postal service. Therefore it is a public service. As to the value of the contention that it should be supported by congressional appropriation regardless of the disparity between income and expense, that at first glance seems a wide departure from what might be considered the good old-fashioned "earn your own keep" American methods. But if we look into the history of the postal service right down to the present moment we find considerable support for that very theory. Yes; the records of the Department will show that more than 39,000 of the more than 41,000 post offices of the country could not operate without what is truly a postal subsidy.

These 39,000 offices are of the second, third, and fourth class and are called district offices. At none of them are the receipts more than $40,000 a year and many have annual revenue of only a few hundred dollars. But they are necessary and perform good service, a service that our people could not and would not be expected to give up. Far from being self-supporting they cause an annual deficit of about $130,000,000 and this does not include the cost of mail transportation to and from these offices. The Department says its mail transportation costs amount to over $420,000,000 a year. It would be difficult to apportion the exact amount of the total transportation charges to these district offices but recalling they are located in 39,000 different places in all 48 States and our possessions, an estimate of $50,000,000, which is slightly over 10 percent of the whole cost, would certainly not seem too high. At any rate a very substantial deficit is to be expected year after year and it can only be met by congressional appropriation.

Suppose the Department got a 20-percent increase in rates, the added revenue at these district offices would amount to probably not more than $10,000,000 unless the rate on first-class matter were raised. All the efforts of the Department up to the recent curtailment order were for increases on everything except first-class mail. Congress can never be expected to hike postal rates sufficiently to wipe out the deficit in these district offices and it should not attempt to do so.

The Postmaster General and other officials of the Department have stated on many occasions that the cost of free postal services to other Government departments and agencies, free-in-county newspaper handling, etc., amounts to $150,000,000 a year. Add this to the annual deficit at the district offices and you have $280,000,000, or more than one-half of the entire postal deficit. And if we add the $50,000,000 (estimated) for mail transportation to these 39,000 offices we have a total of $330,000,000. This amount we will agree takes quite a slice out of the total postal deficit of $570,000,000. And if you add to that the subsidies given the air lines and other carriers of mail, you have accounted for at least four hundred million of the deficit. Subsidies should be recognized and labeled as such, and there is no justification for the postal service being saddled with them. If Congress decides to reduce the amount of postal subsidies given, it can do so by increasing postal rates, but it cannot wipe out either now or in the future the subsidy it is giving to support the district offices.

The 39,000 represents 94 percent of all the offices in our postal service. The other 6 percent make a profit, and they, the 6 percent, were the ones most affected by the curtailment order. If a postal-rate increase is granted it is their profits which will be increased. But it is a fair arrangement to expect the larger offices to produce enough revenue to wipe out the deficit, excluding the $150,000,000, which is the cost of the free services? Any increase in postal rates will be effective at all offices, but unless the Department changes its stand and asks for an increase on letter-mail postage—on which it claims to make a profit—the added revenue at the district offices will be slight compared to that of the 6 percent now more than earning their expenses. Until this subsidy to the postal service is recognized and treated as such and not placed on the mail users at the profit-making offices, there can be little or no hope of proceeding in a fair and equitable manner in this matter of rates. Certain rates should be raised, particularly those on second and fourth class, but all concerned should be certain of the equity involved in the increases requested.

The Department's basis for asking for increase in postal rates is to be found in its cost ascertainment figures and statistics. Cost ascertainment is a time, weight, and count study on all the mail handling and special service operations made at more than 500 offices of all 4 classes located in various parts of the country. From this study the Department puts forth the information that certain specified losses are incurred in handling second-, third-, and fourth-class mail, and all the special services excepting Postal Savings. The opposition to the rate increases, and this opposition is numerous and forceful, says the cost figures are not accurate; that the Department does not know what its costs are, and furthermore it cannot be expected to find out what it costs with relation to each operation are under its present system of cost ascertainment.

Congress has a real interest in the postal service. True it has not passed the rate bill; probably because the Department said we lose so much on each operation and each class of mail except first, but it apparently did not produce enough proof to satisfy Congress on that issue.

The postal service should pay its personnel good wages, better than at present, and improve working conditions where possible; and the personnel owes it to itself, the Department and the people to do the best job possible. Postal employees have a great investment in the service. The best and greatest investment possible. It is themselves as people and their future, and it is upon them that the country must depend for an efficient service. The employee, like the Department must be realistic and recognize conditions and facts as they exist. If they can be changed for the better, well and good. If not, they must be faced. And one of the important facts to face is the cost of operation in the largest offices.

Cost ascertainment figures show there is a difference in cost, a great difference; and, until it is wiped out or plainly explained and accounted for the entire service is on weak ground in trying to convince anyone, especially Congress and the publishers, that an appreciable boost in rates is justified.

The Department has accepted cost ascertainment figures and bases its efforts for increased rates on these figures. The Department claimed it could not continue to give the country the postal service that was in existence on April 17, 1950, and for some time prior thereto, because it was not getting the money needed for that service and curtailment was the answer to the problem created by reduced appropriations. The head of the Department said he disliked to curtail the service but as the entire postal service was operated economically there was nothing else to do. Savings were not possible in any other way. Sounds reasonable, doesn't it? A frank statement made about a frank and drastic order.

Now, no one who knows the officials and those holding high places in the Cost Ascertainment Division as I do, would charge these officials and employees with a desire to work against the Postmaster General. On the contrary, they are loyal honest people. Their responsibility is to put the data and statistics together in the form of reports of costs on different postal activities. These figures are gathered in the field. Under date of March 15, 1950, such a report was prepared and it was issued about the time of the April 18 bulletin—perhaps a few days later. This particular report contradicts the assertions that savings could only be made through curtailment. Yes (if the report is accurate, and in the absence of evidence to the contrary it should be accepted as accurate), this particular report dealt with the cost of operation in the 20 largest offices of the country. On one item, the cost of handling first-class mail, one office showed a cost of 133 percent more than the one that operated at the least cost. The average cost for the 20 offices was almost double that of the best office. Just imagine spending $5 for a piece of work in one office and getting that same piece of work done in another for $2.75.

Would it seem that savings could be made with such conditions existing? Yes, if the report accurately portrays present conditions and costs in the 20 offices in question, a savings of over $45,000,000 a year could be made in the handling of first-class mail alone. There was no explanation why such difference in operations cost should exist. There are bound to be some differences in costs of many postal activities but any report which showed such glaring disparity costs should be most carefully examined and analyzed before being made public. There were other differences of costs in other operations at these same 20 offices, but I might be considered as trying to build up a case if I offered additional detail. The report in question is not a secret. I am quite sure the congressional committee got copies of it and your organization may also have one.

The question will naturally arise in the minds of men of good sense—was this condition known to the officials of the Department, and, if known, what, if any, action was taken? Let us again look at the record. The report of March 15, 1950, was not the first of its kind to be printed and issued. Others in years and months passed had been distributed and showed similar conditions existing at the time specified on each report. The Department officials were aware of this disparagement in costs for the same kinds of work, and in some of the reports discussions were had on what was termed variables. Variables were introduced to offer some reasons why a difference might justifiably exist. But what kind of a variable it is that permits one office to spend the $5 for the same amount and kind of work and another only $2.75.

Could it be that the over-all management was satisfied to obtain and print cost figures and their related data and then go on to something else? Is it possible that the present postal management considered it had adequately and competently discharged its duties and responsibilities by gathering and publishing these ver detailed reports on the operation costs in the 20 largest offices and then ignored the very conditions its own reports brought to light? If so, the conclusion is and must be there is something wrong in that kind of management.

Each and every matter I have discussed in this article I brought to the attention (in writing) of the present postal management at one time or another. Only two of my memoranda were acknowledged. I felt I owed it to the postal officials to call to their attention the conditions, some of which at least, were in strong contrast to the representations that savings could only be made through curtailment of service. I have always considered it disloyal to keep from my superiors any information which had a bearing on any of their policies or programs. It was a duty to call attention to the unpleasant and contradictory conditions—and one I tried to carry out under all conditions. There may be some who disagree with such procedure.

Don't Send Your Daughter to Washington

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. ARTHUR G. KLEIN

OF NEW YORK

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Thursday, February 15, 1951

Mr. KLEIN. Mr. Speaker, on February 19 I introduced in the House H. R. 2766, a bill to create a Federal corporation for organized recreation of Government employees, with special attention to the metropolitan areas. The same or similar bills were introduced at the same time by the gentleman from Minnesota [Mr. McCARTHY], the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. RHODES], and in another House by Senators LANGER, MURRAY, DOUGLAS, and MORSE.

Mr. Speaker, it took little persuasion to convince us of the merit—nay, the necessity—of such legislation.

Not even the busy day of a Member of Congress is impervious to the parade of human tragedies running through the daily newspapers of Washington, and of other large cities with heavy concentrations of Federal employees, such as my own city of New York.

CRITICISMS OUTWEIGHED

So far as I am concerned, I believe I am fully aware of the valid criticisms of such a program, and in the balance I find the arguments in its favor far, far outweigh those against.

To my amusement and amazement, I have received some torrid mail, however, opposing the proposal with a violence hardly justified by the earnest good will of the bill's sponsors.

It seems to me fitting that some of the evidence on the side of an authorized, organized, self-sustaining recreation program should be set forth in the RECORD, and I am, accordingly, inserting a straightforward, factual piece of reporting from Liberty magazine, written by Sam Stavisky, veterans' affairs editor of the Washington Post, with whom many of us are personally acquainted:

Two youthful sailors strolling through a downtown Washington park spotted a couple of good-looking girls, exchanged glances, and quickly made a pickup.

In the ensuing conversational byplay, it developed that the girls were fresh out of high school, had come to Washington only a few weeks before from a small town in the Midwest, and had been recruited by the Federal Government to work in Washington as typists. The sailors had been in the Navy for nearly a year, and, so they said, were due to be shipped overseas in a couple of days.

The girls said they had to get back to work, but promised to meet the sailors that night.

"Don't forget," said one of the boys, "This may be your last chance to do something nice for a couple of sailors going off to war, so don't stand us up."

Both girls giggled, and one of them answered: "Don't worry. We'll be here. We'd like some fun too."

This casual incident, which occurred some weeks after the outbreak of the Korean war, was witnessed by a tall, distinguished man who was snatching a few minutes' midday sun on a nearby park bench. He shrugged sorrowfully, then slowly walked to his office across the park.

The pickup incident was related to me several days later by that man, Ray H. Everett, executive secretary of the Washington Social Hygiene Society.

"Maybe nothing more than an evening's innocent fun came out of that pickup," Everett said. "I have no way of knowing.

"I do know that pickup dates are becoming more and more common here as Uncle Sam once again starts to bring thousands of young girls into Washington to work for the mushrooming emergency agencies. And that means more trouble."

Everett knows a little something about trouble. He has devoted half of his 63 years to crusading for intelligent sex education. He has helped more than 20,000 young men and women who have gotten into trouble over sex and marriage. Hundreds of unmarried mothers have come to him in despair to find kindly help and wise guidance.

"During World War II Washington attained the unsavory reputation of being a paradise for pickups, especially for the 40,000 to 50,000 servicemen who poured into the Nation's Capital on week-end leave," Everett said.

"As a result Washington became something of a boomtown for unwed mothers. It still is—with every indication that the tragic situation will get worse."

Ray Everett is an outspoken fellow. But a check-up with officials dealing with maternity and child-welfare problems in the Federal agencies, municipal departments, and private helping-hand organizations leaves no doubt that they also are worried about the shape of things to come.

Why?

Because right now it appears that Uncle Sam has already started to repeat the mistakes of World War II. Already eager-beaver agents from the Department of Defense and the State Department are racing around the countryside pell-mell recruiting a new civilian army of Government girls. Already the young recruits, many enlisted from the high schools, are marching into Washington—and trouble.

It's an ugly fact that the tremendous influx of "G-girls" into Washington during World War II, together with wartime conditions and tensions there, combined to make Washington the Nation's No. 1 boomtown for unwed mothers in 1944.

The records of the National Office of Vital Statistics give evidence that the Nation's Capital has held on to that unenviable record ever since.

In 1945 Washington's illegitimate babies numbered 105 out of every 1,000 live births; in 1946 there were 98 out of 1,000; in 1947 there were 94 out of 1,000. In every one of those years Washington's illegitimacy ratio has been more than double the national average. The Federal statistics don't go beyond 1947, but the local statistics for the first half of 1950, as collected by the District of Columbia Health Department, indicate that the unmarried mother boom is hitting an all-time high.

Even as the boom expands, approximately 100,000 more G-girls will be herded into Washington—as the mobilization effort intensifies through 1951—to pound the endless rows of typewriters and to cultivate the endless columns of files in ever-burgeoning defense agencies.

These recruits are trooping into a city short of decent housing and short of adequate recreational facilities. They are crowding into a city in which—according to a 1947 Census Bureau survey of Metropolitan Washington—there are five women for every four men 14 to 44 years of age, four women to three men in the 20-to-24 age bracket. The combined shortages—housing, recreational facilities, eligible men—provide a fertile ground for giving another spurt to the boom in unwed mothers.

The same combination of shortages was discovered in Washington by G-girls of World War II, who flocked to the Nation's Capital to do their part. Poor, sometimes vile housing, insufficient recreational outlets, and desperate competition for the available men broke down the unstable girls, mentally and emotionally. Some got in trouble through unwed pregnancy; some with venereal disease. (Oh, yes, the Nation's Capital also has a thriving boom in VD.)

What's in store for Washington—unless corrective measures are taken—can be glimpsed in the report of the Committee on Unmarried Parenthood, D. C. Council of Social Agencies, made late in 1944. It read in part:

"Individual agencies all reported an increase in the number of unmarried mothers coming to them, particularly the young pregnant girl. One agency which had in 1938 accepted for care 16 unmarried mothers and pregnant girls, in 1943 accepted 128. * * * This increase does not allow for those cases which might have been accepted if there had been adequate staff and facilities to meet all requests.

"Most agencies have been experiencing an increase in applications among unmarried mothers who are new settlers in the community, many of these being young Government employees who plan to resume work in the District of Columbia after the birth of their babies and prefer not to return to the place of their legal residence."

The report pointed out that the local agencies, already overburdened with the requests for help from legally resident unwed mothers, were generally unable to assume responsibility for the newcomers. As a result, some of the unwed mothers had to be thrust, along with their illegitimate offspring, back into the community from which they came—and into social ostracism. Because of the legal red tape, lack of funds by the municipal government, indifference and apathy of the Federal Government, the nonresident unmarried mother—the report observed—"is frequently cut adrift from all normal human relationships through which she might receive help."

The situation hasn't changed much since that report was read. The municipal and local Community Chest agencies are still understaffed, overworked, and lacking in funds. And Uncle Sam is still pretty much indifferent to the problem.

Along with illegitimacy, the venereal disease rate also boomed during the war and postwar years in Washington. By 1948, VD was claiming six times as many victims in the District of Columbia as in 1941, with 13,000 cases reported, and 25,000 more cases unreported but suspected by health officials. By 1948, Washington's gonorrhea rate was five and one-half times the national average, with three to four times the number of cases than in cities of comparable population—such as Baltimore, Cleveland, and St. Louis.

Back in 1941 the local Health Department reported that 93 percent of the VD-infected soldiers at Fort Belvoir, Va., and 43 percent of the infected draftees at Fort Meade, Md., blamed Washington girls for their trouble.

Two years later—in 1943—Washington was accused by the Army of infecting twice as many soldiers with VD as any other city.

Now, who do you suppose was blamed for this situation? Street-walkers? Camp-followers? Prostitutes? Not at all. Washington police did a commendable job in cleaning up and eliminating the Capital's bawdy houses.

But the police found themselves helpless in attempting to cope with the "victory-girls," with the "cuddle-bunnies."

Efforts at controlling the amateur boom in illicit sexual relations made little headway. In 1945, the last year of the war, more than 65 percent of GI's infected with VD could blame their disease on amateur carriers. Twenty-four cases of GI gonorrhea were traced to one nice girl, whose promiscuity made her as dangerous to our troops as a full battalion of enemy soldiers on the front line.

The Washington Federation of Churches investigated the problem during the war and came up with the conclusion that 80 percent of infections among GI's were attributable to the young innocent-type of girl. The local Criminal Justice Association found that the sharp increase in juvenile delinquency was due to the uniform-happy girls who feel they can't say "No" to a soldier.

Several times during the Second World War, congressional committees took a hurried glance into the shameful conditions, but did little or nothing about it. Testimony before these committees, however, demonstrated that Uncle Sam was largely to blame.

There's no question but that Uncle Sam needed woman-power to run the vast network of records-and-red-tape mills in Washington during the war. But in its rush to bring the girls into the Nation's capital, Uncle Sam took a callous attitude toward his employees. The Federal agencies and their recruiters made no attempt to screen the girls, but instead hired anyone who could distinguish a filing cabinet from a typewriter.

In at least two cases, according to the Women's Bureau of the Metropolitan Police Department, female inmates of mental institutions, who had written war agencies for jobs, were wired to report for work in Washington.

Testimony before congressional committees, presented by Dr. Winifred Overholser, superintendent of famed St. Elizabeths mental hospital, made it clear that Uncle Sam's indiscriminate hiring program during World War II brought hundreds of mentally and emotionally unstable girls into Washington at a time when the economic and social tensions were at their worst.

"Too many of the girls brought here were young adolescents not very well adjusted, who found the excitement of wartime Washington conducive to recklessness," observes Miss Patricia Morss, license officer of the District Public Welfare Department.

Instead of glamour, the girls discovered Washington was a place where the abnormally high cost of living nullified what looked to them like high salaries. Decent quarters were hard to obtain, and even poor quarters were expensive. The files of the Community Chest agencies and municipal welfare units abound with instances of a half dozen or more Government girls being jammed into a single cellar or attic room at $25 or more a month for each girl.

When the situation got desperate, the Federal Government was panicked into throwing up dormitories for the girls. By the end of the war, some 11,000 girls were living in the dorms. Some of the units, like Arlington Farms, with a capacity of 4,200 residents, also provided excellent, if isolated, recreational facilities for the girls.

Now, however, Uncle Sam is back where he started on the housing problem. Housing facilities for G-girls have been sold to private interests, converted into office space for blossoming "cold war" agencies, or given over to the rapidly expanding Armed Forces. Along with the housing went some of the best recreational facilities. So, with the new crop of G-girls streaming in, the housing situation is just about where it was before World War II broke out.

Dorothea Andrews, social welfare writer for the Washington Post, in a 1949 study of unmarried parenthood in the Nation's Capital, points up the fact that Washington adds its own factor to unwed motherhood—loneliness.

"In a town where there is a preponderance of women over men, a woman is in heavier competition for a social life," commented Miss Andrews. "If the newcomer doesn't get the opportunity to meet single men, she may become involved with a married man."

The Andrews study disclosed that of those girls in trouble who came to local agencies for help, 50 percent were Government girls. Social workers agree, Miss Andrews said, that the girls seeking help were coming from an increasingly higher intelligence-level group, and that in most cases, promiscuity was the exception rather than the rule.

Of course, it is true that good housing, adequate recreational facilities, and the opportunity to meet single men won't stop girls from getting into trouble. But as Capt. Rhoda Milliken, of the Women's Bureau, points out, these three things will help prevent a number of individual tragedies.

Miss Milliken, who has spent a good part of her life dealing with so-called bad girls, urged the Federal Government in the pre-World War II days to screen G-girl recruits in order to weed out many of these mentally and emotionally unstable. The reply from the war agencies then was that the suggestion was "impractical."

Recently, Ray Everett, of the Social Hygiene Society, issued a strong statement warning the Federal agencies that their recruiting drives were duplicating the ballyhoo and repeating the take-one, take-all mistakes of World War II. "There were too many needless home-front casualties," he said.

Reaction of the Federal agencies to the renewed suggestions for screening girl recruits ranged from indifference to apathy. I asked the personnel chief of a major agency what he thought of the screening suggestion. The personnel director laughed at the idea.

"Look," he said, "our recruiters are given 2 or 3 weeks training before they're sent into the field. They're supposed to evaluate the girls when they interview them. * * * You certainly don't expect each girl to be examined by a psychiatrist, do you? * * * Why, we don't know which of the girls will crack up until they get here. Besides, how do we know she didn't get into trouble back at home. * * * Social hygiene education? That's a waste of time. Most of the girls know where babies come from."

Proponents of screening argue that the idea is not at all impractical. They point out that draftees are given quickie mental-stability tests prior to induction, and that only the borderline cases have to be sent to a psychiatrist. They point out, too, that checks on mental and emotional stability for the girl recruits can be made—if the recruiters will put in the time—through the girls' teachers and ministers, through the social-service agencies in her community.

A check with the Civil Service Commission and the agencies which do their own hiring indicates that, arguments or not, screening of the G-girls is not planned. A check of the Federal housing agencies indicates that provision for good, inexpensive housing for the G-girls is not planned. Ditto on recreation. At this writing, there's nothing in the works to prevent the extra troubles most everybody expects.

Right now it's a sure bet that Washington will not only retain its scandalous title as the Nation's No. 1 boom town for unwed mothers, but will even establish a more disgraceful record in the war-scare months to come.

Fair Employment Practices

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. WILLIAM E. JENNER
OF INDIANA
IN THE SENATE OF THE UNITED STATES
Thursday, March 22 (legislative day of Friday, March 16), 1951

Mr. JENNER. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that there be printed in the Appendix of the RECORD a radio address on the subject Fair Employment Practices, the Essential Ingredient of Democracy, delivered at Indianapolis, Ind., by Mrs. Mahala Ashley Dickerson, an attorney of Montgomery, Ala.

There being no objection, the address was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

FAIR EMPLOYMENT PRACTICES, THE ESSENTIAL INGREDIENTS OF DEMOCRACY

The founding fathers of this country entered upon a way of life with unbounded frontiers. There was always a new wide open space in which one could sow his seeds and watch his plants grow; set his traps and lift from them their game. The prior inhabitants of this land were pushed further and further back if their presence proved, in any way, thwarting to the pattern of the pioneers.

The framers of the Constitution of this country framed it for a civilization with much wide open space—space where the individual could do much as he pleased as long as he regarded the rights of others to do almost the same thing. That was freedom.

This very latitude in the early development of this country permitted the gradual crystallization of much injustice; for example, almost the extinction of a race once holding it completely, and the enslaving of another brought to it in chains, to help to build its dynasties, which were considered a part of that individual freedom, inherent in the rights of the pioneer.

This country, allegedly founded to perpetuate and enlarge Christendom, in the process of its maturity, has, bit by bit, revised its laws and constitutions to make for "a more perfect union * * * insure the blessings of liberty to ourselves and to our posterity."

Yes; by constitutional enactments and judicial decisions, many inequities in the eyes of the law have been removed. Our shores have become havens of refuge for the oppressed of all lands. Fundamentally, there survives much of the early American sprit of "America, the land of opportunity." However, one fundamental ingredient, which held a place of equal dignity, with "the right to worship God as we please," is missing, that is: "the right to work."

Unfortunately, the days of homesteading on the physical frontiers are over. This country is controlled by an intricate economic system—a system which hums to the tune of corporations, stock, bonds, debentures, mines, minerals, farms, and the like. In addition, we recognize the fact that the Federal Government conducts a momentous business and that each State has a full force of employees, as had each municipality.

Unfortunately, the geographical location of the corporations, mines, minerals, farms, yes, even the State, Federal, or municipal agency, is largely determinative of whether or not all United States citizens are allowed to work there, or, if allowed, in what capacity. Yet, all persons born or naturalized in the United States are citizens of the United States, and of the State in which they reside. If a citizen, though competent to perform a task, is deprived of the opportunity because of race, religion, or parental origin, this fundamental ingredient of democracy has been suppressed.

The victims of willful rejection and deprivation, this disinherited group, may be followed into the various frustrated channels of all society. Many are in the prisons; many are in the sanitariums; yes, many are in our Armed Forces, not because they liked army life or were drafted, but because they could not find a job at home. Many, after the particular crisis, which prompted the enlistment ended, never returned home, or for that matter, to this country. They preferred anonymity in a strange land to the embarrassing experience of job seeking, and the endless shakes of the head which they knew were prompted solely because of race, religion, or parental origin.

Yet, these same citizens are expected to pledge and maintain the same allegiance to this country's flag, contribute to its same organized charities, which often do not permit a member of the rejected group to hold a job on their staffs, pay State and Federal taxes to help support the offices from which they are excluded. A loyalty built on such an uncertain basis would appear easily shaken. The more men suffer the more they think. Perhaps the failure of mass rebellion of the disinherited groups has resulted from only slight suffering here and there or an inability to think in a logical manner because of not having once had a spark or hint of anything different or better.

Today, the world is in a turmoil. The world will decide before too many years have passed whether or not the two major forms of government battling each other can survive side by side or will have one engulfed by the other. Whether integrity, loyalty, patriotism, and the like can survive rejection and discrimination becomes a problem. Yet, more pressing is the problem of whether these concepts can survive hunger, perpetual want, and other vital deprivations arising naturally from the denial of the right to work. Whether this denial comes from a Federal agency, a State agency, a municipal agency, or private enterprise, operating by virtue of a franchise emitting from one of the afore-mentioned, it is nevertheless an un-American act, destructive of a democratic way of life.

The mills of the gods grind slowly and our own country is now playing a crucial role in the upward or downward trend of the infiltration of various sentiments into the hearts and minds of its citizens. Never before has the United States had such an opportunity through its citizens to win so completely a world-wide victory; by making democracy work at home, by insuring one fundamental right to all of its very own—a right which they could all, despite inability to comprehend a nebulous foreign policy, understand—the right to work.

Ability knows no color line, as was recently demonstrated by the Crispus Attucks Tigers. At this time they are the standard bearers for all the high schools of this great city. The American spirit of fair play, so aptly asserting itself in the world of sports, should not be suppressed in our economic system. Here, too, the basis should be merit, and merit alone.

Plight of Small-Business Men

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. HENRY CABOT LODGE, JR.
OF MASSACHUSETTS
IN THE SENATE OF THE UNITED STATES
Thursday, March 22 (legislative day of Friday, March 16), 1951

Mr. LODGE. Mr. President, the plight of many small-business men is very serious today. Inability to obtain highly needed materials is bringing many of them to the verge of ruin. One of them has written to me as follows:

It is difficult to preserve any faith in the present administrators of government in the face of the shameful publicity coming out of Washington and the utter lack of evidence that a unified, realistic, well-organized approach is being made toward solving the internal affairs of our country.

This gentleman has sent me two articles by Denny Allen which relate to the question of material shortages as it affects the small-business men. I ask unanimous consent that they be printed in the Appendix of the RECORD.

There being no objection, the articles were ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

TAPE STRANGULATION, STEEL STARVATION KILL QUINCY MAN'S BOILER BUSINESS

(By Denny Allen)

The squeeze is on—and getting tighter—for the small-business man.

He's being swamped, his business imperiled, by a wave of Government controls, red tape and scarcity of raw materials, all created by the defense economy. He's a victim of the Nation's transition from civilian to war production.

FALLING BY WAYSIDE

At a time when business could be thriving in an expanding market, small-scale manufacturers along the South Shore are finding themselves up to their necks in a struggle to keep going. Some are beginning to succumb to the undertow.

Especially hard hit are the small companies which use steel and other metals as a basic production item. They can't get raw materials for civilian production and are caught in a time lag in which they can only hope for future subcontracts on defense projects.

One such case—and it's a drastic one—is that of the Arc-Way Steel Boiler Co., owned by F. Ray Robinson, of 128 Spring Street, Quincy. The squeeze is driving him right out of the business which he spent years in developing.

Robinson's plant is at 20 Ericsson Street in Neponset, a building he purchased from the old Lawley shipyard when it closed down after the war. He manufactures (when he can get materials) some 40 types of oil-fed and gas-fed steel boilers and a comparatively new product, a poultry cremator for which there is a national demand.

TO BE SOLD AT AUCTION

But he's going out of busin .s. His plant and machinery are to be sold at public auction next week in a complete liquidation of the company.

Robinson's problem is the same as all small manufacturers. Production has been reduced to a trickle because metals aren't available. What's more, defense subcontracts are still several months off. Anticipating them in a highly competitive field is a risky proposition.

For 5 months, the company has been at work, filling out forms and making contacts in hopes of getting some defense work, but there hasn't been any given out in the steel prefabricating line. It probably will be June or after before the situation breaks.

Even if defense orders were available, the present system of allocation carries no guaranty that a manufacturer could get raw materials. True, he would have a defense order (DO), but mills and warehouses are selling available materials to the first fellow who comes with a DO. Later arrivals are out of luck.

By summer, the Government hopes to set up a controlled materials plan which would establish necessary priorities, but that will be too late for Robinson and others like him.

MILLS WON'T TAKE ORDERS

Big business, with its resources, connections and wherewithal, may be able to hang on, but the sag in civilian production is killing the Arc-Way Steel Boiler Co.

"We can't get the materials. The mills won't even take our orders," he said.

"The black market? Yes, we can get all the steel we want at black market prices, but then we couldn't sell our product because the cost to the consumer would be too high."

For example, he explained, the maximum price his company can pay for steel boiler plate is 7.5 cents a pound. The black market boys are asking from 10 to 20 cents a pound.

Robinson is proud of his products—the steel boilers which he says are about half the size, yet close to three times as efficient as the old-type cast-iron boilers. He could build them at the rate of one every 20 minutes if he had the materials.

ORDERS FOR 200

The poultry cremator, invented by a New Hampshire man with Robinson aiding the development, is something new with great promise. It is for use around poultry farms and hatcheries where the disposal of dead poultry and refuse has always been a health problem.

"We've sold 50 already and have orders for 200 more. The orders would go on indefinitely but we can't get the steel," said Robinson. Of the 200 on order, he hopes to complete 20. The plant, even at present, could turn out 10 a day—again if materials were obtainable.

But they're not, so the Arc-Way Steel Boiler Co is going on the auction block on February 28 at 2 o'clock in the afternoon. The building, land, machinery, and everything else will be offered for sale.

"It would be an excellent opportunity for someone," said Robinson. "The right people with the right connections could have a fine business."

But for Robinson, the end of his career as a manufacturer is at hand. How many more small businesses will follow suit in the "big squeeze" remains to be seen.

DEFENSE MUDDLE HITS BRAINTREE TOOL PLANT

(By Denny Allen)

"Us little fellows are really getting booted around. Those people in Washington do not care what happens to us."

TOUGH SITUATION

Thus spoke today another of the small-scale manufacturers along the South Shore who are facing extinction in the Nation's jerky jump from civilian to defense production.

"It is a tough and nasty situation," mourned Frank Albertassi, an official of the Corey Tool & Machine Co., of 21 Granite Street, Braintree.

"I have got 17 men I do not know what to do with when we finish the work now on hand. We cannot get the materials or the machines to do our own work and there is not too much defense work around yet."

Pessimistic about the future, Albertassi voiced a lament that is common with little-business men today, especially those who need a steady flow of steel and other materials to stay in business.

Since the Government began cutbacks in civilian production to bolster the defense program, a time lag before defense contracts appear has pushed many manufacturers into an enforced business slump.

Production has dropped off because materials are not available and the jobs of employees are being either wiped out or seriously jeopardized.

NATIONAL CONCERN

The situation is one of national concern. Manufacturers by the thousands are facing an uncertain future that may bring idle plants and a serious unemployment problem.

As a result, Washington officials are under heavy pressure to reduce the stockpiling of materials and lessen the severity of the time lag until defense contracts are placed in sufficient volume.

"Even at that we have been luckier than some," said Albertassi, whose company makes special tools for such customers as the Pneumatic Scale Corp. in North Quincy and the Armstrong Cork Co. plant in South Braintree. Albertassi is a partner in the Corey concern with his son James and William Bemis, also of Braintree.

"We saw it coming 4 or 5 months ago and stocked up, but it is all gone now," he said. "It is really getting bad."

Getting materials today, he explained, amounts to a scramble, picking up 100 pounds or so wherever it can be found.

"It is a funny thing," he said. "Three months ago we used to have salesmen coming in here trying to sell us stainless steel. Now we cannot buy it, yet there are not many defense contracts around, so where is the steel going?"

GREY MARKET

One of the answers, he agreed, is the so-called grey market where a manufacturer can buy just about any type of metal he wants at double the normal price.

How about the prospect of defense work?

"We really do not know because we have not been out looking," said Albertassi. "We have been very busy with our own work for 2 or 3 years. But from what I can see, there is not too much defense work around for companies like ours."

During World War II, the Corey Co. did much work for the Army and Navy on the manufacture of special tools. But the prospects of returning to that work are not very bright.

"Practically all of the skilled personnel we had in those days are gone now," Albertassi decalred. "Only one of them is still with us.

"You can quote me. It is a tough and nasty situation."

Underemployment of Rural Families

OF

HON. JOHN J. SPARKMAN

OF ALABAMA

IN THE SENATE OF THE UNITED STATES

Thursday, March 22 (legislative day of Friday, March 16), 1951

Mr. SPARKMAN. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to have printed in the Appendix of the RECORD an editorial entitled "Farm Unemployment," published in the Washington Post, March 19, 1951. This editorial discusses materials prepared for the Joint Committee on the Economic Report by the committee's staff and published as a committee print February 2, 1951, under the title "Underemployment of Rural Families." I understand that the committee still has available a few copies, which will be distributed on an individual basis as long as the supply lasts.

Mr. President, I also ask unanimous consent to include in the Appendix of the RECORD a summary of the findings of this staff study. I wish to state that this report grew out of the recommendations for further study of the Subcommittee on Low-Income Families, under my chairmanship. This study is not to be considered a report of the committee. It does not represent the conclusions of the committee or any of its members, but simply attempts to present a factual review of available material on the important economic problem of rural low-income families. The study was prepared by Dr. Walter W. Wilcox, on loan from the Legislative Reference Service of the Library of Congress, and Dr. W. E. Hendrix, on leave from the Georgia Agricultural Experiment Station. Other members of the committee's staff have subjected it to close scrutiny.

There being no objection, the editorial and summary were ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

[From the Washington Post of March 19, 1951]

FARM UNDEREMPLOYMENT

A report prepared for the Joint Congressional Committee on the Economic Report states that 2,000,000 small-farm families, or more than a third of all farm families, are underemployed. Workers on these small farms produce less than half as much as those operating medium-sized family farms. Another million and a half nonfarm workers living in the country or in small towns are only 60 percent as productive as workers in the average rural nonfarm family. If all these underemployed workers had jobs enabling them to produce as much as the average worker on medium-sized family farms or the average rural nonfarm worker, the investigators conclude that the increase in output would in effect add 2,500,000 workers to the country's labor force.

This rural underemployment is Nationwide. Evidence gathered by the committee from all parts of the country is a salutary reminder that we need a point 4 program of our own to make more efficient use of our manpower resources. Although Federal educational and credit programs aid some of these low-income underemployed farm families, the report points out that there is "no clearly defined (national) policy for dealing specifically with rural underemployment and the low-income problem in agriculture on a comprehensive basis including both farm and nonfarm adjustments."

The investigators stress in particular the need for a vigorous farm enlargement program. That is of major importance since inadequate acreage accounts for a great deal of the prevailing underemployment. However, the job is considered too large an undertaking for the Government alone. The report advocates integration of educational programs carried on by the Government with a farm-enlargement loan program carried on by private agencies.

Loans are needed, too, to improve farm practices and help underemployed farmers to obtain employment elsewhere. Of course, these proposals would entail considerable outlays by lending agencies, but expenditures would be spread over a long period of time and would yield dividends through an increase in the earning capacity of several million Americans. A country that has spent billions of dollars to further recovery (i. e., increase the productivity) of Western European workers has no excuse for ignoring the exigent needs of the underprivileged at home.

SUMMARY OF UNDEREMPLOYMENT OF RURAL FAMILIES

(Prepared for the Joint Committee on the Economic Report by the committee staff)

Two million of nearly six million farm operator families are now producing less than $1,800 each per year in farm products, including products used in the home. In addition to these farm families, there are 3,531,000 rural nonfarm families, 1,500,000 of whom had annual incomes of less than $2,000 in 1948. The staff study, which is an outgrowth of studies conducted by the Subcommittee on Low-Income Families last year, shows how the welfare of these 3,530,000 rural families may be improved while at the same time adding the equivalent of nearly 2,500,000 workers to our national labor force.

The report presents new information on the extent of underemployment among rural families, what existing governmental programs are now doing to improve the lot of the underemployed farm family, and lists the results of questions directed to technicians in various States as to the extent, causes and remedies for underemployment of farm families in their areas. The Nationwide character of the problem of rural underemployment is demonstrated by the fact that the subcommittee received replies from respondents in 37 States.

The report points out that there are four general areas for improvement of the underemployed rural worker:

1. Increase the productivity per worker on existing farms: On small, inadequate farming units crop yields are lower and milk production per cow and egg production per hen are lower than on the nearby larger farms. Families on these farming units are usually hard-pressed for money to spend for seeds, fertilizers, foundation livestock, and supplies for disease and insect control. Lacking alternative means for employment these families, instead of moving, adjust themselves to the limited resources at hand.

2. Increase the size of the farm: Even with the adoption of improved practices, if existing units are not enlarged workers can only increase their productivity by 50 to 100 percent. These small-scale units would have to increase their output by an average of 300 percent to equal the modest level of output on medium-sized commercial family farms. To reach that level fully 60 percent of the present small farm units must be increased in size or consolidated with other farms.

3. Assist families who desire farm or nonfarm employment outside their home communities: In spite of substantial outward migration the reduction in population pressure in communities of low-income underemployed rural families has been only about 10 percent in the last decade. Although in some instances new industries have been established nearby, opportunities for off-farm employment are only a small fraction of the number needed to provide full employment for the available able-bodied manpower of working age.

4. Increase employment opportunities for low-income part-time farmers, rural nonfarm families, and hired farm workers: The 1,900,000 part-time farm and rural nonfarm families where the head of the family is able-bodied and of working age, either underemployed or employed on low-productivity jobs, exceeds the number of full-time farm families who are underemployed.

The study goes on to give a number of specific suggestions to carry out the recommendations listed above, including:

(a) A cooperative State and Federal program of substantial assistance to counties having high proportions of underemployed rural families to provide: (1) Special technical assistance on more efficient farming practices; (2) Technical assistance to help people in these communities determine alternative employment opportunities and to provide them with skills to take advantage of these opportunities.

(b) Plans for stimulating increased private credit for improved farming practices, including farm enlargement.

(c) Proposals, in the light of current manpower shortages, to provide substantial defense credit and grants to supplement private credit for improved farming practices, for farm enlargement, and for moving costs of families desiring employment in other communities.

Atlantic Union

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. GUY M. GILLETTE
OF IOWA
IN THE SENATE OF THE UNITED STATES

Thursday, March 22 (legislative day of Friday, March 16), 1951

Mr. GILLETTE. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that there be printed in the Appendix of the RECORD an editorial entitled "Atlantic Union," which appeared in the New York Herald Tribune of Sunday, March 18, 1951.

There being no objection, the editorial was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

ATLANTIC UNION

When the friends and supporters of a Federal union of the Atlantic Pact nations gathered last week to promote their cause, they could point to a general tide moving in their direction. The Atlantic Pact contains many hints of an ultimate union; and Russia's continued intransigence has given these a new emphasis. General Eisenhower represents a unified military policy, while a federation of Western European states continues to develop on functional lines. The Schuman plan is the boldest initiative of this kind; and the efforts of American officials to secure its adoption indicate the extent to which we are bound up in a wide community of interests.

Ex-Secretary of War Patterson, Senators Kefauver and Gillette, and other speakers at the impressive annual dinner could draw upon recent events to fortify their case. The successes and the set-backs in Korea, the immense efforts and the considerable difficulties of General Eisenhower's mission, all can be taken to illustrate the need for some form of closer political ties. A resolution calling for an international convention to discuss implementation of this need has received substantial support in both Houses of Congress. For the moment, however, there undoubtedly is a desire among many world-minded statesmen to focus attention on reinforcing General Eisenhower's command rather than to raise other far-reaching and controversial questions. The immediate task is to prove that there exists among the people a widespread and profound desire for a larger union; and this the Atlantic Union Committee is prepared to undertake. It is a great task worthy of the efforts of the best men.

Back to the Day of the Serf and Peasant

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. CLARE E. HOFFMAN
OF MICHIGAN
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Tuesday, March 6, 1951

Mr. HOFFMAN of Michigan. Mr. Speaker, Americans, we are told, have fought two wars to preserve civilization, prevent a return to the Dark Ages.

As your sons, husbands, and fathers, some who have served before, are marching off to world war III, should we not be told where they will be required to fight, for what purpose, what battles they must win before the war is over?

Are we back in the days when the feudal lords decided when a war—either for gain or just for the pleasure of fighting—should be fought by their serfs?

Those serfs neither knew why they were fighting, where they were to fight, nor when the war would end. They were a little worse off than are our conscripted men of today, for they were required, to some extent, to equip themselves for the fighting. Our conscripted men are a little better off, for munitions of war, their food, clothing, and transportation, are provided by the taxpayers. But they have little, if any, more knowledge of where they are going or why—or when the war will be over for those who survive—than did those who fought 600 years ago.

The men of those days did, however, at least know that they were fighting for and under the command of their feudal lord. The soldiers of old followed their lord and master and his flag into battle. Our men, as they leave their home shores, sail out under the Stars and Stripes, the flag which for more than 160 years has, to the people of all the world, been the symbol of liberty, identifying the land of freedom and opportunity.

But, under the present procedure, when they leave the homeland and become a part of world war III they will find themselves serving under the flag of United Nations, in a force whose commander is a general or an admiral who takes his orders either from the North Atlantic Treaty Organization or United Nations. The soldier of 600 years ago was subject to the orders of his lord. The American boy of today, when he reaches the battleground where he must fight—perhaps die—will go forward, will withdraw—on the orders of United Nations.

United Nations is a group made up of representatives of 59 nations, with a Security Council of 11 members—a Security Council which dictates when and where our men shall fight and for what purpose.

Do you realize that there is a plan which will authorize the drafting of every physically and mentally fit American male, as he reaches the age of 18½ years, for a period of 26 months, with a further obligation to serve in the active or reserve forces for an additional 6 years—a total of 8 years and 2 months in military service?

Do you realize that Mr. Truman proposes to create an army of at least 4,000,000 men? That he contemplates sending as many million of our men to Korea and to Europe as the Security Council—not Congress—thinks may be necessary to accomplish its purpose—whatever that may be? That they will serve under the command and flag of the United Nations?

When our forefathers were fighting for their liberty George III of England, who wished to prevent the establishment of our Republic, hired the Hessians—trained mercenary soldiers—to fight for him in the Revolutionary War. King George paid the landgraves, princes, and dukes of the German states for the services of those Hessians in an effort to throttle liberty.

Today, Mr. Truman, Mr. Acheson are sending American men to fight for United Nations. The administration is not paid for the services of these men who fight and die abroad—they fight, suffer, and some die, not for home, fireside, or country, but for United Nations. The administration has the effrontery to tell us that these wars are necessary for our own protection.

But never yet has Mr. Truman, Mr. Acheson, nor anyone else told those who are paying the cost, doing the fighting, just what it is that these men, sent abroad to fight under the orders of United Nations, must do, which, having done, the war will end, peace will be established and those who survive may come home—live their own lives in their own way.

Are not the American people entitled to an answer to that question before more of their men are conscripted, march off to fight in world war III?

State Legislative Program of Affiliated Young Democrats of New York

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. EMANUEL CELLER

OF NEW YORK

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Wednesday, March 21, 1951

Mr. CELLER. Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my remarks, I include the New York State legislative program of the Affiliated Young Democrats, adopted December 20, 1950:

STATE LEGISLATIVE PROGRAM OF THE AFFILIATED YOUNG DEMOCRATS, INC., OF NEW YORK, FOR 1951

1. Rent control: Every housewife and every tenant knows that our people are the victims of inflation at home. The two enemies that must be defeated are inflation and communism. The rising cost of living must be held in check, and a major factor in the cost of living is rents. A first order of business of the new legislature should be the enactment of a fair rent-control law to prohibit the imposition of unfair rent increases by landlords.

We have repeatedly pointed out that residents of the city of New York have been the subject of fantastic increases in garage rentals, in some cases amounting to 315 percent. The legislature has repeatedly refused to plug this hole in the rent control laws. We urge again that the rent control laws be amended so as to control specifically garage rentals, and thus put an end to this abuse on automobile owners.

2. Increased aid to municipalities: The legislature should enact laws giving a fair share of the taxes collected by the State paid by the residents of the city of New York and other cities to those municipalities.

3. Public schools: In terms of per capita expenditure, and facilities available to the total population, New York State ranks far below its proper place. Our cities lack adequate and modern public schools, and existing schools are overcrowded. The salaries paid to public school teachers are far below what is needed by them to maintain a fair standard of living. A broad program of legislation should be adopted to give all communities in the State adequate and modern schools and to insure a decent standard of living for our teachers. The incoming legislature should remain in session until such a program has been adopted.

4. Primaries: Under existing law candidates for nomination to offices filled by a State-wide election are nominated by State conventions. It is notorious that such conventions are controlled conventions and that the candidates for election to such offices as Governor, United States Senator, Lieutenant Governor, Attorney General, and Comptroller are selected by a handful of party bosses. Few of the candidates nominated at such conventions in recent years would have been nominated by party primaries of either party. To us such a system is not in accord with our concept of the democratic way of life. We urge that, as in many other States, a direct primary law be enacted so that the candidates for offices to be filled by a State-wide election will be selected by State-wide primaries. Only this way can the right of the people to select their officers be insured.

5. Boards of election: The election law at the present time provides that the board of elections in the city of New York shall be selected by the Democratic and Republican County Committees of New York County and Kings County. For years the people of the counties of Bronx, Richmond, and Queens have been thus deprived of representation in the board of elections, and appointments to that board have become party plums to be distributed by political bosses. The board of elections, charged with maintaining the integrity of our elective processes, is truly the watchdog of our liberties. We urge that the election law be amended so as to provide for the election of members of the board of elections by city-wide primary elections of the two major parties.

6. Eighteen-year-old ballot: With the drafting of 18-year-old boys to fight in Korea, emphasis is again laid upon the inequity of our present law which says that citizens who are old enough to fight are not old enough to vote. New York should follow the lead of other States and enact legislation conferring the ballot at the age of 18.

7. Divorce law revision: We have for many years called attention to the scandal of our present divorce laws which breed perjury and rampant fraud. The so-called strict divorce law of New York has actually resulted in New York becoming one of the easiest of divorce States, and has seriously weakened the integrity of our system of justice. New York needs new laws relating to the family, marriage, and divorce under which our courts will be given adequate staffs to permit them to ascertain the causes of family difficulties and to work out solutions which will permit the court to effect reconciliations and save marriages. We again urge the creation by the legislature of a commission composed of representatives of the three principal faiths of the State, of doctors, sociologists, women, bench and bar to evolve for New York State a model family law including divorce, separation, annulment, marriage, and related matters. We urge the enactment by New York of the Uniform Divorce Recognition Act to put an end to fraudulent out-of-State divorces.

8. Family court: Today there is confusion in the courts as to family matters. The supreme court has jurisdiction in divorce, separation, and annulment matters, and is not equipped with the staff to permit it to discharge its responsibilities adequately. The surrogates have jurisdiction in adoption matters. The so-called domestic relations court handles primarily support cases, and juvenile problems. Still other family matters are handled elsewhere. Paternity cases are handled in the court of special sessions, and other matters in the magistrates courts. All of these matters should be handled and centered in a single family court, and we urge the enactment of laws to that end.

9. Court unification and simplification: In other matters too we are afflicted with an ancient and unwieldy court structure. The Supreme Court of the State is congested with many more cases than can possibly be handled by its judges, and justice is frustrated by delays of years in between the commencement of an action and the time that it comes to trial. Other courts such as the city court, the municipal court, and the court of general sessions do not today have a sufficient volume of business to keep their judges busy, and those judges are not now permitted to serve in other courts where they are needed. Our entire court structure should be overhauled so as to provide for a better utilization of our judge power, and to furnish the people with a more efficient administration of justice.

10. Judges and political office: The State constitution today effectively prohibits judges of the court of appeals and justices of the supreme court from running for political office without resigning from the bench. Such a rule is consistent with the canons of judicial ethics which are aimed at preventing judges from using their judicial office for political purposes. Yet judges of other courts of the State are, under existing law, free to run for political office without resigning from the bench and many have returned to judicial duties after active political campaigns and defeats at the polls. To keep politics out of our courts, the constitutional prohibitions should be extended to all judges of all courts of record in the State.

11. Unemployment insurance: The benefits of the unemployment insurance law should be extended to classes not now covered by it, and should also be made available to the sick.

12. Reapportionment: The incoming legislature is charged with responsibility for a reapportionment of the State's congressional districts. This becomes a heavy responsibility since New York's representation in the Eighty-third Congress is to be reduced. Congressional reapportionment should be done on a nonpartisan basis and with the purpose of insuring that each of the State's 43 congressional districts will contain an equal population. Gerrymandering should be avoided.

Reapportionment of the State legislature is also a pressing problem. For many years restrictive laws have prevented the people of the cities of the State, including the city of New York, from having fair and equal representation in the legislature. A new law should be enacted to provide that all sections of the State will be represented in the legislature on the basis of population in accord with the basic principles of democratic government.

13. Motor vehicles: We are opposed to the use of revenues obtained from gasoline taxes and automobile license fees for purposes other than the development and maintenance of an adequate system of highways. We advocate the abolition of toll roads and the issuance of permanent automobile license plates. We urge that the discriminatory gasoline tax in favor of nonautomotive users of gasoline be abolished, and that industrial users of gasoline be subjected to the same tax as motorists. We oppose a use tax on automobiles.

14. Recognition of women voters: Although they constitute more than half of the electorate, there are few major State, city, or county offices which are held by women. We advocate the nomination, appointment, and election of qualified women to a fair share of city, State, and county offices, and we call upon Democratic leaders in the State to give such representation to women wherever possible.

15. Narcotics: We favor the enactment of a law providing for the treatment and rehabilitation of narcotic addicts by State agencies, and the taking of all necessary steps by the State to eliminate the traffic in narcotics.

16. Little Hoover Commission: Enactment of a bill for a little Hoover Commission, to be patterned after the Federal Hoover Commission, is recommended.

17. Permanent personal registration: It is urgent that legislation be enacted to provide for permanent personal registration throughout the State.

18. Refusal to waive immunity: We urge that the present laws which provide that a Government official or employee who refuses to testify in any proceeding on the ground that his testimony will incriminate him shall thereafter be barred from public employment, shall be extended to retired Government officials or employees, and that the pension rights of all such retired Government officials or employees shall terminate upon such refusal to testify.

19. Communism: We abhor communism in all its manifestations, and we urge that all steps be taken by the legislature necessary to root it out and expell it from our State. We are opposed to the employment of Communists in our National, State, or local Governments. The danger to our democratic way of life does not come only from abroad. There are some misguided citizens and resident aliens who call themselves Americans who have lent themselves and their energies to foreign doctrine and to foreign aggressors who seek to stamp out democracy in our country. We cannot afford to have an American Gottwald or an American Quisling, and we must take all steps that our Constitution permits to make sure that we do not have one. At the same time, we must apply traditional American methods in ferreting out and removing such persons. It is clear to us that the members, both open and concealed, of the American Communist Party are, in fact, the willing agents of a foreign government committed to interfere with and disrupt our domestic affairs. We must deal with them as such.

20. United Nations: We again support to the fullest extent the United Nations, and advocate strengthening it so that it may make and enforce wise judgments and keep the peace of the world. We endorse the flying on the public buildings of our States the United Nations flag, to the left of our own American flag, as a symbol of our Nation's support of the United Nations and its objectives. We urge that our teachers training colleges give courses qualifying their graduates to impart to their students in our public schools the principles of sound Americanism and of the United Nations Charter.

21. St. Lawrence seaway: Once again we endorse the program for a St. Lawrence seaway, and full development by New York State under public ownership of the waterpower facilities thereby provided. Too long has this important project been neglected. In connection therewith, we favor the preservation and development of the scenic beauty of Niagara Falls.

22. Public health: The inadequacies of our State public health system should be speedily removed, and new public hospitals throughout the State should be completed and constructed. The intolerable conditions in some of our State hospitals, whereby children are forced to sleep on the floor, should be corrected at once.

23. Public housing: Our program of public housing should be accelerated and projects brought to completion so that the existing shortage of homes can be remedied. Our goal should be to have provided homes for all veterans of World War II before the veterans of Korea come home.

24. Regents: The present method of electing regents of the University of the State of New York is unfair and should be changed. Those in charge of the educational system of the State should be selected on a nonpolitical basis, and with a view to giving representation to all sections of the State.

25. Securities dealers: It is ironical that although our laws provide that barbers, plumbers, lawyers, doctors, teachers, real estate brokers, and insurance brokers must take examinations and demonstrate their qualifications before they can commence their profession, no similar laws apply to persons handling other people's money as securities dealers and brokers. We do not believe that merely the possession of funds necessary to purchase a seat on the New York Stock Exchange or the New York Curb Exchange should qualify a person to engage in the securities business. We support the enactment of a State law providing for the licensing, by a system of examination, of all persons engaging in the securities business in this State.

26. Civilian defense: We support full appropriations for the development of a civilian defense system in this State.

27. Practice of electrolysis: To amend the general business law in relation to providing for the examination, licensing, and regulations of persons engaged in the practice of electrolysis.

Expenditure Control and Defense Legislation

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. ALEXANDER WILEY

OF WISCONSIN

IN THE SENATE OF THE UNITED STATES

Thursday, March 22 (legislative day of Friday, March 16), 1951

Mr. WILEY. Mr. President, I present a copy of a policy recommendation adopted by the national affairs committee of the Milwaukee Association of Commerce on February 8 on the subject of control of nonessential expenditures. I ask unanimous consent that the resolution, indicating, I believe, reactions which are shared by countless people of my State on the vital subject of conserving funds, be printed in the RECORD.

There being no objection, the recommendation was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

EXPENDITURE CONTROL AND DEFENSE LEGISLATION

Recommended a minimum reduction of $4,500,000,000 in the budget for fiscal 1952. In the light of present conditions this reduction can be effected without hampering the defense effort. Even with such a reduction, Federal civilian expenditures would still be $2,000,000,000 more than they were in 1945, and nearly $3,000,000,000 more than in 1946.

The President's new budget of $71,600,000,000 for fiscal 1952 leaves much to be desired if the Federal Government is to do a real belt-tightening job in nondefense spending. This is by far the largest peacetime budget that has ever been submitted to the American people. The previous all-time high of $44,000,000,000 was collected by the Federal Government in 1945. It will cost the taxpayers of Milwaukee County $587,919,000, and those of the State $1,489,155,000 as their share of the budget.

In his state of the Union message the President said, "The Government must practice rigid economy in nondefense activities. Many of the things we would normally do must be curtailed or postponed." A close look at this budget message, however, shows that 1952 expenditures will be higher than 1951 in almost every major spending item. The budget message proposes an enactment of virtually all of the Fair Deal legislative program. For many of these items the budget does not include expenditure estimates. He did, however, specifically add $290,000,000 in Federal aid to education and $35,000,000 for his proposed health-insurance program. In the time of sharply rising taxes these proposals seem remarkable, to say the least.

While some cuts have been made (totaling $3,800,000,000), they are somewhat misleading, since many of them are balanced by increases in nondefense spending under other headings such as health insurance and Federal aid to education.

In general, the budget appears to be extremely liberal toward nonmilitary expenditures which, in one way or another, can be tied in with defense. In the strictly nondefense areas some relative small cuts have been made, but by and large, the policy seems to be hold the line of 1951 expenditures in these areas rather than to make cuts in them.

The President expressed every intention of restoring, when possible, cuts he did make, and in many cases recommendations were made that these nondefense activities be greatly expanded when possible.

Senator HARRY F. BYRD (Democrat, Virginia), on December 22, 1950, in a letter to the President suggested reductions in nonessential spending totaling $7,600,000,000, based largely on estimated expenditures during the present fiscal year. When the President submitted his budget on January 15 for the next fiscal year ending June 30, 1952, recommending domestic civilian expenditures totaling more than $1,000,000,000 in excess of the estimates for this fiscal year, Senator BYRD revised his proposal to reduce nonessential Federal expenditures by $9,100,000,000 in comparison with the President's budget requests for next year.

Reductions in less essential spending will not only make it easier for the Nation to bear the enlarged burden of military preparation, but will also be a powerful force in the fight against inflation.

The Present Situation

HON. EDWARD MARTIN
OF PENNSYLVANIA
IN THE SENATE OF THE UNITED STATES
Thursday, March 22 (legislative day of Friday, March 16), 1951

Mr. MARTIN. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to have printed in the Appendix of the RECORD a very good letter on the present situation, written by the Honorable G. Albert Stewart, a most outstanding newspaperman.

There being no objection, the letter was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

CLEARFIELD, PA., March 20, 1951.
EDITOR, THE INQUIRER:

Monday's Inquirer tells us of an Easter program beamed to Eastern Europe by our multi-million-dollar propaganda outfit, the Voice, wherein Joe Stalin was likened to a cuckoo.

How nauseating to think that the voice of a great Christian nation could do no better than produce a cheap vaudevillian skit as a means of combating communism and portraying the American way of life.

How much better and more appropriate would it have been to beam the story of the risen Christ which communism seeks to put down but which millions of middle age and aged Russians surely remember and would like to hear again.

How much better to have beamed some glorious and soul-lifting Easter music which surely would have fallen on receptive ears no longer treated to anything but the militaristic music exalting statism.

How much better to have told of the millions of free Americans singing praises to God rather than to dictators and political philosophies, and of all the millions of free Americans who gathered in their chosen places of worship in accordance with the dictates of their own conscience.

Aside from the ridiculousness of such a broadcast our multi-million-dollar Voice is supposed to be staffed by experts in human relations, among them psychologists who should know that the surest way to encourage support of a man by his friends and associates is to ridicule him. These experts must know that Stalin has his friends in Eastern Europe, that there is a generous streak of nationalism in every man and that such silly ridicule is resented.

Many of us Americans are not admirers of our President, Mr. Truman. We cuss him aplenty. But all of us would resent ridicule and caricature of him by Russia or by the propaganda machine of any other nation, and, motivated by our nationalistic impulses, basic American unity and, yes, patriotism if you like, would rush to his support.

Finally, if Joe Stalin is what our President and our State Department says he is, his name should be referred to with disdain and he described as something unspeakable, not likened to a cuckoo or any other member of the feathered kingdom.

And, above all, our Voice should realize the seriousness of the job it has to do and not be playing around with such juvenilian ideas as skits in gay mood as reported by the United Press, especially on a day affording the finest opportunity to portray our joyous American way of life.

The Voice has given ample evidence of its unfitness on this and other occasions. Why do we continue to spend millions on such cuckoo business?

Ex-editor, Clearfield (Pa.) Progress.

Claims of Jewish People for Nazi Murder, Spoliation, and Robbery—Shall the Murderers Become the Heirs of Their Victims?

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. EMANUEL CELLER
OF NEW YORK
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES
Wednesday, March 21, 1951

Mr. CELLER. Mr. Speaker, under leave granted to extend my remarks in the RECORD, I include the following communication from the Ambassador of Israel to the Secretary of State on the question of Israel's claim against Germany:

The Ambassador of Israel presents his compliments to the honorable the Secretary of State and, under instructions from the Government of Israel, has the honor to submit the following communication on the question of Israel's claim against Germany.

2. In the note which the Ambassador of Israel had the honor to address to the Secretary of State on January 16, 1951, he stated that the Government of Israel reserved to itself the right to deal in a separate note with such claims in respect of Jewish losses for which Germany must be held accountable as did not fall within the scope of the existing laws providing for individual restitution and indemnification. It is proposed in the present note to state the basis and nature of these claims and submit proposals for their satisfaction.

3. The case of the Jewish people against Germany is without precedent. There is no record in history of such gigantic slaughter and rapine as that perpetrated by the German people against the Jews of Europe. In the course of a few years entire communities, whose history went back over a millennium, were wiped out by a process of systematic extermination. Over 6,000,000 Jews were done to death by torture, starvation, mass execution, and asphyxiation; many of them were burned and buried alive. Neither old nor young were spared. Children were torn from the arms of their mothers and flung into the furnaces. Old men and women were hunted down and sent to the death camps. In Poland and the occupied zone of Russia alone, over 4,000,000 Jews perished. From Germany itself and from every part of Europe which fell under German domination—from Norway, Denmark, Holland, Belgium, France, Italy, Greece, Bulgaria, Yugoslavia, Rumania, Hungary, Poland, Czechoslovakia, and Austria—trainloads of Jews were sent month after month to the extermination centers. Their destruction forms one of the most harrowing stories in the annals of the human race.

4. Murder was accompanied by robbery on a vast scale. According to conservative estimates,[1] Jewish property to the value of over $6,000,000,000 was seized by the Nazis in Germany and the other European countries that fell under their sway. This includes a collective fine of 1,000,000,000 marks imposed on the Jews in Germany in the wake of the Government-organized pogrom of November 1938, as well as other fines, seizures, and discriminatory taxes imposed by the Nazi authorities on German Jews in regard to which the Government of the German Federal Republic appears to have assumed a liability by acknowledging itself recently a successor power to the Third Reich.

5. This colossal campaign of genocide and spoliation represented the climax of a process of persecution which began on the day when the National-Socialist Government came into power. The judgment in the Nuremberg trial of German major war criminals described it as "a record of consistent and systematic inhumanity on the greatest scale." The following extracts from the judgment may serve to illustrate the progress of Jewish persecution from the establishment of the Nazi regime until the end of World War II:

"With the seizure of power, the persecution of the Jews was intensified. A series of discriminatory laws were passed, which limited the offices and professions permitted to Jews; and restrictions were placed on their family life and their rights of citizenship. By the autumn of 1938, the Nazi policy toward the Jews had reached the stage where it was directed toward the complete exclusion of Jews from German life. Pogroms were organized, which included the burning and demolishing of synagogues, the looting of Jewish businesses, and the arrest of prominent Jewish businessmen. A collective fine of 1,000,000,000 marks was imposed on the Jews, the seizure of Jewish assets was authorized, and the movement of Jews was restricted by regulations to certain specified districts and hours. The creation of ghettoes was carried out on an extensive scale, and by an order of the security police Jews were compelled to wear a yellow star to be worn on the breast and back. * * * The imposition of a fine of 1,000,000,000 marks was made, and the confiscation of the financial holdings of the Jews was decreed, at a time when German armament expenditure had put the German treasury in difficulties, and when the reduction of expenditure on armaments was being considered. * * *

"The Nazi persecution of Jews in Germany before the war, severe and repressive as it was, cannot compare, however, with the policy pursued during the war in the occupied territories. Originally the policy was similar to that which had been in force inside Germany. Jews were required to register, were forced to live in ghettoes, to wear the yellow star, and were used as slave laborers. In the summer of 1941, however, plans were made for the final solution of the Jewish question in all of Europe. The final solution meant the extermination of the Jews, which early in 1939 Hitler had threatened would be one of the consequences of an outbreak of war, and a special section in the Gestapo under Adolf Eichmann, as head of section B4 of the Gestapo, was formed to carry out the policy.

"The plan for exterminating the Jews was developed shortly after the attack on the Soviet Union. Einsatzgruppen of the security police and SD, formed for the purpose of breaking the resistance of the population of the areas lying behind the German armies in the East, were given the duty of exterminating the Jews in these areas. The effectiveness of the work of the Einsatzgruppen is shown by the fact that in February 1942, Heydrich was able to report that Estonia had already been cleared of Jews and that in Riga the number of Jews had been reduced from 29,500 to 2,500. Altogether the Einsatzgruppen operating in the occupied Baltic States killed over 135,000 Jews in 3 months. Nor did these special units operate completely independently of the German armed forces. There is clear evidence that leaders of the Einsatzgruppen obtained the cooperation of army commanders. * * *

"These atrocities were all part and parcel of the policy inaugurated in 1941. Part of the 'final solution' was the gathering of Jews from all German-occupied Europe in concentration camps. * * * All who were fit to work were used as slave laborers in the concentration camps; all who were not fit to work were destroyed in gas chambers and their bodies burned. Certain concentration camps such as Treblinka and Auschwitz were set aside for this main purpose. With regard to Auschwitz, the tribunal heard the evidence of Hoess, the commandant of the camp from May 1, 1940, to December 1, 1943. He estimated that in the camp of Auschwitz alone in that time 2,500,000 persons were exterminated, and that a further 500,000 died from disease and starvation. Hoess described the screening for extermination by stating in evidence:

"'Those who were fit for work were sent into the camp. Others were sent immediately to the extermination plants. Children of tender years were invariably exterminated. * * * Very frequently women would hide their children under their clothes, but of course when we found them we would send the children to be exterminated.'

"He described the actual killing by stating:

"'It took from 3 to 15 minutes to kill the people in the death chamber, depending upon climatic conditions. We knew when the people were dead because their screaming stopped. We usually waited about one-half hour before we opened the doors and removed the bodies. After the bodies were removed our special commandos took off the rings and extracted the gold from the teeth of the corpses.'

"Beating, starvation, torture, and killing were general. The inmates were subjected to cruel experiments at Dachau in August 1942, victims were immersed in cold water until their body temperatures were reduced to 28 degrees centigrade, when they died immediately. Other experiments included high-altitude experiments in pressure chambers, experiments to determine how long human beings could survive in freezing water, experiments with poison bullets, experiments with contagious diseases, and experiments dealing with sterilization of men and women by X-rays and other methods.

"Evidence was given of the treatment of the inmates before and after their extermination. There was testimony that the hair of women victims was cut off before they were killed, and shipped to Germany, there to be used in the manufacture of mattresses. The clothes, money and valuables of the inmates were also salvaged and sent to the appropriate agencies for disposition. After the extermination the gold teeth and fillings were taken from the heads of the corpses and sent to the Reichsbank.

"After cremation the ashes were used for fertilizer, and in some instances attempts were made to utilize the fat from the bodies of the victims in the commercial manufacture of soap. Special groups traveled through Europe to find Jews and subject them to the 'final solution.' German missions were sent to such satellite countries as Hungary and Bulgaria, to arrange for the shipment of Jews to extermination camps and it is known that by the end of 1944, 400,000 Jews from Hungary had been murdered at Auschwitz. Evidence has also been given of the evacuation of 110,000 Jews from part of Rumania for 'liquidation.' Adolph Eichmann, who had been put in charge of this program by Hitler, has estimated that the policy pursued resulted in the killing of 6,000,000 Jews, of which 4,000,000 were killed in the extermination institutions."

6. A crime of such vast and fearful dimensions cannot be expiated by any measure of material reparation. The Jewish people has lost a third of its numbers. The bulk of European Jewry has been annihilated; out of every four Jews in Europe three were killed. No indemnity, however large, can make good the loss of human life and cultural values or atone for the suffering and agonies of the men, women and children put to death by every inhuman device. As Frank, one of the principal defendants in the Nuremberg Trial, admitted: "A thousand years will pass and this guilt of Germany will still not be erased." All that can be done is to secure the indemnification of the heirs of the victims and the rehabilitation of the survivors. The Jews have been killed, but the German people continue to enjoy the fruits of the carnage and plunder perpetrated by their erstwhile leaders. In the Biblical phrase, they have "killed and also taken possession." The dead cannot be revived. Their torment cannot be undone. This much, however, can be demanded: that the German people be required to restore the stolen Jewish property and to pay for the rehabilitation of those who have survived.

7. In the absorption and rehabilitation of these survivors Israel has from the start played a major part. When the Nazi persecution began in Germany in the spring of 1933, the Jews of Palestine, as it then was, immediately came to the rescue. An ever increasing stream of German Jews—swollen after the rape of Austria and Czechoslovakia by Jews from these countries—found its way to Palestine. During the period between the establishment of the Nazi regime in Germany and the outbreak of the Second World War, over 75,000 refugees from the Nazi-controlled countries of Central Europe settled in Palestine. Even during the war years, despite the limitations imposed, Jewish immigration from Europe never ceased. Tireless efforts were made to bring out Jews from the countries threatened or engulfed by the Nazi invasion. When the war ended, the Jews of Palestine risked their all to bring to safety those who had survived the great slaughter. When in the end the State of Israel was established, its first step was to open its gates to the Jewish Displaced Persons from the areas of the former concentration camps. Between the years 1939 and 1950, nearly 380,000 Jews were brought over in this way from the Nazi-conquered territories. If to these are added the Jews who immigrated from Central Europe during the prewar years of the Nazi persecution, the total amounts to over 450,000.

8. Most of the newcomers brought with them little more than their weakened bodies. Their belongings had long been taken from them. Many of them were hard-core cases, men and women whose health was broken beyond repair, and whom no country but Israel was prepared to accept. Unlike other immigration countries where new arrivals can easily be absorbed into a fully developed economic system, Israel has had to make special efforts by large-scale allocation of public funds for investment and maintenance to create openings for the newcomers. The whole economic regime of the new state was from its first hour made to serve this overriding task. Though substantial financial support has come from Jews abroad, the bulk of the expenditure involved in the reception and rehabilitation of the immigrants has been borne by the people of Israel. Heavy taxation and a strict regime of economic austerity have had to be imposed and have been willingly accepted by the people of the country in order to provide homes and a livelihood for these immigrants. It is surely no exaggerated claim to demand that the German people, who were responsible for all this misery and who continue in possession of the economic assets taken from the Jews, dead and alive, should be required to make reparation for the benefit of the survivors.

9. When the victorious Allies at the end of the war allocated the reparations due from Germany, the Jewish people had as yet no locus standi in the community of sovereign nations. As a result, its claims, though morally perhaps stronger than those of any other people that had suffered at the hands of the Nazis, went by default. The time has come to rectify this omission. Israel is the only state which can speak on behalf of the Jewish people—the people, membership of which was the cause of the death of the 6,000,000. Israel has been built up for the specific purpose of providing a refuge for all persecuted and homeless Jews. That responsibility has throughout been conceived in active terms; in the war against Nazi Germany, Israel's sons and daughters fought in national formations among the Allied forces. A Jewish brigade group took part in the final overthrow of the enemy and played an active role in the rescue and relief of Jewish survivors in various parts of Europe. The recognition by the United Nations of the right of the Jewish people to the reestablishment of its commonwealth was seen as an act of reparation for the wrongs endured by them throughout history, culminating in the Nazi campaign of extermination. Having thus arisen, Israel has made itself responsible for the absorption and rehabilitation of the survivors of that catastrophe. For all these reasons, the state of Israel regards itself as entitled to claim reparations from Germany by way of indemnity to the Jewish people.

10. The amount to be claimed must be related, on the one hand, to the losses suffered by the Jewish people at the hands of the Germans, and on the other, to the financial cost involved in the rehabilitation in Israel of those who escaped or survived the Nazi regime. The Government of Israel is not in a position to procure and submit full data of the Jewish property confiscated and plundered by the Germans, which, as previously stated, is authoritatively estimated to aggregate over $6,000,000,000. It can base its claim only on the expenditure incurred and anticipated in connection with the resettlement of the Jewish immigrants from the countries formerly under Nazi control. Their number is estimated at about 500,000 which would involve an over-all expenditure of $1,500,000,000. This figure corresponds approximately to the value of exports from Western Germany alone in 1950, which, in view of Germany's economic recovery, is likely to increase considerably during 1951. If spread over a period of years and transferred partly in the form of goods, a reparation payment of this total would not be beyond the capacity of the German people. No settlement of German reparations can be regarded as equitable on moral or legal grounds which would not meet this minimum claim on behalf of the major sufferers of the Nazi regime. Nor can there be any approach to the rehabilitation of Germany among the community of nations until this basic measure of reparation has been effected.

11. The Government of Israel trusts that the Government of the United States will accept the justice of its claim. It would urgently request that the occupying powers should not hand over full powers to any German government without express reservations having been made for the payment of reparations to Israel. It would welcome an early expression of the views of the Government of the United States concerning the practical steps which might most effectively be taken toward implementing the proposals outlined in this note.

Resolution Adopted by the American Legion of Freemont, Ohio

OF

HON. ALVIN F. WEICHEL

OF OHIO

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Thursday, March 22, 1951

Mr. WEICHEL. Mr. Speaker, I include a resolution adopted by unanimous vote of the American Legion, of Freemont, Ohio, and request that the House

Committee on Ways and Means consider the matter:

RESOLUTION

Whereas it was the custom during World War II that members of the Armed Forces should not have to pay income tax on service pay because of the sacrifices they were making for the good of their country; and

Whereas the members of our Armed Forces are now paying the regular income tax on their income received as members of the Armed Forces; and

Resolved, That all regulations governing the collection of withholding tax and income tax on service pay from members of our Armed Forces be rescinded until such time as the present emergency is declared officially at an end; and be it further

Resolved, That, effective January 1, 1951, all withholding tax on service pay be returned to the members of our Armed Forces who have paid same; and be it further

Resolved, That copies of this resolution be sent to the Honorable Representatives of Ohio, to the commander of the fifth district, the American Legion of Ohio, and to the commander of the American Legion of Ohio for action by their respective committees to put this into effect.

What Do They Teach at Roosevelt College?

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. HAROLD H. VELDE
OF ILLINOIS
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES
Thursday, March 22, 1951

Mr. VELDE. Mr. Speaker, under leave granted to extend my remarks in the RECORD, I include the following editorial from the Peoria Star of March 17, 1951:

WHAT DO THEY TEACH AT ROOSEVELT COLLEGE?

Hearings on the Broyles-Young antisubversive bill continued this week in the State senate. It was a similar bill which brought rioting Communist students to Springfield 3 years ago from Roosevelt College and the University of Chicago.

One of the witnesses appearing to testify against the bill Wednesday was a student of Roosevelt College of Chicago. Her name was Mrs. Violet Finney. She testified that it was her belief that the Broyles-Young bill constituted an infringement upon personal freedom.

"What rights are you denied in the bill?" asked Senator Clyde Trager, of Peoria.

"The right to belong to a subversive organization," replied Mrs. Finney. (She was forthright to say the least.)

"Do you want to belong to a subversive organization?" asked Senator Trager.

"No," answered Mrs. Finney, "but I do not like to be denied the right."

If the witness had carefully read the Broyles-Young bill—and we doubt if she had—she would have found that it contained the following definition of "subversive organization."

"Subversive organization means any organization which engages in or advocates, abets, advises, or teaches, or a purpose of which is to engage in or advocate, abet, advise, or teach activities intended to overthrow, destroy, or alter, or to assist in the overthrow, destruction, or alteration of, the constitutional form of government of the United States, or of the State of Illinois, or of any political subdivision of either of them, by revolution, force, violence, or other unlawful means."

Subversion, as defined in the Broyles-Young bill, is already a felony and will continue to be so whether this bill becomes a law or not. Purpose of the Broyles-Young bill is to give the State of Illinois a better legal weapon to deal with persons who are engaged in subversive activities.

What the Roosevelt College student confessed was that she wanted the privilege of joining others in unlawful means of attempting to overthrow the constitutional Government of the United States. She might as well have said that she did not want to commit murder, but she did not like to be denied the right to do it; or that she had no intention of robbing a bank, but that she didn't like the Government to tell her that she couldn't do so if she chose.

Roosevelt College is only a name to us. We have no reason to believe that Mrs. Finney's thoughts reflect those of the faculty or the student body. But the student riot of 1949 and this testimony of a student raises the question, What influence at Roosevelt College fosters or permits such irresponsible action and such distorted thinking among some of the students?

Mr. Speaker, we believe the House Committee on Un-American Activities has been asked to look into some midwestern universities for evidence of subversive teaching. Perhaps the House committee could learn what they teach at Roosevelt College.

A Tale of Two Valleys

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. HAROLD C. HAGEN
OF MINNESOTA
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES
Thursday, March 22, 1951

Mr. HAGEN. Mr. Speaker, it is so easy to find articles about what is wrong with America and to hear constant criticism of all phases of our national life, that it is refreshing to read a report which calls attention to Americanism and what it really is. I am proud to call attention to a book written by a former Member of this House, the Honorable Conrad G. Selvig, who represented a district in the great State of Minnesota. Mr. Selvig is now enjoying a well earned rest and has taken advantage of the time to put into a book his thoughts on good old-fashioned Americanism.

I would like to insert into the RECORD a review of the book taken from the Los Angeles Mirror, a review which is also a stirring tribute to our former colleague. The review was reprinted by the Crookston (Minn.) Daily Times. It follows:

SELVIG'S BOOK BRINGS TRIBUTE

From far-off California comes a stirring tribute to Conrad G. Selvig and incidentally our Red River Valley with which Mr. Selvig had so much to do in developing.

The tribute is a clipping from the Los Angeles Mirror and mailed to the Times office by Harry J. Crompe, a former Crookston man and himself a valley booster.

In the Mirror's Florabel Muir Reporting column the columnist reviews Mr. Selvig's book, a Tale of Two Valleys, which she uses as the basis for an editorial on the American way of life.

But read the Los Angeles paper's comments in full:

"Perhaps at this time a small sermon setting forth the solidity and strength of good old-fashioned Americanism may be in order.

"I found this sermon in a plain, unadorned book, the autobiography of Conrad G. Selvig, once a Congressman from Minnesota, now rounding out a full and useful life in Santa Monica.

"He shows how the real wealth of our great country is created and developed. He shows what makes us great—and it isn't Wall Street manipulations, stock issues, skinny undressed chits in magazine ads, Hollywood starlets, or television.

"Before Selvig went to Congress he was head of the Minnesota Agricultural College at Northwest Station, Crookston, Minn.

"In 1924, experimenting, they planted a 28-acre field to sweet clover, intending to pasture 32 cows on it. They figured they would require about one acre per head.

"The clover kept growing and they kept cutting down the proportion. By midsummer they had cut the pasturage for those 32 cattle down to 7 acres and had fenced off the remaining 21 for a hay crop.

"Does that sound like small potatoes? I say that what Selvig accomplished, multiplied 10,000-fold and more through the Nation, represents the basis impregnable potency of America.

"Selvig saw the Minnesota farmers taking the short end, due largely to slipshod and unfair farm marketing methods. He got himself elected to Congress and battled like a steer at bay to right those wrongs.

"Today we all know about the farm bloc. Nobody gets far fighting it. In fact the farmers is the Nation's legislative pet, too much pampered.

"I like Selvig's book, the plain record of a plain American, the son of Norwegian immigrant parents. Under our American Republic he won distinction, gave sons and daughters to the Nation in war. Now in his seventies, he has earned the boon of a rich contentment.

"Don't look for literary brilliance in A Tale of Two Valleys. It's a simple narrative as earthy as Gray's Elegy, not too far removed from that classic in theme—the conquest of the 'stubborn glebe.'

"But if our America is great today and is to be greater tomorrow, we can thank the plodders like Conrad Selvig who learned early that there is richer wealth both for the spirit and for the pocketbook in a clod of fertile black soil than in a shining nugget of gold."

The President's Holiday

OF
HON. JOHN D. DINGELL
OF MICHIGAN
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES
Thursday, March 22, 1951

Mr. DINGELL. Mr. Speaker, the attached editorial, appearing in the Detroit News of March 12, 1951, might well be interpreted as a gentle but well-deserved rebuke to the sadists and perverted partisans and some well-intentioned but grossly ignorant critics who just cannot understand the tremendous problems of state which rest upon our American Presidents generally, and upon those who, like Presidents Roosevelt and Truman, have been called upon to carry an emergency load during a most critical time in our national existence. Ignorance even in this enlightened day, although it is inexcusable, can be forgiven. But a line must be drawn somewhere and men must be held responsible for their slanderous abuse of a man simply because he is the President of the United States and therefore considered a fair political target for anyone in disagreement with his policies or who belongs to the opposition party.

HE NEEDS A REST

The President's first Key West holiday in a year invites the usual criticism that he has ducked out in a time of crisis. Yet, if one reads the current Saturday Evening Post series on how he puts in his Washington day, the wonder is that he or any President can stand up with so little relief.

From 5:30 a. m. until 8 at night, Mr. Truman's time is as rigidly scheduled as that of a limited train. In the working day he must regularly meet aides and advisers, the Cabinet, the press, carry on a voluminous correspondence, and sit through 100 15-minute appointments a week with visitors.

From 8 p. m. until an early bedtime he is busy drawing up memoranda, making notes on working papers, often consulting with others on public statements.

No doubt many readers of the Post articles, like ourselves, are appalled anew at the lack in such a program of any time for that reflection out of which great decisions could be expected to issue.

Hardly an hour in the 24 is Mr. Truman's own. Nor can he delegate any considerable part of his burden to others. He has tried this, and the performances of these aids and confidants constitute some of the sorrier episodes in his administration.

Other Presidents in other times have supported the burden, but it was a different burden. In Coolidge's day, for example, the country scarcely owned a foreign policy as we now understand it. The Executive could consider a course for months, where in the present day of multiple agencies he must improvise policy, often in a matter of days, and make or subscribe to decisions out of hand.

Woodrow Wilson brought to the White House the fruit of years of study of government, and many convictions born of long ruminating on its principles and practices.

As preparation for the same post, Mr. Truman brought little of this; only courage, intelligence rather than intellectual capacity, and endurance. These and such counsel as he feels he can rely on have seen him through an ordeal which few Americans could have survived.

We believe he needs more, not fewer holidays, if his own and the country's welfare are to be at all considered.

Europe Cuts Its National Debt

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. WALTER NORBLAD
OF OREGON
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES
Thursday, March 22, 1951

Mr. NORBLAD. Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my remarks, I include herewith an editorial by Walter W. R. May in the Oregon City (Oreg.) Enterprise-Courier:

EUROPE CUTS ITS NATIONAL DEBT

The European nations which have been receiving Marshall-plan aid from the United States have cut their national debts a total of $1,202,000,000, while the United States national debt has steadily gone up to $255,902,000,000 in 19 years, with only one reduction, a $6,000,000,000 cut made by the Republican Eightieth Congress the President so shamefully misrepresented in the 1948 campaign.

From the Economic Cooperation Agency which dispenses Marshall-plan aid provided by the United States taxpayers, we learn the following European nations have reduced their debts as follows:

Norway, $73,500,000; Denmark, $88,300,000; Austria, $85,000,000; France, $171,400,000; and Great Britain, $784,100,000.

This all adds up to $1,202,300,000 with no good signs that the United States will do anything but increase its debt.

Can the Communists Conquer Religion?—Beran, Powerless in Banishment, Has Greater Influence on the Minds of Men Than Powerful Stalin in the Kremlin

OF
HON. CHARLES J. KERSTEN
OF WISCONSIN
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES
Thursday, March 22, 1951

Mr. KERSTEN of Wisconsin. Mr. Speaker, someday Stalin may realize that he cannot conquer God. Archbishop Beran, prior to his persecution by Stalin, was little known outside of his native Czechoslovakia. Now he has become a world figure. So also, have the Protestant and Jewish representatives of religion who have been martyrs to Stalin.

Before his persecution, Archbishop Beran, as the duly constituted moral authority of the Catholic Church in Czechoslovakia, was an inspiration to the people of his diocese. Now, after his persecution by the Communists, stripped of all power to exercise control of the religious affairs of his diocese and banished from his native land, Archbishop Beran is an even greater inspiration to his fellow countrymen in Czechoslovakia. Not only that but Archbishop Beran's influence has so grown that he is now an inspiration to people all over the world. What chagrin this must cause the master plotters of the Kremlin.

I include here an excellent editorial in tribute to Archbishop Beran which appeared in the Washington Evening Star of March 13, 1951:

MOSCOW VERSUS ROME

In waging war on the Vatican the puppet Communist regime of Czechoslovakia apparently is trying to be less crude and more cautious than its counterpart in Hungary. At any rate, the indications are that Archbishop Beran, the Roman Catholic primate of the country, is not going to be tried and imprisoned on trumped-up charges of treason, as in the case of Cardinal Mindszenty. Instead, it seems that he is merely to be banished from Prague—and fined—for taking a negative attitude toward the church laws that the Kremlin's stooges have decreed to make clear to the devout that Stalin is next to godliness and that one had better pay attention to him, not to the Pope, on matters of faith and morals.

Archbishop Beran's offense, of course, is that he has refused to sell his soul to the Communists and let them profane and defile his church by making it a tool of the atheistic Kremlin. He has sought to keep them from interfering with the worship of God and from contaminating the hallowed precincts of religion with their peculiarly unholy brand of irreligion. So they have "banished" him and named in his place a "patriotic and democratic" parish priest who seems willing to play their game—an obscure Catholic clergyman who presumably can be counted upon not to upset efforts to undermine the Vatican in Czechoslovakia for the greater honor and glory of the Soviet Union.

Thus the war between Moscow and Rome goes on, with Moscow resorting to any and every means to destroy the one thing that must be obliterated if totalitarian materialism is to survive and if the Kremlin is to win mastery of the world. That one thing is man's belief in God—the religious force of the ages, the spirit that exalts the individual over the state, the spark and fire of faith in the proposition that people do not begin or end here but are creatures with immortal souls and with a high eternal destiny that is governed not by bipeds like Stalin but by an all-wise, all-just, all-powerful, all-infinite Supreme Being beyond the comprehension of our finite minds. The Soviet Communists cannot live with such a doctrine, and hence the effort to wipe it out.

Archbishop Beran—like Cardinal Mindszenty, and like a number of Protestant and Jewish leaders as well—has come to grief behind the iron curtain not because of himself but because he represents in his person a faith that is absolutely irreconcilable with, and repugnant to, what the Soviet tryanny stands for. The war on the Vatican, the war on religion in general, is an inevitable and basic part of the Soviet war on the free world. For man, as long as he believes in God, cannot be conquered or enslaved by the godless. The battle has just begun, and the Kremlin—which is waging it cautiously in Czechoslovakia because Catholicism is predominant there—is as doomed to failure in it as was Lucifer when he stormed the gates of heaven against Michael the Archangel.

Reminiscences by Hon. James P. Kem, of Missouri

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. THOMAS C. HENNINGS, JR.
OF MISSOURI
IN THE SENATE OF THE UNITED STATES
Thursday, March 22 (legislative day of Friday, March 16), 1951

Mr. HENNINGS. Mr. President, the University of Missouri Alumni Association of Washington, at its monthly meeting at the Congressional Hotel March 16, had as its principal speaker a worthy and distinguished alumnus of our great university, the senior Senator from Missouri [Mr. KEM]. The junior Senator from Missouri was privileged to introduce his colleague to the alumni.

The Honorable John T. Barker, a former attorney general of the State of Missouri, and now a special assistant to the Attorney General of the United States, presided at the meeting. Senator KEM'S interesting reminiscences of his student days, and his fine tribute to the university, were so eloquently presented that I ask unanimous consent to have this fine address printed in the Appendix of the RECORD.

There being no objection, the address was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

On the opening day of the present session of the Congress my distinguished colleague told me that we had this in common: his mother went to school to my mother. And since that time I have discovered that we have many other things in common. Now that we have got our hands on Tom Hennings, I think we should proceed to initiate him. I would like to have the privilege of proposing him as an honorary member of the University of Missouri Alumni Association of Washington.

When I first went to the university, the able and genial president of our society was the speaker of the house of representatives of the general assembly. In my freshman year, the Federal Government turned over to the State of Missouri a considerable sum of money in settlement of certain Civil War claims. The university asked that this money be appropriated to build a memorial library. It was suggested to the students that they see their representatives in the legislature (of course, no one here understands what it means to approach a legislator for anything he wants)—and so I went to see John Barker as the representative from my home county of Macon. He treated me with great consideration—with the courtesy that I now know is instinctive and characteristic. He heard my story out although he had probably heard the story 25 times before. A friendship was begun that has been the source of pleasure and satisfaction to me in the many years that have followed.

When I entered the university in 1906, the white campus existed only on the drawing boards. When we spoke of the campus, we meant the quadrangle set off by its fabulous jewel, the columns of ever-cherished memory. The old brick buildings may not be exactly cathedrals of learning, but as James Russell Lowell said, "They have many crevices for the tentacles of affection." It was a small college but there were those who loved it.

When I first went to the university, Richard Henry Jesse was the president. We called him "Uncle Dick" with no little affection. Soon he was succeeded as president by Dr. A. Ross Hill. Dr. Hill was an able and accomplished administrator. I always liked him—while he was president and after he became a resident of Kansas City, where I came to know him quite well.

Along about 1908, the school of journalism as founded by Walter Williams. The late Charlie Ross—familiarly known as "Doodles" Ross—was a leading member of the faculty of the school of journalism. He remained genial and delightful to the end.

There was Dr. Max Meyer, German-born professor of psychology, who was slanderously described as a man who could tell you what everybody knew in language that nobody could understand.

There was Dr. Isadore Loeb, whom the university funny paper, the Oven, insisted on referring to as "Was-a-Dore" after he ceased to be a member of the athletic committee, showing the extent to which his stock had fallen in undergraduate opinion.

In football the Tigers suffered a long and dispiriting series of defeats at the hands of Kansas. Then came the fall of 1909 when William W. Roper, who had been a star at Princeton and was a practicing lawyer in Philadelphia, came as head football coach. From the day of his arrival there was a new spirit on Rollins Field, and he gave us a glorious victory over Kansas.

At the first mass meeting Roper attended he was introduced as "Big Bill." He said he didn't mind being called "Big Bill" in Missouri, but as a practicing lawyer in Philadelphia he didn't like it very much. Being called "Big Bill" Roper didn't help his budding law practice one bit. I would like to talk about other faculty members whose names crowd into my mind for recognition.

It is often said that at college we learn more from our fellow students than from members of the faculty.

One of the first organizations that I joined when I reached the university was the Athenaean Debating Society. The presiding genius in those days was Mac Anderson—B. M. Anderson, Jr. The brilliance of his mind and his amazing accumulation of accurate information made a lasting impression on all who knew him. He became one of the leading economists of the United States. For years he was the head economist for the Chase National Bank in New York and the editor of their bulletin. Afterward he was professor of economics at the University of California at Los Angeles.

Merrill Otis, who was to be a distinguished Federal Judge at Kansas City, was in his heyday. What a grand person he was—truly one of nature's noblemen. How he used to thrill us at the mass meetings with his sonorous voice and rounded periods. Not infrequently a student speaker was heckled by someone calling out "louder and funnier." But never Merrill Otis. He held us speechless. There was one exception to the usual order that I remember well. At one of the mass meetings some prominent speaker failed to appear on time. The chairman of the meeting (it was either Ozark Wright or Raymond Lee) scribbled a little note to Otis asking him to come up to the rostrum to speak until the VIP arrived. Merrill started out by saying "I have just received a message asking me to come up and say something funny." Someone in the back of the auditorium called out: "You'll tell us when you say it, won't you?" To which Merrill gave an instant reply—"I'll tell you, the rest will know."

The year I entered as a freshman, Forrest Donnell left the university in a blaze of glory. He had graduated at the head of his class both in the college and the law school. Forrest with his passion for the truth and nothing but the truth has always insisted he didn't know me at the university. But I knew him. When I came to Washington our unilateral friendship became mutual. I love him dearly.

Then there was Lee Miller who had the unusual distinction of being captain of the football team 2 years in succession. Big, generous, and awkward—we always called him, "Cow." After he found a sweetheart at the Kappa House, he didn't like the name cow. He became a leading surgeon in Kansas City until his untimely death a few years ago.

The pioneers who founded the university in 1839 were a strong and self reliant breed. The chief among them, James S. Rollins, had ridden his horse back and forth from central Missouri to Kentucky to get a college education. His grandson and namesake, James Sidney Rollins, whom most of us know as "Sid" is now a prominent lawyer in Columbia. Back in the days when Frederick D. Gardner was Governor of Missouri the governor came to Columbia to deliver an address. Sid, who had just launched himself in the practice of law at the Columbia bar, was the presiding officer at the meeting. He started out by paying a glowing tribute to the governor and then wound up with this peroration: "My friends, I have the honor and privilege to present to you Missouri's great Gardner, the honorable Frederick D. Governor."

In the days when the university came into being, people put their faith in education. The famous Northwest Ordinance of 1787 had declared: "Religion, morality, and knowledge, being necessary to good government and the happiness of mankind, schools and the means of education shall forever be encouraged." From the very first settlement in Missouri, schools, colleges, and universities have been the subject of public largess and private benefaction. The people were tremendously interested in the public school system, of which the university was the crowning apex. In their dreams it was to be more than its finest flower—it was to be the nourishing mother. I think the founders of the university must have had in mind certain definite purposes and objectives.

I am sure the founders of the University of Missouri had very keenly in mind that Americans were then and meant to continue to be, for all time to come, a self-governing people. They established an institution of higher learning in order to help make self government work. James S. Rollins and those of his generation were sons of fathers who had marched and suffered and triumphed with Washington and Lafayette. The Revolution was close to their generation in point of time—it was even closer in their thinking. To them independence had a very real meaning. It was something that had been bought and paid for by blood and tears. With independence the problem of self government became urgent. They and Americans of their generation realized that in order to make this experiment in self government a success, there must be developed an enlightened citizenship with the knowledge and the will to carry on. They pledged their faith to education as the best means to this cherished end.

In the second place, I think the founders of the university were very much interested in creating in the State a spirit of national unity. The State of Missouri came into the Union as a result of the Missouri Compromise of 1820. A deep cleavage existed between the North and the South. The first settlers of Missouri came up the great rivers from Virginia and Kentucky. They settled in the rich alluvial lands along the Missouri and Mississippi. Many of them brought with them their "peculiar institution." But there were other important streams of immigration. People from Ohio, Indiana, and Illinois settled in counties of the northwestern part of the State. And then into the Ozark country came a steady stream from the hill country of western North Carolina and east Tennessee, who knew nothing about the institution of slavery, and cared nothing, except to despise it.

The third task which the founders imposed upon the university was what we call Americanization.

"God sifted the whole world that He might send choice grain over to the wilderness." Before the Louisiana purchase the French came into Missouri—Ste. Genevieve was the first settlement by white men west of the Mississippi. In 1803, at the time of the Louisiana purchase, St. Louis was the largest town in what was then the West. In the decade following the founding of the university the Germans came in large numbers, and continued to do so for several decades thereafter. Then the Irish, the Scotch, the Welsh, and others in smaller numbers added a leaven to the melting pot.

No other people absorbed more racial stocks so rapidly and completely. This was the job of the public-school system from the university down. In the classrooms the sons and daughters of every racial stock were subjected to the same educational processes and the same disciplines.

The roster of foreign names on our football teams shows what I mean. Who can doubt that the cause of unity is served when it is Glorioso, Fuchs, Marusic, Christman, Orf, Keller, Ackermann, Klein, Ghnouly, Cone, Kadlec, Carras, Stuber, that the cheering stands applaud.

Our early Missourians knew a lot about authoritarian governments. Across the seas in the old countries their close ancestors, and in many cases they themselves, had lived under such government. They knew about it—and they didn't like it.

They knew nothing of the modern form of totalitarianism, socialism, or communism. In 1839, when the university was founded, Karl Marx had not yet met Frederick Engels, so Marx had not yet become a Socialist.

The early Missourians were devoted to the idea of maintaining Missouri as part and parcel of a great liberal republic. They wanted none of either monarchy or collectivism. They were individualists to the core. They believed that individuality was the aim of political liberty. They wished to leave to the citizen as much freedom of action as was consistent with order and the rights of others. The ideal was that so far as possible the citizen should be left to pursue his means of happiness in his way and according to his own lights. In the best sense the University of Missouri has always been a center of liberalism. Harlow Shapley and Thorstein Veblen came, but they also went. They never set the pattern. The founders believed that work and thrift would bring a just reward. They believed in free enterprise to the soul of their beings.

The State of Missouri was a bud just opening its petals. It offered a field of fruitful activity for millions of busy bees.

To make the most of this great opportunity the State needed individuals trained to be specialists. It needed trained agriculturists, trained teachers, lawyers, doctors, civil, electrical, mechanical, chemical, and mining engineers to develop and to conserve its resources. With the exception of the field of medicine (where the failure can perhaps be explained), the university has fulfilled this function in an abundant measure. It has given the State a steady stream of specialists adequately trained for their respective tasks. As an example, four out of the seven judges presently sitting on the highest court of our State are University of Missouri men. For over a century the University of Missouri has served and strengthened the Commonwealth. It has made a substantial contribution toward providing a citizenry as enlightened as any on earth. It has justified and vindicated the faith of its founders. It has met the challenge.

And what about the future? We can have every assurance that the university will meet the changing problems of our time. An optimist in the atomic age has been defined as one who believes the future is uncertain. The typical Missourian of 1839 had no qualms about the future. He knew what he wanted, and he had an unabashed confidence in his ability to get it. He didn't know about sanitary plumbing, or airplanes, or motorcars, or nylon stockings, but he believed Missouri was the center of the bread basket of the world. He thought it was the best place in all the world to live and have his being.

Shall we of this generation be of little faith? Shall we worry too much about whether we shall reinforce nationalism or inspire internationalism?

Our answer is: Let us carry on in the faith of our fathers. Let us take comfort in the old Scotch ballad:

"I am hurt, Sir Barton said.
I am hurt, but I am not slain,
I'll lie me down and bleed awhile
And then I'll fight again."

America and the Atomic Age

OF
HON. WILLIAM BENTON
OF CONNECTICUT

IN THE SENATE OF THE UNITED STATES

Thursday, March 22 (legislative day of Friday, March 16), 1951

Mr. BENTON. Mr. President, on the twentieth anniversary of Chicago Round Table, a special pamphlet was published consisting of selections from round-table discussions in which Mr. Hutchins has participated. Chancellor Robert M. Hutchins, after 21 years at the university, has recently resigned to become associate director of the Ford Foundation.

I concede I speak with some prejudice, out of my friendship with Chancellor Hutchins which dates back to our days as Yale classmates, and out of my association with the University of Chicago, first as a part-time vice president and now as a trustee.

Increasingly, with each passing year, there are fewer and fewer to deny that Chancellor Hutchins has been the leading voice in the field of higher education in this country. But his influence is far wider than merely that of an educator. Only this week, growing out of the Kefauver hearings in New York, I recalled to the Senator from New Hampshire [Mr. TOBEY] Chancellor Hutchins' speeches over the last two decades about the great issues of our times, in which he has repeatedly called for a moral, spiritual, and intellectual revolution. Dr. Hutchins' talent for leadership, as well as his great insight into the crucial issues facing the peoples of the world, are again pointed up by these selections from extemporaneous broadcasts in which he has participated. I ask the readers of these selections to note particularly the dates of the broadcasts.

Mr. President, this opportunity to insert these selections into the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD provides me with the chance to tell my colleagues of the Senate that in my judgment the Ford Foundation promises to be the greatest private undertaking of all time. The reason why this is true is not merely because of the fabulous potential extent of its philanthropic gifts, which can be anticipated over the next decade, but more particularly because of the talented and inspired leadership which can be expected from Mr. Paul G. Hoffman, the Ford Foundation's director, and from Chancellor Hutchins and Mr. Chester Davis, his two associate directors.

I am informed by the Public Printer that the manuscript will make six and one-half pages in the RECORD, at a cost of $533. However, there is no more important subject engaging our attention than that covered by the discussions reproduced in the pamphlet, and that is why I feel warranted in asking unanimous consent that this remarkable group of selections be printed in the Appendix.

There being no objection, the selections were ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

AMERICA AND THE ATOMIC AGE

THE CRISIS OF OUR TIME

(Broadcast December 24, 1944, with William E. Hocking, professor of philosophy, Harvard University; Reinhold Niebuhr, professor of Christian ethics, Union Theological Seminary; Robert Redfield, professor of anthropology, University of Chicago; Robert M. Hutchins)

Statement by Mr. Hutchins

A theologian, a philosopher, and a scientist have shown that the crisis of our time is a moral crisis. They have shown that, unless we can surmount this crisis, such civilization as we have will fall apart, for civilization is a moral fabric. They have shown that the defeat of our enemies in this war, though it may be an indispensable means to the preservation of our civilization, in no sense guarantees its preservation. Peace without good will cannot be durable, because it cannot be just. And technology is not a substitute for justice. Our machines seem, in fact, on the point of wiping us off the face of the earth. They are, moreover, so expensive that we cannot afford to let them stand idle. We must fight for the oil to feed them. We must die that our machines may live. So a distinguished educator said before Pearl Harbor that we should have to go to war with Japan to get rubber for our tires.

The speakers who have preceded me on this program have emphasized that the underlying problem is one of ends, goals, and ideals. With the tremendous resources which science has placed in our hands we should be able to reach almost any conceivable human goal. But if we have the wrong ideals, or if we fail to live up to good ones, the great scientific accomplishments of modern man will end in suicide.

The testimony of the educator is the same as that of the theologian, the philosopher, and the scientist. The educational system of a country is a reflection of what the country thinks it wants. What is honored in a country will be cultivated there. If we look at the educational system of the United States, we get the same impression we got from the speeches in the last campaign—what the American people want is not peace and good will, but peace and a good job. The ideal of the full dinner pail and a chicken in every pot and two cars in every garage has been attenuated to the mere possession of a job, any kind of job that will sustain life. It is not surprising, therefore, that although it has never been possible to obtain Federal appropriations for education for citizenship, a representative of the United States Office of Education has lately advocated a Federal appropriation of $300,000,000 for vocational training. It is not surprising that every suggestion affecting our youth is considered in terms of the labor market. It has been proposed in high quarters that men ought to be kept in the Army if jobs cannot be found for them after the war. One of the current arguments for universal military training is that it would give at least a million young men a year something to do.

Now certainly there is no use talking about the aims of life to those who are starving to death. Mass unemployment is a menace to any society. But are we to work merely to exist? Is a job a good thing just because it is a job, no matter how trivial and degrading the occupation? Jobs are means, not ends; and our problem is: What are we working for and what are we living for? If the answer is that we are living merely to live, the whole process loses its meaning. We are in search of values, and there are no values here.

Insofar as we have a definite goal, then, it appears to be a goal of success interpreted in material terms. Though material goods are goods, there are other goods beyond them; for in the order of goods, materials goods do not stand high. The passionate pursuit of material goods disrupts human relations—as when a prominent labor leader was asked whether, now that China was our ally, we should not repeal the Chinese Exclusion Act, and he replied, "A Chinaman is still a Chinaman."

The passionate pursuit of material goods disrupts the common good, for our Government is now the sport of pressure groups—each seeking its material advantage. The passionate pursuit of material goods impairs the hope of world organization and necessarily substitutes security for good will. For each country, even if it does not want territory for itself, must grab territory in order to keep other nations from grabbing it.

America is the strongest and richest Nation on earth. Since we are not under the material pressure to which other nations are subject, since we are not in danger of starvation or invasion, we have no excuse for failing to offer the world what it needs most—moral leadership and a moral example. For the sake of suffering humanity everywhere the people of this country must rediscover the ends of human life and of organized society; they must base their own lives and their own society upon these foundations. As Santayana said of the United States long ago: "This soil is propitious to every seed, and tares must needs grow in it. But why should it not also breed clear thinking, honest judgment, and rational happiness? These things are indeed not necessary to existence, and without them America might long remain rich and populous, like many a barbarous land in the past. But in that case its existence will be hounded, like theirs, by falsity and remorse. May heaven avert the omen, and make the new world a better world than the old."

There is a slight trace of selfishness in Santayana's prayer. Let us change it to read, "May the new world help to make the whole world new."

ATOMIC FORCE: ITS MEANING FOR MANKIND

(Broadcast August 12, 1945 (5 days after Hiroshima), with Reuben Gustavson, chancelor, University of Nebraska; William F. Ogburn, professor of sociology, University of Chicago; Robert M. Hutchins)

Discussion by Mr. Gustavson, Mr. Ogburn, and Mr. Hutchins

Mr. HUTCHINS. Gentlemen, is the atomic bomb good or bad for the world?

Mr. GUSTAVSON. On the day that the first atomic bomb was dropped, I met the director of the university laboratory which helped to develop it. His first words to me were: "This is a very sad day for us. Let us hope that we've not placed dynamite in the hands of children."

Mr. HUTCHINS. Was it wise to use this bomb against Japan?

Mr. OGBURN. By ending the war, it saved more lives than were lost at Hiroshima.

Mr. HUTCHINS. Was the war not going to end anyway?

Mr. OGBURN. But when? The Japanese Minister to Sweden has said that the atomic bomb brought the plea for peace. We cannot have peace or progress without paying the costs, as Charles Darwin showed.

Mr. HUTCHINS. This is the kind of weapon, I believe, which should be used, if at all, only as a last resort in self-defense. At the time that this bomb was dropped the American authorities knew that Russia was going to enter the war. It was said that Japan was blockaded and that its cities were burned out. All the evidence points to the fact that the use of this bomb was unnecessary. Therefore, the United States has lost its moral prestige.

Mr. GUSTAVSON. At the very least we might have used another method. We might have demonstrated the effectiveness of the bomb by calling our shot in advance and by giving the Japanese an opportunity to watch us drop a bomb on an uninhabited part of Japan and then calling upon Japan to surrender.

Mr. HUTCHINS. Perhaps the future is more important than the past. Ogburn, as a social forecaster, what seems most important to you about the atomic bomb?

Mr. OGBURN. This may well be one of the most important inventions of all time. The explosive energy in the atomic bomb, in my opinion, undoubtedly brightens the prospect for abolishing war, but, if, in addition, atomic energy is harnessed, we will usher in the "atomic age" and may produce sweeping changes comparable to those of the industrial revolution, which was brought in by steam. The industrial revolution, we all know, created our cities, made nations bigger, shifted world power, weakened the family, revolutionized agriculture, built an enormous industry, and led to the creation of powerful central government—more powerful than the world had ever known.

Mr. HUTCHINS. Gustavson, you are a scientist. What do you say?

Mr. GUSTAVSON. I would say that the bomb teaches us the value of fundamental research. The work done by Professor Fermi and others on the effect of the neutron on the uranium atom was research carried on out of curiosity and for the general purpose of increasing human understanding. There was no specific purpose of producing atomic energy—certainly no intention of producing world-shattering bombs. The basic work was an attempt to find out about the universe in which we live. To me that is the important lesson; and that is the way all really important discoveries are made.

Mr. HUTCHINS. My own conviction is that the moral burden which this discovery places upon the peoples of the earth and the necessity of a world organization to control this force are most important. Let us take up in order the social and industrial consequences, the implications for research, and the impact of this discovery upon war, peace, and world organization.

Mr. OGBURN. Let us first see what we are talking about. If we are talking about the explosive capacities of uranium—which is the only thing that is known definitely and publicly now—that is one thing; if we are talking about harnessing power from uranium and regulating its flow through machin.s—which is something I have not yet heard whether we can do—then the social consequences, of course, will be much greater; but if we are talking about releasing atomic energy not from uranium alone but from other and more abundant materials—such as for instance, clay or water—and of this I am skeptical as well as uninformed—then, in my judgment, no human imagination can encompass the consequences.

Mr. GUSTAVSON. This is the most important discovery that has been made since the discovery of fire. It is more important than all the inventions since the industrial revolution combined. This discovery is the answer to the dream of the alchemist. We are dealing here with the transmutation of elements, the destruction of matter, and the liberation of tremendous quantities of energy—energy the intensity of which defies description. For example, when dynamite explodes, there is an intensity represented by about 4 volts. We are now talking about something of the order of 200,000,000 volts.

Mr. OGBURN. This is very impressive, but inventions are nearly always overpromised. Ninety-five percent of them never materialize at all. Take, for instance, the singing wire or the talking book, which were invented in the 1890's. They have not been put to public use yet. Or take another invention—that of gas warfare—which put fear in our hearts and which was certainly overpromised 25 years ago at the end of the First World War. It has never materalized up to its promises. My calculations show that it takes, on the average, about 35 years for an invention to materialize, and sometimes it takes 200 or 300 years or longer. All inventions of the past which I have studied have been resisted. Let us look at the example of prefabricated housing, for instance. We could have had it 50 years ago, but instead it has been resisted by the building trades, certain real estate interests, and, of course, the mortgage companies. They do not want it.

Mr. GUSTAVSON. It seems to me that the trend today, however, is away from resistance and toward too-ready acceptance of new things. As a people, we are credulous and volatile rather than skeptical and slow to change. Take vitamins and nylon, for example.

Mr. OGBURN. We must not allow ourselves to begin talking like Jules Verne.

Mr. HUTCHINS. Maybe this time Jules is justified.

Mr. OGBURN. If Jules Verne were sitting around the round table this morning, he would be using the atomic bomb for organizing a war on Mars.

But there are many, many forces which slow up change. Civilization is merely a complicated mass of interrelationships, like a huge piece of machinery. We cannot change one part without changing many parts. To bring in a regulated atomic power means, for instance, changing railroads, electric-power systems, banks, factories, and many other types of social organizations. All this takes time. We do not get inventions adopted overnight.

Mr. GUSTAVSON. We may not get inventions adopted overnight, but we do know certain things about this discovery. We do know that we get out of it incredible heat, incredible power, incredible radioactivity, and new elements.

Mr. OGBURN. But there is a third factor, it seems to me, which slows up the use of inventions. An invention will not be used if it costs too much. President Truman told us that atomic energy cannot compete, in terms of costs, with coal or electricity at this stage. The first two atomic bombs cost, it is reported, $1,000,000,000 apiece. One cannot pick up a piece of U-235 as cheaply as one can pick up a piece of coal and put it in the furnace. The question still is whether it will be brought down cheap enough, and this we certainly do not know yet.

Mr. HUTCHINS. Then let us assume that we have a fundamental discovery, but that it is in a very early stage. What are the social consequences, Ogburn, that you as a social scientist can reasonably foresee, even at this stage?

Mr. OGBURN. I have been trying to argue that we need not get a case of the jitters and that inventions, though they disturb our sense of security, have a way of developing slowly. They develop against social inertia and in the face of resistances arising from the complicated nature of our society, and they come with the handicap of high costs. But to answer your question. If we cannot abolish war, we can pretty well count on a considerable effect on the layout of our cities and on city planning. The cities have already been dispersed by the automobile and more recently by the bomber. If explosives of this kind can reach them, our cities will be further dispersed and spread outward. Thus, this is a tendency which is already under way.

Mr. GUSTAVSON. Can we look forward to more leisure

Mr. OGBURN. Any great new use of energy has the potentialities of reducing and, I may say, even abolishing physical toil. We might, if we look forward into the future, even have factories without any laborers in them at all, but, of course, this will all come slowly.

Mr. GUSTAVSON. Could we not have technological unemployment on a scale of which we have never dreamed?

Mr. OGBURN. We could, if the inventions came quickly enough, but most inventions produce technological unemployment only temporarily. Unemployment, in the main, is really caused by the business cycle, fluctuations, and by population changes. I have calculated, for instance, that during the depressions of the 1930's only 15 percent of it was technological.

Mr. GUSTAVSON. Remember, this is a fundamental discovery of very fundamental character. It could affect our whole industrial civilization.

Mr. HUTCHINS. What about the effect on the standard of living?

Mr. OGBURN. It will make the atomic age an age of abundance. I am particularly excited, though, about the possibilities for transportation, which I have been studying recently. If atomic energy could be put in a rocket—and that does not seem to be very difficult—and if these rockets could be kept cool and slowed near their destination, it would be perfectly possible, I think, to travel 3,000 miles an hour. This would mean that we could leave New York one day and arrive in China the day before.

Mr. HUTCHINS. Who is talking like Jules Verne now?

Mr. GUSTAVSON. Let us not forget that the bomb is the end product of a series of discoveries. In all probability the liberation of atomic power, in a fashion that can be controlled for industry, will likely be much simpler than the making of the bomb.

Mr. HUTCHINS. I am interested in the suggestion that this discovery will favor the big industries—at least in its present stage where we have relatively rare materials and a relatively expensive process. How do you gentlemen feel about public versus private control of this material and this process?

Mr. OGBURN. Let me give some illustrations on this point. Most of our power inventions which we have now have developed big industries of the public utility type—electricity, railroads, aviation. These are certainly not the industries for small businesses. I suspect that the development of atomic energy will be in this class. It will tend to strengthen the big industries. It is very likely, by the way, to speed us further on the "road to serfdom," as the term is now used. It will tend to reinforce movements toward monopoly and toward cartels if, of course, we do not do something about it. But if it can be used in very small packages, then it may, of course, not accentuate this tendency. Most probably, however, it will put tremendous power in the hands of large industrial units. That brings us to the question of what we are going to do about it.

Mr. GUSTAVSON. It seems to me that it will go about the way the development of power in general has gone. We have seen the Government step into the power problem to control the great water resources for the development of electrical power. We are increasingly coming to the conclusion, I believe, that anything so fundamental to our economic structure as electricity, or power in general, has to be something that is Government controlled. The Government would logically have a lot to say about the development and distribution of atomic power.

Mr. OGBURN. I agree. Military reasons, of course, are added to the economic reasons in this case

Mr. HUTCHINS. You both thus feel that on the military side there is no question but that the Government will have to continue in control of this process and the materials used in it. But if large industries are the only ones which are in a position to develop the process or exploit the material at the present time, then we shall have to have governmental regulation of those industries.

What are the implications of this discovery for medicine and for health and for biology?

Mr. GUSTAVSON. They are tremendous, of course. The radioactivity associated with all this work has great possibilities for good and for harm—industrial hazards, for example, in the new industries—the exposure of workingmen to dangers which we never suspected before. We are going to use these radioactive materials, too, in the study of disease processes. We are going to use them in attempting to follow the fundamental researches in biology. The implications for public health, as I said, probably cannot be overstated.

Mr. HUTCHINS. You think that we may have as great a revolution in medical treatment and in biological investigation as we can see ahead of us in the physical sciences and in technology, is that correct?

Mr. GUSTAVSON. There is no question about it.

Mr. HUTCHINS. We have now come to the second main point of discussion on this round table. If the Government has succeeded in creating a notable curse with $2,000,000,000 and the concentrated effort of thousands of scientists over 4 or 5 years, why could we not ask that the Government devote the same money and effort to the elimination of some of the already existing curses such as cancer, influenza, venereal disease, unemployment at home, or starvation abroad?

Mr. GUSTAVSON. The important point here is that while it is relatively easy to get large sums of money to study the cancer problem which you have suggested, it is by no means easy to get large sums of money to study the fundamental properties of living matter. In the last analysis, solution of the cancer problem will be a byproduct of fundamental research on how the cell divides, why it divides, and so forth. We should remember that the nucleus of the cell is just as important in biology as the nucleus of the atom is to nuclear physics. We should remember, as I said before, that, when Professor Fermi did some of the fundamental work leading to the atomic bomb, bombs were the furthest thing away from his thinking. Similarly, the cure for cancer will come indirectly. It will probably come out of fundamental research and not out of the study of cancer.

Mr. HUTCHINS. But does this not mean that such researches would have to be centered in universities rather than in industry or under the auspices of Government?

Mr. OGBURN. The history of research has shown that industry is interested in applied research and that Government is interested, in the main, in contemporary applications. The only fundamental research of any significance has been done at the universities. Take, for instance, radio broadcasting and radar. They were dependent upon the discovery through pure research and science of Hertzian waves.

Mr. GUSTAVSON. After all, where did the Government turn in its hour of great fear? It did not turn to industry, and it did not turn to itself; it turned to the universities.

Mr. OGBURN. The atomic bomb has now put to the universities the biggest challenge which they ever faced, in my judgment. We have to know what to do with the dangerous weapon which we have created. Without liberal education and spiritual education it may become our master and our destroyer. What the natural scientists do is to unloose these new inventions which cause a reorganization of society, a reorganization of our economic institutions and of our social institutions, and always, what should not be forgotten, a revaluation of our ideologies. But here we are, sitting around trying to give the answers in a half hour on this round table, when it canont be done. It took $2,000,000,000 and 3 years, so we are told, to produce an atomic bomb. If the various social scientists had $2,000,000,000 and 3 years of research, maybe we could give better answers, but I think maybe that we ought to consider declaring a moratorium an all pure-science and natural-science development until we social scientists can catch up.

Mr. HUTCHINS. I understand that you are not seriously suggesting a moratorium. You are suggesting that Gustavson and I should get out and raise $2,000,000,000 for the support of social science research. We will be glad to do that.

Mr. OGBURN. That is chicken feed, Hutchins, mere chicken feed. We need much more than that.

Mr. HUTCHINS. I would like to consider whether, even if we had $2,000,000,000 for social-science research, we could have any effect upon society if society were not educated enough to accept the results.

Mr. OGBURN. That, of course, is the basic problem.

Mr. HUTCHINS. I want to ask whether it is not necessary, therefore—and whether this is not another of the responsibilities of the university—to develop liberal education for all.

Mr. GUSTAVSON. Quite right. Even Harvard and Yale and the University of Colorado, my former institution, have at last decided to devote themselves to general education as a preliminary to specialization. It would seem to me that this must be the trend and that it must be tremendously accelerated.

Mr. HUTCHINS. If we are going to have a society which knows what to do with these constant surprises from the physical scientists, we are going to have an entirely different level of general intelligence in the community from the one which we have been used to in the past.

Mr. OGBURN. That, Hutchins, is really the challenge of the atomic bomb. The bomb produced a sort of paralysis in Japan, but also, we would like to note that the first week in the atomic-bomb age has given the rest of the world a very bad state of jitters, to say the least. What we really fear, I think, is not the bomb so much as the unknown. But we need not fear it if we can control the development and control the knowledge and use it consciously and confidently for good and not for evil.

Mr. HUTCHINS. That brings us, does it not, to our last point, which is the military and political significance of atomic force?

Mr. OGBURN. It is an interesting fact that nations in the past, throughout the long history of mankind, have risen and fallen pretty much on the basis of inventions. England dominated the world during the nineteenth century. She did it, because the harnessing of the first mechanical power—steam—brought the Industrial Revolution to England 50 years before it did to any country on the Continent. Prior to that, France and other West European countries displaced the Mediterranean countries, because agricultural inventions made the river valleys of France such powerful forces. Before that, the Mediterranean powers rose because of another invention—the boat. Now, along comes a still more important development—atomic energy. Will there be a realinement of international powers?

Mr. HUTCHINS. What I get out of what you have been saying is that the United States is going to dominate the world, because the United States is sitting on this secret.

Mr. GUSTAVSON. If the United States tries to sit on this secret, it will make itself the most hated power on earth. But we cannot sit on this secret. If the history of science shows anything, it shows that discoveries are made practically simultaneously in several parts of the world and that no single nation develops an idea of this kind. As you well know, Hutchins, the men who are going to work on nuclear physics at the University of Chicago, come from Italy, from Hungary, from England, from Canada, from the United States. This bomb was a composite that grew out of the efforts of many people. If any one nation attempted to isolate itself scientifically, it would soon be outstripped by the others which would not be parties to the secrecy.

Mr. OGBURN. Brains, in a hereditary sense, as the biologists know, are pretty well generally distributed over the world. The thing which we have to look out for, though, is what the distribution of the natural resources is, for this new source of power. Where do we find uranium? In Colorado, Utah, and Canada, but it also exists in Czechoslovakia, in Africa, and in Russia. That puts it in the hands of what we call the "peace-loving nations." May I say that I hope that they will continue to love peace.

Mr. GUSTAVSON. Your implication that the release of atomic energy is limited to uranium is open to question. In all probability we shall learn to apply the process to other more abundant elements. It seems to me that this discovery really equalizes the nations by placing atomic power, with all its potentialities, into the hands of all small nations. What we have done is the equivalent of placing a slingshot in the hands of a David.

Mr. OGBURN. Not yet; not yet. The chances are strong that the difference between the big nations and the small nations will be increased rather than diminished. That is what happened with the tank and the bomber. They practically killed off the small nations as effective factors in the distribution of power. The atomic bomb will very likely strengthen the big nation, because, whatever the little one can do, the big can do better and quicker.

Mr. GUSTAVSON. But your assumption is that it takes tremendous industry and a lot of airplanes to do this sort of job. It is altogether possible that relatively small numbers of workers in a small country, such as Denmark, could develop all the facilities which are necessary without a single bomber. With only a runway, a rocket, and an atomic bomb a man in Copenhagen might be able to destroy Berlin.

Mr. OGBURN. The big nation could still produce bigger, better, and quicker results. What do you think, Hutchins?

Mr. HUTCHINS. The first thing that I think is that peacetime military training in the United States now becomes an irrelevant issue. We do not need a big Army to operate an atomic bomb; we do not need much of an Air Force. Peacetime conscription is a soporific. We should not rely upon large masses of half-trained men; we should pin our faith upon scientific research.

Mr. GUSTAVSON. At the present stage uranium is known to be distributed only in certain places. Manpower and industrial strength related to its use are important. The issue is whether, as scientific research proceeds, it will not result in a further redistribution of power which might bring the smaller nations back on the same level. But the upshot in any case is that the atomic bomb cannot be suppressed. Ogburn, by talking about the abolition of war, did you mean that something like the United Nations Organization might abolish war by agreement now that the atomic bomb has fallen?

Mr. OGBURN. It is the best chance to banish war which we have had since the League of Nations—at least to banish it for a time—a very long time.

Mr. HUTCHINS. I do not follow you at all. After the last war it was said that the airplane and the TNT bomb were going to be so horrible that nobody would ever fight again. And Hitler began to fight as soon as he saw that he had industrial resources and a political position adequate to give him a good chance of success. Is that not always going to be the case? We are not going to abolish war merely by making it horrible.

Mr. GUSTAVSON. People are going to fight for whatever they think that they can win. They always have, and they always will.

Mr. OGBURN. The Japanese apparently thought that it was too horrible. But do not misunderstand me, I am not saying that we can banish war forever. All that we can foresee is about 20 or 25 years ahead. The problem is practically, to make war much more difficult. If the atomic bomb has all these destructive capacities, it may be our golden opportunity.

Mr. HUTCHINS. We have always had this chance.

Mr. OGBURN. But we did not have the atomic bomb.

Mr. HUTCHINS. The whole question is: What is at stake and what are our chances? If a man has a chance to dominate the world through the control of atomic energy, that is a very large stake. And if he has, through the advances made by the scientists in his country, an opportunity to use this atomic force in such a way as to justify him in thinking that he has the edge on his enemies, he will take advantage of his situation and start another international conflagration. How are we going to prevent this? Did I understand you to say that you thought that we could have an international agreement which would either stop scientific progress in weapons or make every nation feel that it should never take advantage of such progress?

Mr. OGBURN. Such an agreement is not impossible, certainly.

Mr. HUTCHINS. The question is not whether it is impossible but whether it would be effective. Up to last Monday I must confess that I did not have much hope for a world state. I have believed that no moral basis for it existed and that we had no world conscience and no sense of world community sufficient to keep a world state together. But the alternatives now seem clear. One is world suicide; another is agreement among sovereign states to abstain from using the bomb. This will not be effective. The only hope, therefore, of abolishing war is through the monopoly of atomic force by a world organization.

Mr. OGBURN. But that is a thousand years off.

Mr. HUTCHINS. Remember that Leon Bloy, the French philosopher, referred to the good news of damnation, doubtless on the theory that none of us would be Christians if we were not afraid of perpetual hell-fire. It may be that the atomic bomb is the good news of damnation, that it may frighten us into that Christian character and those righteous actions and those positive political steps necessary to the creation of a world society, not a thousand or 500 years hence, but now.

PEACE AND THE ATOM BOMB

(Broadcast November 11, 1945, with Reuben Gustavson, chancellor, University of Nebraska; Robert Redfield, professor of anthropology, University of Chicago; Robert M. Hutchins)

Discussion by Mr. Gustavson, Mr. Redfield, and Mr. Hutchins

Mr. HUTCHINS. This Armistice Day the world is blessed with peace, except in China, Java, Palestine, and a few other places. We are also blessed with the atomic bomb. This is a good time to ask whether America, which gave the world the atomic bomb, has a foreign policy which makes for peace.

It seems to me that the American people now realize that the United States, for the first time, is vulnerable from every quarter of the globe. Americans are striking out in all directions under the impact of the discovery of atomic energy, striving, first of all, for what they think is national security.

Mr. REDFIELD. I agree that this is a new and a terrible fear and that we are acting under the influence of that fear. Many of the actions which we are taking are therefore unreasonable actions. It is not surprising, I believe, that we turn first to the new military strength which has just won us victory. But we hide behind it blindly. The question for us to consider here is whether this military strength is really the protection which we like to think it is.

Mr. GUSTAVSON. In addition, we are also reorganizing our whole domestic life in the light of this fear which has come over us. We are now talking about putting scientific research in atomic energy in the United States under the cloak of secrecy. This will hamper and delay the developments in the field of biology, in the field of medicine, and in the field of atomic power for industry. The end result of this policy is that we deny ourselves the very things which will make future wars less likely.

Mr. HUTCHINS. In short, the official policy of the United States is a policy of force. We find it manifested in all kinds of different ways, in almost everything that comes out of Washington. We hear that we are going to keep the so-called secret of the atomic bomb; that we are going to have the largest navy in the world. At the moment when we are the most powerful nation on earth, we are going to introduce the innovation of universal military training. We are going to put atomic energy under a dictatorship. We are going to get island bases to protect us. We are going to have the largest espionage service in the world.

Mr. GUSTAVSON. Even when we go about fostering science through a proposed National Research Foundation, we do it in the name of military strength.

Mr. HUTCHINS. One of the most distressing aspects of this policy is the air of moral superiority with which we state it. Mr. Truman hints that we are entitled to world domination because we are devoted to the Ten Commandments and the Golden Rule. But it is a little difficult to see how dropping atomic bombs, without warning, upon the men, women, and children of Hiroshima and Nagasaki could have been suggested to us by either the Ten Commandments or the Golden Rule.

But perhaps we have not time to discuss our alleged moral superiority. Let us ask, instead, whether the policy of force which our Government is following makes sense.

Mr. REDFIELD. It must make only one kind of sense to people in other countries. To them it must seem that we are preparing to dominate the world by force. The policy would at least be one which could be carried out if America were, in fact, determined to dominate the world, but I do not believe that 130,000,000 Americans are. So the first thing to be said about the Government policy is that it is confused. It threatens while we do not really mean the threat.

Mr. GUSTAVSON. Our policy is complete confusion. Let us take, for example, the policy of keeping the secret of the atomic bomb. Every scientist who has said anything about this problem has said that in terms of fundamental principles there is no secret; that our secrets (such as they are) consist in industrial know-how. We should remember that Germany, even though she was bombed almost continuously, made great progress toward the liberation of atomic energy. This simply means that any country which is capable of making a great industrial effort can have atomic bombs, just as any country which wants automobiles can have them.

Mr. HUTCHINS. In addition to England and Canada, scientists at least in France and Denmark are familiar with this whole development.

Mr. GUSTAVSON. That is true. We simply have to contemplate a world in which every nation which is capable of making the effort can have atomic bombs in 5 years; and there are a number of them—some are small, and some are large—who are capable of making that effort.

Mr. HUTCHINS. But do I not understand Einstein to say that this atomic bomb is not a very serious weapon after all?

Mr. GUSTAVSON. Yes, when asked if all the people would be killed in the next atomic-power war, he said, "No, only two-thirds of them," if that is any consolation.

Mr. REDFIELD. In other words as a friend of mine put it, there is nothing to worry about. We have nothing to lose but our lives and our property.

J. R. Oppenheimer, an atom-bomb scientist, who should know something about this, was a little more conservative. He gave his opinion that 40,000,000 Americans might be killed in one night.

Mr. HUTCHINS. What you gentlemen are saying, I take it, is that the atomic bomb is a new threat to civilization—a threat which will be fatal unless something is done to control it. You are also saying that our effort to control it by preserving the secret is absurd. That policy will fail.

Mr. REDFIELD. The evidence of confusion in this policy is also present in other matters. I do not think that the question as to armament, in terms of the ordinary army and navy, has been frankly faced in terms of the atom bomb.

Mr. GUSTAVSON. If we are to have a large army, we should know what we are to do with it—if we destroy the cities of our enemy or if the enemy destroys our cities.

Mr. REDFIELD. The Secretary of War said last week that universal military training is needed so that trained men will be available to restore public utilities after our cities have been atom-bombed. Perhaps the Army will teach them to connect the sewers and the electric-light wires. The Japanese certainly had universal military training, but did they connect the plumbing after Hiroshima? They did not; they gave up. Moreover, I ask, what is to support the Army after all the cities have been destroyed?

Mr. GUSTAVSON. In spite of all which has been written, the American people still fail to realize the tremendous power, even at its present state of development, in one atomic bomb, to say nothing of what the future might bring.

For comparison, let us look at the Fifth and Eighth Air Forces. They dropped a million tons of bombs on Europe during the war, and we have some faint notion of the terrible destruction which was accomplished. One atomic bomb is equivalent to 20,000 tons of TNT, which to carry requires five freight trains of 80 cars each. Fifty atomic bombs carried by 50 planes could carry the equivalent of all the TNT bombs dropped on Europe. Obviously, if this is the case, for what do we want a large Navy?

Mr. REDFIELD. Similar difficulty can be found with the suggestion that naval bases must be maintained and defended. As General Arnold tells us, these bombs can today be carried by nonstop airplanes to any part of the world. We know that even if some of the planes were intercepted, enough are sure to get through to destroy the industrial base of an enemy or of ourselves. Why, then, do you need naval bases? What kind of a navy do you need if one can destroy an enemy's industrial foundations in a few hours from one's own home country?

Mr. HUTCHINS. What kind of air force do we need if we are going to fire atomic bombs by rockets, or if we are going to send agents into potential enemy countries who will plant bombs which will be detonated when war is decided upon?

Mr. GUSTAVSON. The answer which the professional military people make is that we must have a large army to occupy a defeated country.

Mr. HUTCHINS. Yes; we may need a relatively small army of occupation if we insist upon occupying a defeated country after its cities have been devastated. In order to get this small army of occupation to the defeated country, we may need an air force and a navy, not for combat but for transport. But this means a much smaller number of ships and airplanes and an entirely different kind of ship and airplane than is being proposed.

But this policy of force, which is exemplified by a policy of secrecy in regard to the atomic bomb, is not merely confused, is it, gentlemen? It is dangerous, also, because if we claim to have a secret when there is no secret and if we keep telling the people that we are going to protect them by keeping a secret that does not exist, then we lull them into a false sense of security.

Mr. REDFIELD. The pretense that we are protected, then, works us a double injury. In the first place, relying upon a protection which is really not a protection in the long run, we fail to take the steps to build international confidence which might save us. In the second place, it greatly enhances the fear and suspicion which are directed against us, and so brings war nearer.

Mr. GUSTAVSON. That is very obvious in the recent attitude which Russia has expressed in her failure to attend conferences and in her maintaining an attitude of almost complete silence on the whole problem of the military bomb.

The Russians, for example, recently celebrated the two hundred and twentieth anniversary of the founding of the Russian Academy of Science. As a part of that celebration, they invited scientists from all over the world to join them, including the outstanding scientists in America. Pressure was brought to bear upon our scientists to prevent them from attending, presumably for fear that they might give up some of our so-called secrets. In other words, we have gotten to the place where we do not even trust our own people. We seem headed in the same general direction as Germany was headed when she tried to build a Nazi science. We are trying to build a highly nationalistic American science.

Mr. REDFIELD. When scientists want to talk things over with other scientists, they are not traitors. Scientists have to be internationalists, for no nation can go it alone in science and not lag behind in scientific progress.

Mr. GUSTAVSON. Let us put ourselves wholeheartedly to the task of feeding the world: to clothing the world; to housing it. Let us pool our resources against disease. We have the know-how; let us go to work. Let us get our mind off the military problem and put it back on the fundamental problem of making a decent world.

Mr. HUTCHINS. But all the discussions in the American Congress about atomic energy have been conducted on the assumption that what we are dealing with here is a weapon.

Mr. GUSTAVSON. It is interesting, of course, to contrast the attitude of our own Government, as reflected in our press, with what we can read in papers such as the London Times. In England, industrialists are gathering a fund of something like a half a billion dollars—that is a fourth of the money we spent on the atomic bomb—for the investigation of the peacetime uses of atomic energy. In our own country there has been practically no discussion along that line. In fact, all our legislation is headed in the direction of using this entirely as a military weapon.

Mr. HUTCHINS. Take the May-Johnson bill, for example. The May-Johnson bill attempts to control all atomic research. It maintains that secrecy is necessary in order that the research may succeed. This can be true only if one is thinking in military terms. The bill places the administration of atomic research in the hands of an independent, practically irresponsible agency, exercising a kind of control which can be justified—if it can be justified at all—only on military grounds. In fact, there is reason to believe that the bill contemplates placing a military officer in charge of atomic research in this country.

Mr. REDFIELD. Again in contrast with our own obsession with the control of the discovery for warfare is the tenor of Molotov's speech made last week. You will remember that he promised the Russians an early development of atomic energy in their own country. But all his emphasis was upon the development of that energy in the building-up of the country.

On the other hand, in our own country, the Army has tried to hurry through Congress a strait-jacket for scientific research—the May-Johnson bill, which Hutchins just mentioned. If the bill should pass, the development of atomic energy for peaceful purposes will be hampered. Indeed, under such a law, research for military purposes would be hampered.

Mr. GUSTAVSON. As I recall it, Molotov scarcely referred to the military use of atomic energy in Russia. It is the United States which seems to be beginning an armament race in atomic armaments. History suggests that any armament race ends in very serious consequences; and an atomic-bomb armament race, as we have learned from the statements of Einstein and Oppenheimer, is something too frightening to contemplate.

Mr. HUTCHINS. If we go into an atomic-bomb armament race, can we hope to win it?

Mr. REDFIELD. I say that this is a kind of race which nobody can really win. Such an arms race would end in an explosion which would be a catastrophe. A victory would mean only that more Americans would be left than citizens of the enemy country. This is a race toward just one goal—world suicide.

Mr. HUTCHINS. Suppose that Mr. Truman suddenly decides to reveal the so-called secrets of the atomic bomb to all the nations of the world. What kind of policy have we then?

Mr. REDFIELD. We have considerable improvement, but essentially we still have the same policy; have we not? We have a policy which emphasizes military domination by our country. If everybody had bombs, nevertheless, the various measures which you have listed, Hutchins, would add up to the same desperate and ultimately suicidal armaments race.

Mr. HUTCHINS. In this discussion it becomes clear that the policy of the United States is based on force. It is a policy which will seem to other countries a policy directed toward world domination. The policy is confused, contradictory, and incoherent. It is a bad means to a bad end. The general tendency of the policy, moreover, is to increase enormously the difficulty of developing confidence among peoples; to exaggerate the tensions leading to war; and to create a world which must live in perpetual fear.

Mr. GUSTAVSON. In other words, here we are with all the technical skills to produce all the food we need, all the clothing we need, and, what is more wonderful, new tools which grow out of atomic-energy research for fighting disease, all the necessary skills for housing the world. Yet we are chained to the psychology of war.

Mr. HUTCHINS. We take the substance of the people and devote it to a fruitless armament race.

Mr. REDFIELD. We take the substance, and we corrupt the spirit. The current policy would make exaggerated military power a main basis of national life. This is to make the people accept force as a principle of living. The hope lies in extending common understandings to make a world community, but we now frustrate that hope by accepting force as our principle.

Mr. HUTCHINS. This is the doctrine of power politics.

Mr. REDFIELD. That doctrine may now become not merely a public policy but also a mode of life.

Mr. GUSTAVSON. And it is a question whether any of us want to live under it. I am reminded of Lord Acton, when he said, "Power always corrupts; and absolute power corrupts absolutely."

Mr. HUTCHINS. That is, we would say that this policy is suicidal; but, what is much more important, it is degrading. Even if we survive, we ought not to want to.

The situation is all the more menacing because the world which is emerging seems to be a world of two major powers—Russia and the United States. By constantly building up our military strength, we are daily threatening the other major power in the world—namely, Russia.

Mr. GUSTAVSON. Suppose that Russia had the atomic bomb and suppose that Russia were building the largest navy in the world and suppose she were keeping her army at its present great strength and suppose she were legislating for her science so that everything would go down a military channel, would we look upon that as a threat to world peace?

Mr. REDFIELD. Of course we would. I would answer that argument by saying that I think that we would be seriously mistaken if we should attempt to justify the present policy in this country on the ground that the Russians, if they were in our shoes, would do the same things. Maybe they would; but if they would make the mistake we are making, that is no reason why we should make it.

Here the atom bomb comes in again. Before its advent, people had a chance to dominate the world without destroying themselves. The Nazis had that chance. But, today, although through fear or desperation men may nevertheless make the attempt, the ruin of all will be the result.

Mr. HUTCHINS. The Russians are human, and conceivably they might be as stupid if they were in our position. But there is no reason why we should be stupid just because we think somebody else might be under the same circumstances.

But I understand that Mr. Truman has telegraphed congratulations to Russia on the anniversary of the revolution and has expressed hopes for lasting cooperation. So, perhaps, we do not have to worry about the problem of Russian relations.

Mr. GUSTAVSON. I know all about that. But when someone holds out his right hand to shake hands with somebody and, at the same time, puts his left hand on his gun, there results a situation where mutual confidence is impossible.

Mr. HUTCHINS. What you are saying is that if these policies are calculated to convince the Russians that we are proposing to attack them, what is needed now is not fair words but a repudiation of the policy.

That leads to the next question for our consideration. What specific steps can be taken now, independently of other nations, which will turn our foreign policy into a policy which makes for peace?

Mr. GUSTAVSON. First, we can disclose the so-called secrets of the atomic bomb. There is no scientific secret. There are no mechanical secrets which cannot be worked out by foreign engineers just as our engineers worked them out. We are not giving away anything when we give away these so-called secrets. But what we are doing, and this is most important, is making a friendly gesture.

Mr. REDFIELD. We agree here that there is no long-run security in a policy of military force, but would not the revelation of the know-how of the atomic bomb endanger the short-run, immediate security of the United States?

Mr. GUSTAVSON. No, because the time which it will take other nations to make atomic bombs will not be materially shortened. The difference would probably be only a matter of months, or perhaps a year at most. What takes time is the mobilization of industrial power, the men and the machines, to make the bombs. Even if other nations knew today all that we know about the manufacturing process, they would have a hard pull ahead of them before they could come out with a finished product.

Mr. HUTCHINS. A second specific step toward peace to be taken independently by the United States, without endangering the security of the country, would be to withdraw the May-Johnson bill for the control of atomic energy. This proposed act, which treats atomic energy chiefly as a weapon, gives other countries the impression that we propose to develop atomic energy chiefly for hostile purposes. What we need now is a bill which looks upon atomic power as a potential benefit to mankind and which frees industrial and scientific development. That would do much to reassure the world.

Mr. GUSTAVSON. A third specific step which can be taken independently by the United States without endangering its security is the abandonment of the proposal for universal military training. We have seen that this proposal is a military absurdity in an atomic age. We actually strengthen ourselves by abandoning it, for we avoid the waste of our resources and the self-deception which it involves.

Mr. HUTCHINS. Then, these three steps—the disclosure of the secrets of the atomic bomb, the passage of a bill on atomic energy which would emphasize the peaceful possibilities of this discovery for mankind, and the abandonment of universal military training—can all be safely taken by us alone and taken now; and all of them will make for peace. Other steps may require the collaboration of other nations and may take longer.

Mr. REDFIELD. But these other steps are even more important. And in one of them we can take the initiative now. We can call a conference of the United Nations, at which the United States would offer to disclose all its military secrets of every kind and to reduce all its armaments of every kind, provided every nation would do the same. The same invitation, I submit, should propose that the conference exchange all scientific information which might be useful in the cooperative reconstruction of the world. If other nations refused, the United States would at least have made it clear that it had no desire to dominate the world by force. If other nations accepted, we might again have some hope for the survival of civilization.

Mr. GUSTAVSON. But the ultimate hope for civilization in the atomic age cannot rest on interim measures like these, important as they are. The important hope lies in world unity, in a world state, in a world government.

Mr. HUTCHINS. But that is a long way off. If a world state and a world government are to last and not to be disrupted by an atomic civil war, a world state and a world government must be supported by and must reflect a world community. This world community requires world communication; world understanding; a common tradition; a common stock of ideas and ideals which are shared by the peoples of the earth. People can be frightened into a world government, but they cannot develop communication, understanding, tradition, ideas, and ideals overnight. And if they do not develop them, the world government into which they have been frightened cannot last.

Mr. REDFIELD. I agree that they cannot develop them overnight, but they can do something to bring them about. The mere discussion of a world constitution and, still more, of course, the adoption of one would do more than any other single thing to promote the formation of a true world community, just as our own Constitution, which reflects the principles which unite us, helps to make the United States a community.

We should therefore call a world constitutional convention to consider how the world may be held together during the atomic age. If it failed, we should call another. Every interchange among the nations must be encouraged, and discussions of the possible constitution of a world state should be the most fruitful of all.

Mr. GUSTAVSON. After all, an atomic civil war, if it should take place in a world state, would be no worse for us or for the world than the atomic international war toward which we are speeding.

Mr. HUTCHINS. In the meantime, the possibilities of the United Nations Organization should not be overlooked.

Mr. GUSTAVSON. That organization is far from perfect. In its present form it cannot prevent war, for example. It is an organization of independent sovereign states, dominated by a few great powers.

Mr. REDFIELD. But the important point is that it is an international organization and the only one which we have. It must be used. The more it is used, the more useful it will become. Meanwhile, we can consider whether it should be supplanted by a stronger organization or whether it may not itself, drastically revised, grow into world government.

Mr. HUTCHINS. The next war will be, in a very gruesome sense, a war to end war. When the next war is over, there will be nobody left to fight another. If we are to avert the next war, we must immediately change the direction of American foreign policy.

On this round-table discussion we have listed five measures which might avert the next war: (1) The disclosure of the so-called "secrets" of the atomic bomb; (2) a law governing atomic energy, which would release science and industry to give the world the goods and leisure which atomic energy promises; (3) the abandonment of universal military training; (4) an international conference in which we propose to disclose all military secrets and reduce all armaments if other nations will do the same; and (5) the calling of a world constitutional convention.

Simultaneously, we must develop the United Nations Organization to the maximum by using it to the maximum. If the American people want peace, they must recognize the folly of trying to build it on force. That policy is immoral and suicidal. It is a policy adequately described by the historian Tacitus. He said, when force was the policy of the Romans, "They make a desolation, and they call it peace."

THE THIRD YEAR OF THE ATOMIC AGE: WHAT SHOULD WE DO NOW?

(Broadcast August 24, 1947, with G. A. Borgese, secretary of the Committee To Frame a World Constitution; Richard J. Finnegan, editor, Chicago Sun-Times; Carl A. Hatch, United States district judge, New Mexico; Harold C. Urey, atomic scientist, University of Chicago; Robert M. Hutchins)

Statement by Mr. Hutchins

Two years ago, the Sunday after the bomb dropped, the University of Chicago Round Table discussed Atomic Force—Its Meaning for Mankind.

The University of Chicago had been one of the principal centers of research on the bomb. The first chain reaction took place on its campus on December 2, 1942.

The university, even before the round table of 2 years ago, had determined to do what it could to maintain the leadership of the United States in atomic studies and to hold together some of the members of the group which had produced the bomb.

For this purpose it had already created three new research institutes. The university representatives on the round table had therefore some qualifications to speak on the subject, and the institution they represented was deeply involved in whatever atomic energy might mean for mankind.

The fundamental facts about the atomic bomb today are those which the round table emphasized 2 years ago. There is no secret. There is no defense. Since there is no secret, other nations will have the bomb almost any day. Since there is no defense, military preparations to defend ourselves against the bomb are a waste of time.

In another war the atomic bomb will be used. International agreements for the control of atomic energy will simply mean that the next war will end with atomic bombs instead of beginning with them. The minute that war breaks out, every nation that knows how will start making atomic bombs.

It is generally thought that another nation will be able to make atomic bombs within 5 years from the day on which we dropped the first bomb on Japan. If this is so, we have already frittered away 40 percent of the time we had to organize ourselves to preserve mankind.

The New York Times, in its editorial on the second anniversary of the bomb, says that the ultimate protection against it can only be the abolition of war itself. The Times suggests that the final success of efforts to abolish war can be realized only in an ultimate world government.

I do not understand the use of the word "ultimate" in this connection. We have now arrived at the ultimate stage in history. We cannot do something intermediate now and ultimately do something ultimate. What is ultimately required of us is required of us now. If what is ultimately required of us is the abolition of war through a world government, then we had better set about trying to get war abolished through world government now.

Any proposal for a world atomic authority is a proposal for world government. Such an authority must have a monopoly of atomic bombs, which means that every nation would be at its mercy, and it must have the right to enter, inspect, and destroy atomic installations anywhere in the world. No nation could call itself sovereign in any usual sense under such conditions.

The major premise of all discussions looking toward agreements for the control of atomic energy has been that the nations retain their sovereignty. Hence, these discussions have not succeeded and cannot succeed. Either we have world federal government and real atomic control, or we have no agreements, or agreements that are meaningless, and eventually atomic war.

It will be said, of course, that if nations will not collaborate in an alliance or debating society like the United Nations, they cannot be expected to come together or stay together in a world state. The American States could not or would not collaborate under the Articles of Confederation before 1787, but they did come together, and with the exception of one period, they stayed together under the Constitution.

It may be admitted that there were ties which united them which do not unite the nations today. On the other hand, we should not forget that many differences deeply divided the American States, so much so that, 3 months before the Constitutional Convention, Madison wrote that "he trembled for the issue."

Mr. Hooker has lately shown in the magazine Common Cause how serious the divisions among the States in the Confederation were. Virginia had twelve times as many people as Delaware. Georgia claimed a hundred times as many square miles as Rhode Island. There were so many Germans in Pennsylvania that Franklin feared they might make German the language of the State. It was impossible to get along in some sections in New York without knowing Dutch. The trip from Boston to New York, which now takes less than an hour, took four days to a week along the finest road, or longer than it takes now to go around the world.

Gouverneur Morris thought that a Federal tax was impossible because of the extent of the country; and one member of the Convention asked, How can it be supposed that this vast country, including the western territory, will, 150 years hence, remain one Nation?

When Washington took charge of the armies surrounding Boston, he wrote that the New Englanders were an exceedingly dirty and nasty people. On the other hand, Ephraim Paine, of Vermont, complained that the southern members of Congress regarded themselves as a superior order of animals. Tithes were levied by New York, Pennsylvania, and Maryland on the goods of other States; and New Jersey taxed the New York lighthouse on Sandy Hook. New York, New Hampshire, and Massachusetts quarreled about Vermont, and Pennsylvanians battled Virginians on the Upper Ohio. It is no wonder that, when the Constitution was completed by the Convention, the principal attack upon it was that it was utopian—a visionary project, an indigestible panacea.

And it barely was accepted. In the convention in the critical States it just squeaked through. In Massachusetts it carried by 29 votes; in Virginia, by 10; and in New York by only three.

To borrow a phrase from Mr. Borgese, world government is necessary and therefore possible. Of course, the world government can mean much, little, or nothing. An effort to find out what a free and federal world constitution would be like is now proceeding in the Committee To Frame a World Constitution. Whether this effort succeeds or fails, it will at least serve to clarify the issues and to focus the thought of the world on the method of forming a federal union which shall embrace all men.

It is very late. Perhaps nothing can save us. But the handwriting on the wall is plain enough. It says to the peoples of the earth, "Unite or die."

THE PROBLEM OF WORLD GOVERNMENT

(Broadcast April 4, 1948, with Pandit Jawaharlal Nehru, Prime Minister of India; V. K. Wellington Koo, Ambassador from China in the United States; Robert M. Hutchins)

Statement by Mr. Hutchins

We come now to the practical and immediate bearing upon American foreign policy of the two eloquent statements which you have heard.

The official American policy is to frighten Russia out of her alleged intention to establish world government, on the Russian plan, by force and fraud. According to present indications, the American elections next autumn can make little change in this policy; for each candidate for the Republican nomination is seeking favor on the ground that his principles and personality will frighten the Russians more than those of any of his rivals. Many Americans want to go farther still. They see that a policy of frightening Russia will merely postpone the war which is to decide whether we have world government on the Russian plan or world government on the American plan. Therefore, they want to fight Russia now while we are overwhelmingly stronger than she. They are calling for a preventive war.

Talk of a preventive war is vicious and perverted. If we seriously entertain the idea of a preventive war, we ought first to make our apologies to the Nazis we hanged at Nuremberg. Talk of any war, now or later, is not much better. The best that can be said for it is that it is recklessly frivolous. This is, we often hear, a Christian country; and the message of Christ calls us to good will, to the love of our neighbor, to the renunciation of the goods of this world, to humility, and to the forgiveness, not the slaughter, of our enemies. To say that we must kill Communists because they are atheists and we are Christians is a strange distortion of Christianity.

Those who believe in preventive war have one point on their side. They are correct in holding that a policy of frightening Russia cannot permanently succeed. Some day Russia will have the atomic bomb. Some day Russia will feel strong enough to prefer fighting to being frightened. Then the next war will come, and after it will come world government for such world as we have left. World government will come by conquest, instead of by orderly constitutional procedure.

Have we forgotten what the scientists have told us about the next war? If it comes when both sides have the atomic bomb, the cities of both sides will be destroyed. I do not care about architecture. The men, women, and children in our cities will be blown to bits. The atomic bomb is a weapon directed against civilians. If we go to war before the Russians have the atomic bomb, we may expect the horrors of bacteriological warfare. We may expect the death of millions of innocent people. We may expect the disruption of our own economy and of our own form of government. We shall lay Europe waste—Europe, our ancestral homeland; Europe, for the sake of which we are now preparing for war. And when the war is over, if it ever is, we shall have the task of imposing our will by force for centuries on the peoples we have defeated. World government by the conquest of the world means perpetual war.

That we can lightheartedly discuss such a program not 3 years after the death of Hitler suggests that Hitler has triumphed after all. He was the symbol of brute force in our time. He was defeated, but we, his conquerors, are now preparing to bow down before the idol which he worshiped.

There is a good deal of hypocrisy about our attitude toward Russia. We do not believe that Russia is ready to attack us. We cannot seriously think that all Russians are bloodthirsty villains and that all the actions of the American Government through history have the pure, angelic quality which we ascribe to them. Have we forgotten how we got the Panama Canal? Have we forgotten our continual interference, often for no better reason than the protection of our investments, in the internal affairs of Latin America? The Russians have behaved stupidly. Our own consciences cannot be altogether clear. We might ask ourselves how we should feel if the Russian Secretary for Air were to say of us what our Secretary for Air said of Russia a week or so ago, when he stated publicly that our planes could now drop bombs on Russian cities and return to their bases in America.

The peoples of the earth want freedom and justice. They do not want to be individuals without duties or automatons without rights. Communism denies them freedom. The critical spirit of man works against communism. Differences among individuals work against communism, for it holds that all men are identical. The European tradition of free expression, a free press, and political parties works against communism. Invention in the arts, discovery in the sciences, carelessness, restlessness, humor, rational skepticism, and religious faith work against it.

What works for it? Nothing but injustice, which appears to millions today in the prospect of endless starvation and exploitation. The people of Europe do not want and will not long tolerate Communist justice at the expense of freedom. But the people of Europe cannot be permanently intimidated, and they cannot be permanently bought. They must have before their eyes some positive idea, some positive program which offers them both freedom and justice.

The stop-Russia program does not meet these requirements. The time is one for imagination, invention, for the effort to raise ourselves by our own bootstraps into a different spiritual world. This effort is harder than a policy of vast military preparations and resounding threats. But it has the merit of relieving us from condemnation by our own moral code. It has the merit of offering hope to mankind. Another war will mean the end of all hopes whatever.

We should strain our minds and imaginations to invent a political structure which may unite the world in freedom and justice. The aim is unity, which comes by agreement, not unification, which is imposed by force. The aim is a world state which rests not on the uneasy, impermanent, and unjust foundation of conquest but on the durable basis of the consent of the governed.

Such a world state must be a federal government, for only a federal government can create peace and safeguard liberty while preserving order. Such a world government must be a government, and not, like the United Nations, a league of independent, sovereign states, perpetuating the malady of nationalism. Such a world government must protect freedom; and it must be founded on justice, for men will fight until they get their rights.

Can such a world constitution be invented? I think so, for the Committee To Frame a World Constitution, established at Chicago 2½ years ago at the initiative of G. A. Borgese, has just published a draft of a possible world constitution which contains these elements.

Can such a world constitution be adopted? Nobody knows. But such a world constitution offers a positive idea. Hence it has a chance of gaining the adherence of mankind.

Can such a constitution guarantee that there will never be another war? Of course not. But it offers a hope that there will not be another war—and the only hope which we have. If a constitution proposing freedom and justice is accepted by most of the world, with the exception of Russia and her satellites, then there may be war. But it will be a war in which we cannot be accused of seeking our own aggrandizement, the submission of others to our will, or the domination of the world. A war, if it comes then, will be one in which the issues will be far plainer, in which our allies will be far more numerous and more loyal, and in which our sense of righteousness and high purpose will be far stronger than they can be today.

But the main point of contrast is this: the foreign policy of the United States means that war is inevitable. World government founded on freedom and justice means that war, though still possible, is no longer inevitable. If war is inevitable, civilization has no future.

All Americans who hope for a future for their children, all Americans who want one good world, all Americans who believe in the brotherhood of man, should call upon the President and upon Congress to initiate a world constitutional convention.

The mission of America is not to dominate the world but to transform it.

A National Policy for Timberlands

OF
HON. HAROLD C. HAGEN
OF MINNESOTA
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES
Thursday, March 22, 1951

Mr. HAGEN. Mr. Speaker, in the present emergency we realize more and more the importance of our natural resources, especially those represented in the forest lands of the United States. In times when there is no stress we ruthlessly exploit our timberlands and dispoil our forests without thought of the future, without regard to the huge loss of construction material and the waste of our land.

Some interesting information is contained in a speech on a national policy for timber lands, which was recently delivered by Mr. E. L. Demmon, director, Lake States Forest Experiment Station at St. Paul, Minn. The speech was made before the North American Wildlife Conference at Milwaukee, Wis. I recommend careful consideration of Mr. Demmon's remarks:

A NATIONAL POLICY FOR TIMBERLANDS[1]
(By E. L. Demmon, director, Lake States Forest Experiment Station[2])

Today forest resources are more important than ever to the security and prosperity of the United States. We have been blessed with an abundance of forest land, which has contributed immeasurably to building up this country and helping us to world leadership. But, until recent years, most of our forests were exploited with little or no thought to the future. We cannot afford this luxury again. Faced with the possibilities of a continuing emergency, common sense demands that we care for and use wisely this great resource so essential not only to a high standard of living but to our national defense. Under such a policy of wise use present timber growth could be increased, and our requirements for a multitude of essential commodities could be met without detriment to the watershed, wildlife, range, or recreational values of the forest.

With population on the increase and an expanded national defense effort now under way, emergency requirements for construction material, crating and boxing, paper, and many other products of the forest can be expected to mount. It is timely, therefore, that we take a fresh look at our position with regard to our forests and work toward a realistic and coordinated policy, easily understood and generally acceptable.

In World War II we cut deeply into our forest resources; it was part of the price of victory. For example, we put 25,000,000,000 board feet of lumber per year, or over half of the total national production, into military uses, compared to only about 300,000,000 board feet, or less than 2 percent as much, in normal times. In the days ahead when undoubtedly we shall again have to expand the use of forest resources to help defend our way of life, let us do so as efficiently as possible, and with a look to the future.

In the past half century we have learned much about reproducing and growing crops of trees and forage, and how to use their products more economically and efficiently. We have also learned much about managing watersheds, the range, and wildlife habitat. How to get this knowledge more generally applied is a real challenge. Certainly a strong and prosperous nation will require an abundance of forest products. Conversely, waste and inefficiency in the handling of these forest resources can invite disaster. It takes many years to grow a forest, but only a few minutes to destroy one.

What is our forest situation today? We need to know this to plan intelligently. Originally covering about half of the land surface of the United States, forests now occupy only about one-third of the total land area. Although we can anticipate minor shifts of some forest to cropland, it probably will be about offset by abandonment of cropland, so we need expect no great change in total forest area. Only about two-thirds of these forest lands can produce commercial crops of timber; the balance consists of areas which are too remote to be utilized, are chiefly valuable for soil and watershed protection, hunting, fishing, and other recreational use, and are inherently unproductive of timber, or are devoted exclusively to park purposes. We will concern ourselves here only with the commercial forests which cover 460,000,000 acres of land.

What do these forests mean to us? Foremost, they provide us with cellulose or wood—a material with thousands of uses—so essential to everyday life. Recent estimates show that about 55 percent of the timber harvested each year goes into lumber, 18 percent into fuel wood, 11 percent into pulpwood, and the balance into veneer logs, hewn railroad ties, round mine timbers, fence posts, cooperage, shingles, poles, and a multitude of other items. The value of these wood products—their harvesting, manufacture, transportation, and sale—puts several billions of dollars annually into the channels of commerce and provides a source of livelihood for more than 3,000,000 people. Many a community receives its major support from forest enterprises. In addition, the livestock products from the forest ranges, the enormous wildlife and recreational values, and the priceless protection which forests afford soils and watersheds represent an asset almost beyond computation.

Who owns the forests? Three-fourths of all commercial forest land belongs to more than 4,000,000 private owners, many of them farmers. In general, these are the more productive lands. Presently about 90 percent of the Nation's forest production comes from these private lands. The Nation, therefore, must look to private forests for most of its present and future supplies of forest products. The remaining one-fourth of the commercial forest is in National, State, county, municipal, and school forests, on Indian lands, or on the public domain.

There is a growing realization nowadays that ownership of a national resource carries with it a responsibility as well as a privilege. Forest owners have a major responsibility in properly caring for their forests. On the other hand, every American shares the responsibility for making possible the continued productiveness of these vitally important resources which are basic to our well-being. Thus, the general public should encourage and assist private owners to keep their timberlands productive. The Forest Service believes in building up our forest resources through individual initiative and cooperative endeavor under reasonable rules adopted through democratic processes. It believes that such rules are as necessary to resource management as they are to transportation, communication, and other enterprises that affect the public welfare.

What is the condition of the forests? A Forest Service appraisal made a few years ago showed the American forests are growing at a rate far below their productive capacity. This is due mainly to past treatment—as a rule, forests were overcut, burned, and generally uncared for. As a matter of fact, for many years it was believed that most of the cut-over land would be suited to and needed for farming—often, however, this did not prove to be the case. After the original old-growth forest was harvested, mostly during the last century, nature reclothed some of the land with a new timber stand, although many tracts were entirely denuded. However, unaided, natural restocking could not keep pace with cutting and fires. At present, less than 50 percent of our commercial forest land bears saw-timber stands.

Foresters tell us that we are still cutting saw timber faster than it is being replaced through growth, although the over-all cubic volume of annual forest growth and drain is almost in balance. Our softwood stands in particular are continuing to shrink, whereas the amount of lesser used and lesser valued hardwoods is on the increase. It is estimated that we have at least 50,000,000 acres of understocked or deforested but potentially productive lands that can be rehabilitated only by planting. (At present rates, it would take more than 100 years to complete this task.) About 70,000,000 acres of forest and watershed lands do not yet have organized fire protection, although a first principle of good forestry demands such protection. An urgent reason for 100-percent fire protection now is its importance to the country's defense activities. Protection from harmful diseases and insects is often more important than protection from fire and gives a continuing battle to forestry agencies. Many miles of new roads are needed to make possible the orderly harvesting of inaccessible old-growth timber on public lands in the West before it becomes decadent. Many western forest ranges have deteriorated due to overgrazing, and many woodland areas in the East need protection from livestock for maximum productiveness. Locally, deer and other wildlife species have become overabundant and destroyed tree reproduction. Evidence of excessive soil erosion on forest lands is commonplace. All this should dispel any complacency we might have as to the adequacy of present forestry practices. Also, let us not forget that forestry is a long-time undertaking—a tree planted today may not be harvested for 40 to 100 years?

Not until the early part of this century was a real start made toward the practice of forestry in this country. During the last 50 years, through trial and research, much has been learned about how best to care for forests to make them renewable and productive, and how to get maximum utilization from each tree harvested. The national forests, which make up 16 percent of the nation's commercial forest area, have been organized and placed under management. Last fiscal year (ending June 30, 1950) they yielded a total revenue of almost $34,000,000 (timber—3,500,000,000 board feet worth $29,379,217; grazing—1,100,000 cattle and horses, and 3,100,000 sheep and goats, $3,385,004; and miscellaneous receipts, $380,393); and this year the total promises to go much higher. (During the last 6 months of 1950, national forest receipts totaled $27,000,000.) A good share of this (25 percent) is returned to the States to be expended for the benefit of public schools and public roads within the counties where the national forests are located.

This group is, of course, interested primarily in wildlife. It is probably superfluous to mention to you, then, that the national forests constitute a hunting and fishing ground equivalent to about one-tenth of the total land area of the United States. As you know, the States make and enforce the laws necessary to protect and utilize these wildlife resources; the Forest Service gives primary attention to maintaining a habitat suited to wildlife. (It is estimated that 2,440,000 head of big game animals find shelter and food within the national forests.) Close cooperative relations between the States and the Forest Service have helped promote good hunting and fishing consistent with the protection and development of all the resources. Although wildlife in the national forests is often one of the major resource values, the Forest Service has in recent years been handicapped in habitat management work because of curtailment in regular funds for this purpose.

State forestry work, including the organized protection of State and private forests from fire, has made good progress in the last quarter century. A program of public aid in providing technical forestry assistance to small owners is now well under way. In the last 10 years industry has sponsored campaigns for better forestry, such as the tree farm and keep green programs. Here in Wisconsin there is an excellent example of industry leadership for better forestry in the work of Trees for Tomorrow, an organization sponsored by several pulp and paper companies to stimulate tree planting and better forestry on private lands. Management of privately owned forests to keep them continuously productive has increased greatly, particularly during the last decade. These private owners have a wonderful incentive to forestry practice—they have found that it pays good dividends and that it lessens transportation and other costs. Above all, however, it assures a future supply of raw materials, without which this industry cannot exist. Many private operators are actively buying land in the vicinity of their plants.

Although many notable gains have been made in both public and private forestry, we are still a long way from a satisfactory forest economy in this country. As an example of the timber situation in a single region, let us take a look at the Lake States (Michigan, Wisconsin, and Minnesota), where we are meeting today. From 1875 to 1900, this region led the Nation in lumber production, turning out from one-fourth to one-third of all the lumber cut, and much of it was shipped throughout the country. Today, Lake States mills account for only 3 to 4 percent of national lumber production, which does not begin to take care of the region's own needs; almost two-thirds of the lumber used here has to be imported, much of it from the Pacific coast, at a very high cost in freight alone.

The decline in lumbering has been offset in recent years by the growth of the pulp and paper industry. The Lake States region now produces more than 3,000,000 tons of paper and board annually, or about one-sixth of the output of the Nation. With good forestry practices and over a period of time, this trend can be reversed—not only can the Lake States region grow all the forest raw materials it needs, it can also have a balance for export.

There is little to be gained in placing the blame for mistakes of the past, although we do want to be assured that the same thing will not happen again. It is of more value now to take stock of our situation and decide how we can work together constructively for the future. This requires a broad plan or policy on which the majority can agree and within the framework of which we can strive toward an improved forest situation commensurate with our national needs. To build up the nation's forest resources so as to meet anticipated future demands and to place forestry on a sound business basis, a 3-point program has often been recommended by the Forest Service. This includes (1) an expanded program of public aid and service to private forest owners, including (a) more technical assistance to improve tree growth and obtain better use of wood, (b) additional help for nurseries and planting, (c) setting up a forest credit and insurance system, (d) improving tax laws where needed, (e) providing all State and private forest land with an adequate cooperative program of protection from fire, insects, and diseases, and (f) a strengthening of forest research; (2) a system of public regulation of cutting and other forest practices that will keep forest lands reasonably productive, recognizing that such legislation or Government direction will fail without full understanding and backing of the public at large (States that have made notable headway in this direction include Washington, Oregon, California, Maryland, Mississippi, New York, and Virginia among others); and (3) expansion and intensified protection and management of all public forests, many of which are at present inaccessible or too thinly manned to yield their potential forestry values.

The present strength and future security of our Nation depend in part on the abundance and productiveness of its forests. The values at stake concern industry, labor, the tax base, and the perpetuation of our free institutions. They must, therefore, be of concern to every citizen. To build these forests to full strength, to keep them abundantly productive, and to utilize them in full measure for human progress will require real partnership of effort, with public agencies, landowners, forest industries, labor, and the public at large all working together. Here is an opportunity to show the world an example of progress under the democratic way of life. Let's make this a better forested country for future generations in which to live and work.

Jurisdiction Over the Airspace Above Federal Territory

OF
HON. KENNETH B. KEATING
OF NEW YORK
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES
Thursday, March 22, 1951

Mr. KEATING. Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my remarks, I include a portion of an editorial from the Washington Post stressing the need for early passage of corrective legislation to confer jurisdiction on Federal courts to punish those who commit crimes in aircraft over Federal territory. We should not wait to take action on this important matter until some shocking crime has been perpetrated which goes unpunished on a technicality. The Post editorial follows:

Mr. Truman may be a bit chagrined to discover that the officer who forbade him to jump at Fort Bragg might have been assuming an authority that he really did not possess. The embarrassing truth seems to be that when an airplane is aloft over Federal territory or over the high seas, nobody posseses any authority over anybody. Each occupant of the plane is a law unto himself, as the saying goes, since something like the pure anarchic state of nature, as described by Tom Hobbes, appears to prevail. We confess we did not realize this ourselves until the point was brought up by Representative KEATING, of New York. According to Mr. KEATING, you can get away with almost anything, including murder and sabotage, in an airplane once it is off the ground, simply because the Federal authority has now no legal power to punish any crimes committed up there; so that if you feel like beating your wife, for example, all you need do is to charter a plane and entice her aboard; and if the pilot intervenes, you can beat him too—if you think you are strong enough. Mr. KEATING thinks that this inadequacy in the Federal statutes needs to be corrected at once and we heartily agree.

The St. Lawrence Seaway

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. LOUIS C. RABAUT
OF MICHIGAN
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES
Thursday, March 22, 1951

Mr. RABAUT. Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my remarks, I include a copy of a speech delivered by me through the facilities of radio station WJR, Detroit, on Friday, March 9, in support of the St. Lawrence seaway.

The atmosphere of world conditions forces a reorientation of our thinking on the St. Lawrence seaway. Now, more than ever before, the principal value of the seaway lies in its importance to the national defense, because industrial production is by far the most important single aspect of the strength we must have to preserve the peace of the world or to defend ourselves in case of attack.

In this speech, which was made a part of the Your Congress series of programs by station WJR, I have pointed out the reasons why the St. Lawrence seaway affects every American citizen in every corner of the Nation.

Good evening, ladies and gentlemen. I deeply appreciate the invitation of radio station WJR to participate in the series of programs entitled "Your Congress." WJR performs a distinct public service through these programs and deserves the commendation of all its listeners.

If you have been following the developments in Washington for the past few weeks you know that there is once again before the Congress the proposal for approving the agreement between this country and Canada relating to the construction of the St. Lawrence seaway and power project. To most Midwesterners, this subject has become a familiar one in the 24 years since it was first proposed, and most of us are well acquainted with the arguments that have been advanced in support of the seaway. We have a deep personal interest in the project because our lives are deeply involved in the manufacturing activity of this region. We know that if our industries move elsewhere in conformity with the hard and fast rules of economic life, the Midwest will be transformed into one huge ghost town. The decline of Lake Superior iron ore foretells the disappearance of large-scale industrial activity in the Midwest, unless the St. Lawrence seaway is constructed to provide easy access to the one most promising new source of ore in Labrador.

There are reams of arguments, surveys, reports, analyses, charts, maps, and so forth that bear out these facts. The law of nature is inexorable, "either grow or die" and we know that the seaway is the key to our growth in the years ahead.

As important as it is that the people of the Midwest avoid this economic nightmare, there is yet one overreaching consideration which should win the approval of every American citizen in every corner of the Nation—namely—the intimate relation of the seaway to our national defense. The seaway is vital to Americans—as Americans—and sectional interests are narrow and short-sighted in comparison.

Let us put the case in one-two order.

Using Labrador ore, a new industrial pattern will be built around the east coast ports of Philadelphia and Baltimore as the unloading and transshipment depots. The National Security Resources Board estimates that the cost of this route to the steel industry centered in and around Pittsburgh, will not differ materially from the cost of shipping from Labrador to Pittsburgh via the proposed St. Lawrence seaway.

It is quite a different story, however, with regard to the steel manufacturing centers with ports on Lake Erie. Shipping costs via the seaway to Lorain, Ohio, and east, including Cleveland and Buffalo, would approximate $2.15, assuming a 50-cent toll per ton. The cost via any ocean and rail transportation route would be about 75 cents higher, so that the seaway represents a saving of about 26 percent on every ton of ore brought into the country.

This consideration of savings in the cost of ore, steel, and products made from steel is vital to America at this time. Soaring defense costs since the outbreak of the Korean War are startling evidence of the staggering burden any full-scale military production effort would place upon the economy. Viewed in this light, the seaway is actually a cost-reducing investment.

Top defense officials—the Joint Chiefs of Staff included—endorse the seaway for more than mere economic reasons. The St. Lawrence seaway has a prominent place in the strategy of those entrusted with the defense of the Nation.

The ocean route from Labrador to Philadelphia covers 1,390 miles of open sea—sea lanes which in wartime would be infested with long-range, snorkel-type submarines, forcing a constant patrol by our naval forces at an added expense in money, ships, and men. Ore carriers are prime targets for enemy submarines as was proved by our experience in World War II. Bethlehem Steel lost five of the seven ships it had in service transporting ore from Chile to Sparrows Point, Md. For understandable reasons, the company withdrew the other two ships from service and we thus lost an important source of ore for emergency steel production.

The seaway, while vulnerable to some extent from sabotage, could be defended and patrolled at a much lower cost to the military than could this route over some of the worst water in the Atlantic ocean, and with a much lower risk of loss.

No military commander ever knowingly exposes or over-extends his lines of supply so as to make them vulnerable to enemy attack. No military commander establishes his supply dumps within the range of enemy artillery. Yet this is precisely the set-up when the terminal points for iron ore imports are the east-coast ports and the industries have moved closer to these points, driven there by inexorable economic reasons.

In other words, the military axiom, protect your lines of supply, is an imperative rule of action for the United States, dictating the construction of the seaway.

There is yet another factor which begs our consideration. We all know that our industrial activity is in a period of technological development. Nuclear fission is in the process of revolutionizing the art of manufacturing. But behind the glittering success story of atomic energy development there is the modern commonplace of hydroelectric power. We built the Oak Ridge atomic development plant close to the source of TVA electrical energy, and this same electric power figures strongly in other phases of the production side of modern warfare. Aluminum is a prime example in this regard.

The St. Lawrence power project will develop more of this vitally needed power than the TVA plants, and its enormous output will allow for expanding industrial development and rehabilitation in the New York-New England region where manufacturers now pay the highest power rates in the country.

It is significant to note at this point what is going on in the rest of the world with regard to inland waterways and power-development projects.

Throughout the Communist world the Soviet publicity organs are beating the drums in the approved Bolshevik style, announcing the expected completion in 1952, 2 years ahead of schedule, of a vast canal system linking the Black, Caspian, Baltic, and White Seas. The great inland plains of Russia will then be served by five oceans, according to the Red press agents. This will facilitate the transfer of ships from one major area to another. It gives them transportation routes for coal and construction materials which cannot be reached by any other naval power.

Perhaps more ominous than this far-flung canal system are the two enormous hydroelectric projects, one at Kuibyshev, the other at Stalingrad, lower down the Volga River. Between them they will generate 20,000,000,000 kilowatt-hours annually, and the plant at Kuibyshev will be the most powerful hydroelectric plant in the world.

Despite the peaceful purposes for the power described by the Russians, it is significant that the Council of Ministers of the Soviet Union has directed the transmission of 10,000,000,000 kilowatt-hours annually to a single point 500 to 625 miles distant from the source. Within that radius lie the Ural Mountains with their large deposits of uranium ore and the industrial center of Magnitogorsk, the arsenal of the Red army.

Tying all these ideas together, I believe we see with startling clarity the advantages of a secure and economical traffic artery for our iron ore and the development of powerful new sources of electric energy. And if we face the facts of international life we realize that these advantages may mean our survival as a free Nation.

The masters of the Kremlin, of course, do not have to put up with powerful lobbyists; they do not have to pacify selfish local interests and the costs of slave labor are never prohibitive. In the United States, however, we are hampered, in a sense, by the demands of the democratic process.

We have had nothing but foot-dragging on the part of Congress in getting ahead with the job. Endorsement by every President since Coolidge has been ineffective and meanwhile the American people wait.

Despite this, ladies and gentlemen, it is a blunt, hard, and obvious fact that we can no longer afford to drag our feet. We must begin at once, through the construction of the St. Lawrence seaway and power project to serve and safeguard our national interest.

We must begin at once a job that too long has been pushed aside, a job that has taken on life and death significance for every American citizen.

Personal Appearance?

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. MELVIN PRICE
OF ILLINOIS
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES
Thursday, March 22, 1951

Mr. PRICE. Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my remarks in the RECORD, I include herewith an editorial which appeared in the East St. Louis (Ill.) Journal on March 20, 1951:

PERSONAL APPEARANCE?

Senator HARRY CAIN selects a poor time to suggest that Gen. Douglas MacArthur be ordered before Congress to tell it just what is needed to win victory and peace in Korea.

CAIN claims MacArthur is as tragic a figure as is to be found in all history, because he is required to send his men out to die in Korea without being able to offer them the prospect of eventual victory.

Thus the Washington State Republican relegates himself to the ranks of other Americans who have from time to time attempted to have MacArthur brought back to the United States. Most of us would welcome his homecoming in order to accord him the ovation he earned during World War II, and has enhanced in Korea. Others, such as Senator CAIN, have less wholesome reasons.

General MacArthur has not been home since 1937. He did come as far as Hawaii in August 1944, when he conferred with the late President Franklin D. Roosevelt. And last year, he met with President Truman in similar conference on a Pacific island.

He had planned a visit to the United States in 1948, but after learning the proposed return was being seized upon for political purposes, he deferred that visit. In peacetime, he reiterated that duty held him to his post in Japan. With the commencement of hostilities in Korea, the reason for his stay is obvious.

Senator CAIN, then, wants a MacArthur report to Congress, but it would appear he is skipping a few channels of command in his thoughtless suggestion. General MacArthur is a soldier; responsible only to the President, the Commander in Chief; and to the Joint Chiefs of Staff. He has no obligation of Congress. If his military superiors feel Congress needs more information, it is their privilege to appear before its Members. These superiors get frequent reports from MacArthur—how many and what they contain we cannot know for security reasons—and MacArthur himself is liberal with statements to the American press in Tokyo.

A MacArthur appearance before Congress would be an exciting show, one Senator Cain and his colleagues could enjoy, but it is doubtful whether the general would get any sound advice from the Members nor whether he could tell them anything they could not now learn. General MacArthur is in the middle of a job, and we can reserve the festivities for later.

Vast Possibilities Before Us

OF
HON. HAROLD D. COOLEY
OF NORTH CAROLINA
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES
Thursday, March 22, 1951

Mr. COOLEY. Mr. Speaker, I take pleasure in calling attention to an editorial written by Mr. Sanford Martin in the Journal and Sentinel of Winston-Salem, N. C., on March 19, 1951, in which reference is made to our distinguished colleague, Congressman THURMOND CHATHAM:

VAST POSSIBILITIES BEFORE US

Representative THURMOND CHATHAM has strong faith in the possibilities and the future of northwest North Carolina. He has manifested this faith in many ways which have included action as well as words. Therefore, the 1,200 farmers and businessmen who heard him speak at the ninth annual Farmers' Day observance in Elkin this week were convinced of his complete sincerity when he said:

"Either for agriculture or industry, I do not believe there is a better location in the world today than our area, from the mountains to the coastal plains. We have the climate. We have the soil. We are close to markets. We have transportation and communications—and, most important of all, we have the right kind of people."

In this statement Mr. CHATHAM listed five assets, which if exploited to the fullest should make the economy of this section among the most prosperous in the Nation. By exploiting our climate, soil, marketing possibilities and transportation and communications advantages intelligently and going forward with the program of educating and training our people both in the academic and vocational sense, we can expand our agriculture, our tourist business, our mechanical industry, make the most of our dairying, fruit growing and mining possibilities, and develop the type of agrarian and urban leadership essential to an ever forward movement of progress.

In recent decades the northwest section of North Carolina has made remarkable progress in almost all these fields. But any competent observer is cognizant that up to now the surface has merely been scratched. In the light of the truly amazing natural resources and potentialities of our section of the State and Nation, our progress thus far indeed seems very slight.

As we enter the new era which has been opened up by great advance in the development of electric power and the discovery of atomic energy, northwest North Carolina faces the most inviting opportunity of its history to apply its native energy, its growing vision, and its increasing knowledge and skills to the upbuilding of the most promising section of the South's "most progressive State." (Winston-Salem Journal.)

A Loophole To Be Plugged

OF
HON. KENNETH B. KEATING
OF NEW YORK
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES
Thursday, March 22, 1951

Mr. KEATING. Mr. Speaker, there can be no justification for continuing the tax-free allowance to the President, Vice President, Speaker, and Members of Congress. They should be required to itemize and justify the expenses connected with the conduct of their offices in just the same way any other taxpayer has to do.

The working man or woman quite properly wonders what there is fair about a deal whereby he cannot even deduct his bus or streetcar fare to work as a necessary expense when the President of the United States on top of his salary is given $50,000 tax-free to spend as he sees fit without any accounting.

Under leave to extend my remarks, I include editorials on this subject from the Portland (Maine) Evening Express and Rochester (N. Y.) Times-Union:

[From the Portland (Maine) Evening Express of February 7, 1951]

TAX-FREE FAIR DEALERS

Taxpayers may possibly derive some joy, in these gray days, from the recollection that the Fair Deal Seventy-ninth Congress voted to each of its Members a $2,500 tax-free expense account, not subject to any accounting.

Taxpayers may further cheer themselves by remembering that Harry S. Truman's salary as President was increased from $75,000 to $100,000 a year by the Fair Deal Eighty-first Congress, and that, at the same time, that Democratic Congress gave the President a $50,000 tax-free expense account for which he is not required to make any accounting.

The Democrats in the Eighty-first Congress also thought it well to increase Vice President ALBEN BARKLEY'S salary to $30,000 and to favor him with a $10,000 tax-free expense account. And they very thoughtfully also awarded a $10,000 allowance to Speaker of the House SAM RAYBURN, for which no accounting is required.

New York's Republican Representative KENNETH B. KEATING, who observes pointedly that "everyone incurs such expenses in connection with his work, for which he is denied any tax exemption," now proposes that the President, the Vice President, the Speaker of the House, and the Members of the Senate and the House of Representatives be held accountable for tax purposes—just as all other Americans are held accountable—for those items in the income of each described under the heading, "Expenses."

All of us have to pay bus fare, or have to pay the bills for owning, licensing, insuring, and maintaining some kind of an automobile, in order to get from home to work and from work to home; but our expenditures for such necessary expense are not tax free. Had you noticed? Mr. KEATING thinks the expenses of the President and Congressmen likewise should be taxed.

Accordingly, this New York Republican has introduced a bill to amend the pertinent statutes relating to compensation, to provide that those expense accounts which the Democrats have made tax-free in recent congressional sessions shall be added, henceforth, to the salaries of the President, Vice President, Speaker of the House, and Members of Congress, "so that the total compensation will be subject to income tax."

This being the Fair Deal, and all of its adherents—from the President down—being devoted to the principle of sharing the wealth, we lowly taxpayers may of course assume that all of these, "our leaders," will now heap gladsome praises upon Representative KEATING for having thus brought to their attention a method whereby each may share more fully with us in the matter of paying taxes.

We "little people," who cannot deduct bus fare as a legitimate expense when figuring our income-tax returns can, of course, expect Mr. Truman to leap at the opportunity to have his $50,000-a-year expense account lumped with his $100,000 salary for tax purposes.

Actually, to be sure, the President's expense account—for which he has not been held accountable—amounts to $90,000 over and above his salary. He had a $40,000 expense allowance before the Democrats voted him the additional $50,000 in 1949.

Moreover, in addition to the $100,000 salary and the $90,000 tax-free expense allowance which, in our crude way, we shall call his take-home pay, our leader is granted the use—at the expense of all taxpayers—of various luxurious airplanes, 35 White House automobiles, the yacht Williamsburg (even the millionaire Roosevelt got along nicely with a relatively tiny minesweeper, for his week-end seafaring), a private pullman car, a vacation retreat at Key West, Fla., and another "Shangri-La" in Maryland. The estimated annual cost of the staff and upkeep for these items, Representative KEATING finds, is about $1,500,000. That's all over and above the actual take-home pay.

"I know of no group of our people who need more to be reminded that their compensation is subject to tax," says Representative KEATING, "than do the President and Members of Congress."

KENNETH B. KEATING, we love you. Carry on.

[From the Rochester (N. Y.) Times-Union]

KEATING BILL SHOULD PASS

Special tax privileges for officeholders do not sit well with ordinary taxpaying citizens at any time. When ordinary taxes go to the height they will—and should—this year, special privileges become causes for downright complaint.

Congress was unwise some years ago when it voted itself and top members of the executive branch a tax-free raise in salary disguised as an expense account. The President pays no tax on $50,000 he receives in addition to his $100,000 salary. Nor do the Vice President and Speaker of the House pay on $10,000 expense receipts. Congressmen get $2,500 which is untaxed.

Representative KENNETH KEATING has introduced a bill to remove the tax exemptions on these items. This is the honest thing to do. It eliminates subterfuge and special privilege. It may be, as some Congressmen argue, that the bill will not add to revenues because the money goes for expenses that are deductible. But the ordinary taxpayer, struggling with his own tax bill, will thank KEATING for this bill. It ought to pass in the interest of taxpayer morale.

We Should Speed Up the Construction of Rural Hospitals Under the Hill-Burton Hospital Construction Act

OF

HON. CARL ELLIOTT

OF ALABAMA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Thursday, March 22, 1951

Mr. ELLIOTT. Mr. Speaker, it will soon be time to again appropriate money for hospital and health-center construction under the Hill-Burton hospital program.

This program was, in my judgment, unnecessarily delayed during this fiscal year when the Bureau of the Budget last year arbitrarily cut the appropriation for Federal contributions to hospital and health-center construction projects by 50 percent, reducing the amount available from $150,000,000 to $75,000,000, to which $13,000,000 was later added by a supplemental appropriation.

The Korean War has created an emergency in our way of life, and we as a nation are faced with the possibility of seeing our cities and industrial centers, and their hospitals, destroyed by enemy bombs.

Therefore, the rural hospital assumes a new significance, over and above its peacetime importance, as an evacuation facility to care for those who might be injured by enemy bombing of our cities.

Latest figures show that we need an additional 1,000,000 hospital beds to fulfill peacetime requirements. A large proportion of these beds are needed in rural America.

As a part of my remarks, I include an address by Dr. John W. Cronin, Chief, Division of Hospital Facilities, United States Public Health Service, delivered at the American Hospital Association convention in Atlantic City, N. J., September 20, 1950, and entitled "Are We Building Too Many Small Hospitals?":

ARE WE BUILDING TOO MANY SMALL HOSPITALS?

Exactly 3 years ago (in September 1947) the first project was initially approved for Federal aid under the Hill-Burton program. This was for a new 50-bed general hospital to be located in a southern town of under 2,000 people. The nearest general hospital—a 40-bed facility—was 30 miles away; the nearest sizable hospital—one with 255 beds—was twice that far. The new hospital project was sponsored by the county, a fairly poor county compared with most others in the State.

My reason for mentioning this bit of history is to show that, from the very beginning, the program has done its best to carry out its aim of building hospitals where they are needed the most—in places where hospital care has not been within easy reach, where the area is rural, and where income is low.

In the 3 years which have passed since approval of this project, nearly 1,500 others have been initially approved. Through these, more than 65,000 hospital beds are to be provided. Total construction costs for all projects have now reached the one billion mark with the Federal Government contributing about one-third of this amount. Final approval has now been given to more than 1,000 projects, that is, blueprints and specifications have been approved, sites have been acquired and building preparations begun. But more important, as of today 200 projects have been completed and are now providing community hospital or public health services.

WHAT ARE WE BUILDING?

Of all projects approved so far, more than three-fourths are for general hospital construction. When we talk of hospital construction projects we mean not only the building of an entirely new facility, but also the building of an addition or the remodeling of an already existing hospital. Next in order of number are public health centers—about 16 percent of all projects. Then follow mental hospital projects—about 5 percent of the total; tuberculosis projects—3 percent; and chronic-disease projects—less than 1 percent.

As for construction costs, general hospitals again account for the major share—85 percent—of the total, and for a like percentage of the Federal share of the costs. Public health centers, while holding second place in number of projects, take last place in the share of construction costs, largely because of their relatively low cost per project.

So far, then, most of the emphasis in the program has been on general hospital facilities. How, exactly what do we know about these projects? Just what are they, where are they, and how large are they?

First of all, about one-half of the general hospital projects are for completely new hospitals. The balance is made up of projects for the replacement of old buildings or for additions or alterations to existing ones. Most of the new hospitals are being built in small towns and in the smaller cities; at least 70 percent of the new general projects are located in places with populations below 5,000. Only 12 percent are in communities of more than 10,000.

As we might expect, the projects for replacing, altering, or adding to already-existing hospitals are generally from the larger cities; only one-fourth are from towns with less than 5,000 population.

Now, as to the size of new general hospitals being built under this program, two-thirds will have less than 50 beds. Only 1 out of 10 will have 100 beds or more. On the other hand, most of the hospitals which are being replaced, or are having additions or alterations to their present buildings, are medium-sized or larger hospitals.

We can now see the evolving general pattern of this program. General hospital projects predominate; half of these are for completely new facilities which, for the most part, are located in small towns. As a rule, the new facilities will have less than 50 beds.

For the moment, let us define these hospitals of less than 50 beds as the small hospitals. This is quite usual, I believe, if we limit our thinking to the number of beds a facility contains. Some of the details about these so-called small hospital projects, I feel sure, will interest you.

Nearly two-thirds of the new small facilities will have from 20 to 35 beds. Some of the even smaller projects with 10 to 15 beds, probably should be called community clinics rather than general hospitals. Nevertheless, they do meet specifications for a hospital in that they will provide 24-hour service.

Practically none of these new small hospitals are being built in the large population centers. Two-thirds of the new projects calling for less than 50 beds are in towns of less than 2,500 people. Nearly all are in towns of less than 5,000.

While the small hospital predominates among all new general hospital projects, we find a somewhat different story when we look at the distribution of Federal construction funds. Here we see that little more than one-third of the Federal money being used for all new general hospital projects is for small facilities, that is, for those with less than 50 beds. Actually, this is to be expected since we are well aware that the larger institution, because of its more elaborate and more complete facilities, costs more per bed than the small institution.

In this brief review one fact stands out—the small general hospital (small, that is, in number of beds) is occupying a prominent place in the hospital construction program. Is this right, or are we building too many of these small facilities?

WHY BUILD SMALL HOSPITALS?

In answering this question, let us first find out why we spend any time and money in building 25-, 30-, or 40-bed hospitals. It is true that they are not utilized as fully as larger facilities, because the small hospital does not have the flexibility of use that is found in the larger hospital. It is also true that they do not provide the variety of service that can be given in the larger hospitals. What, then, makes them necessary?

In every State there are some communities, in fact whole areas, where no hospital facilities of any kind exist. Most of these are small towns and rural areas. The nearest hospital may be from 30 to 50 miles away. Yet the people in these communities are just as likely to need hospital care as the people in a larger city where the hospital may be only a few blocks away. Don't forget that last year, 1 out of every 8 persons in the United States was hospitalized. During every hour that we are sitting in these meeting, 900 people are being admitted to hospitals throughout the country. These are people of all kinds, from every occupation, with high and with low incomes. They come from cities, and they also come from small towns and rural communities. Many are traveling an hour—probably longer—to the nearest hospital because their home town has no facility available.

Under the Hill-Burton program, each of the States has investigated its hospital-facilities situation. Each has outlined hospital-service areas where general-hospital facilities should be available to the areas' residents.

Each has given high-construction priority to those areas where facilities are needed but are completely inadequate or entirely lacking. The majority of these are small rural localities. As a result of the incentive given under the Hill-Burton program, communities in many of these service-needy areas have raised funds and submitted approved plans for local hospitals. Generally speaking, the hospitals planned are small; usually because the expected immediate demand for hospital care does not warrant a larger facility. In some instances community funds have placed a limit on the size of the facility that can be built.

Here are some facts that will interest you. So far, a total of 350 small general hospital projects (that is, projects calling for hospitals with less than 50 beds) have been approved. Well over one-fourth of these are being located in service areas which heretofore had no general hospital; another one-fourth are being located in areas that have no facilities which meet the State standards for an acceptable hospital. The remainder are in areas where some facilities exist but where they are completely inadequate to meet the need for hospital care. Nearly all of these are in rural areas, according to the States' classification.

You will also be interested in a recent study of the distance of these new small general hospitals from the nearest other facility. The study included new hospitals with 25 beds or less and covered about 20 States. As a rule, the next nearest facility was about 25 miles distant. Frequently, this was found to be a nonacceptable institution, according to State standards. The range in distance, as we would expect, was wide. Some of the new hospitals are being built in communities where another facility already exists, but others were found to be anywhere from 100 to 150 miles from another general hospital, regardless of its size or its acceptability. When distance was measured to the nearest facility of 50 beds or larger, the average distance was found to be about 45 miles. Again, of course, the range in distance was wide.

Many small hospitals are being built, that is true. But they are bringing or will soon bring some hospital service to areas where the need has been critical. These small hospitals have the potentiality of growing into more effective-sized institutions when demand for service increases or when additional funds for expansion become available. Our data from the State plans and from the project applications show that, in general, this is the case. On the average, the approved new hospitals of less than 50 beds will meet only about half the number of beds needed in their areas.

For many years we have been talking about the shortage of physicians in our smaller towns and rural areas. We all know why this shortage exists. Physicians naturally locate in communities where they can make the best use of their medical training. Modern medical training puts heavy emphasis on the use of instruments of precision in diagnostic and treatment facilities. What chance has a small community, without any type of hospital or clinical facility, to attract and keep a doctor? Few physicians willingly settle in small towns, away from the hospital equipment they need and depend upon and cut off from other medical connection. Few are willing to accept medical isolation. Recently, however, we have been given a good demonstration of how doctors can be attracted to practice in a rural State. Perhaps all of you are familiar with the Kansas program. Under the leadership of Dr. Franklin D. Murphy, dean of the University of Kansas medical center, the State has embarked on a three-point campaign: First, the provision of clinics and hospitals in rural communities; second, expansion of medical training facilities in the State; and third, the development of intensive training and refresher courses for the rural physician. This plan and similar ones in other States have been meeting with great success. In Kansas, rural communities have launched fund drives for the building of clinics and hospitals. With the prospect of up-to-date working facilities at hand, young physicians are being encouraged to take up practice in previously doctorless areas. The medical center is being expanded with grants approved by the State legislature. Traveling lecture teams are keeping the country doctor up-to-date on medical and surgical topics. The citizens of the community derive the benefits of this type of modern medical care. Health maintenance is becoming more possible day by day.

There is a psychological factor in the building of a small local hospital that we must not overlook. Sick people want to be near their own homes, their families and friends. When hospitalization becomes necessary, but local facilities are lacking, the sick person has no choice but to seek hospital care in another community where the needed service is available. As I have pointed out before, this other community may be 30, 40, or 50 miles distant—often too far for frequent visits from friends and relatives. Experience has shown that loneliness and worry over families can delay recovery for many patients.

PROBLEMS OF THE SMALL HOSPITAL

The small local hospitals, while filling definite needs in many communities, are nevertheless faced with serious problems.

The small hospital, obviously, cannot afford to provide many of the services needed by the people in the community. Consequently, it loses many patients to the larger city hospitals where more complete services are available. The result has been that the average small general hospital can count on being used to a lesser percent of its capacity than the larger hospital because of its lack of flexibility of use.

Low occupancy rates in small hospitals can also be traced to the economic resources of the community. In general, small communities have a greater concentration of low- than of high-income families. Experience has shown a definite relationship between the demand for hospital care and the ability to pay for it; the lower the financial resources of a community, the lower the use of hospital beds.

Because of the relatively low income in small towns and rural communities, charges for hospital care must be kept comparatively low. As a result, the small hospital in the small community has found it difficult to hold aside sufficient funds for the purchase and maintenance of modern equipment, or for the employment of specialized personnel.

This leads us to an additional problem—the temptation given to the small-hospital staff to perform services beyond their skills. The less common surgical problems may be undertaken by the local physician who lacks the special skill required. X-ray and other specialized apparatus may be used by physicians or other hospital personnel who are inadequately trained in their use. The results, too frequently, may bring harm to the patient.

These are a few of the problems which the small hospital faces. We know that there is a real need for the small facility in many small communities and rural areas. Let me make clear, at this point, that we do not believe in the indiscriminate building of small hospitals in all rural areas. There are many rural sections where sparsity of population, low income, transportation, and geographical factors make the provision of any type of hospital facility impractical. We do believe in providing such facilities where they can effectively serve their purpose of bringing needed medical service to the popuation. To make certain that a facility is needed—that it can be used effectively—requires careful study and sound community planning.

Where the situation clearly demonstrates the need for the small hospital we believe necessary aid should be given for its provision. But our efforts must not stop there. If so, we would merely be encouraging the growth of additional facilities which face the prospect of low efficiency, high operating costs, inadequate support, and the provision of a low quality of care.

COORDINATION IS THE ANSWER

Under the Hill-Burton program our goal is the provision of better hospital care for all people. One step toward this goal is the construction of the necessary physical facilities. This we are now doing. But of greater importance is assuring that these facilities provide efficient and effective service. This can best be accomplished, we believe, by bringing about greater coordination and cooperation among hospitals. We have good evidence that the small hospital cannot hope, by itself, to provide many of the services needed by the people it serves. The solution is to develop relationships among hospitals whereby the larger and more completely equipped and staffed facilities can provide smaller hospitals with the needed services. Our concept of a regional coordination system includes many lines of affiliation among hospitals. For example, we envision the exchange of knowledge related to modern hospital practices and services; provision of interm or resident service on a rotating basis to hospitals which otherwise would not have the advantage of such services; the provision of consultation and part-time specialist services, including radiology and pathology, to small institutions; clinical conferences in small community hospitals; continuation courses for all classes of hospital personnel; postgraduate training of physicians from small communities; stimulation and exchange of information on improved hospital administrative methods; joint planning of hospital and public-health programs; and the formation of regional hospital councils.

Such cooperation can be without loss to the hospital of its individuality, initiative, and local responsibility. Rather, it would act as a stimulus to enlarged responsibility, toward retention of professional personnel in rural areas, and to improved patient care. Participation in the program should be completely voluntary. Any group of hospitals should be free to form a council or not as they wished, and any hospital within a region should be free to join or not join the council, as it saw fit.

The experience of a few regionalization programs has given good evidence of the benefits that result. We can look to the program of the Bingham Associates, in New England, to see the great advantages which have accrued to the small rural communities served. Regional programs in Michigan, Virginia, and in the Rochester region in New York likewise demonstrate the benefits which are gained through coordination of hospital services.

Under the Hill-Burton program, each State has outlined a proposed program of coordination among hospitals within hospital service regions. However, in all except a very few places, these plans exist on paper only. Encouragement for the real development of such programs came with the passage of an amendment to the Hospital Construction Act which provides for grants for experiments in regional coordination. When funds provided by this amendment become available, these paper plans can develop into reality.

Let me emphasize that we are not building small hospitals with the intent that they should stand alone. We are thinking of these hospitals as a necessary link in a coordinated system. The small hospital has a real and distinct place in the provision of medical service in its own community, for it is ultimately the community hospital which will be a determining factor whether good or poor medicine is to be practiced in the community. In the future, the smallness of a hospital will no longer be determined by its size, but rather in terms of the service which it makes available to its patients. Under a system which coordinates and integrates the services of its affiliated hospitals, the services which the 50-bed facility can provide are as broad as those of the largest medical center.

It would be a serious omission to conclude this address without a look at the future. The international situation is disturbing to all of us. Our cultural pattern, our way of life, definitely changed on June 25, 1950, with the Korean incident. Our international, national, and personal tranquility has been thrown out of balance.

Those of us who deal with services to our fellow men in time of illness during peace have an even greater responsibility during the preparations for defense of our country against an aggressor. No one can dispute the fact that we need at present more, better, and serviceable health facilities—hospitals, health centers, and community clinics. The State plans show a minimum need of 900,000 additional beds in all categories. We must achieve that goal for even a peacetime existence.

Those State plans in arriving at that minimum did not take into consideration atomic warfare, bacteriological warfare, or radiological warfare. Today we are face to face with those factors as part of our everyday life.

In preparing to meet such a way of life, we must consider industrial mobilization, agricultural mobilization and in fact the mobilization of all our resources directed at supporting our combat forces and also supporting our civil defense plans against an aggressor approaching our Nation by air, by land, by sea, or from within our borders.

The hospital survey and construction program must be attuned to the cultural pattern of today, not the one that existed before Korea became the percussion cap in the explosion of our struggle for democracy versus communism. The Federal Government and the States, through the machinery of the Hill-Burton program, can work together in defining the need for and methods of acquiring hospitals and related health facilities in and on the periphery of the critical areas of possible attack and of industrial mobilization. This may mean, at the proper time, new factors in the formula of establishing priorities for construction and even, in some instances, types of hospital construction. The degree of population shifts incident to the fracture of our society brought about by war with its various economic, social, and financial aspects all must and will be considered. Adequate plans must be made not in the months and years to come but now. The development of these plans is already under way. Coordination and cooperation are the keys to its success. I feel certain that we in the hospital and health field in Government and in all our States will make our contribution at the proper time, in an adequate proportion, and supported by the conviction that a nation with good health resources, properly organized, is a strong and prepared nation for any eventuality.

Reconstruction Finance Corporation

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. JOHN D. DINGELL
OF MICHIGAN

Thursday, March 22, 1951

Mr. DINGELL. Mr. Speaker, during these hectic days when everybody seems under fire for one reason or another, we are prone to overlook the great good accomplished by some of our governmental agencies while we exaggerate their faults and weaknesses. Of course, we should strive for perfection in all things in and out of Government. But let us proceed cautiously when we contemplate the abolition of the Reconstruction Finance Corporation because it has served well the purpose for which it was established. This despite the outcropping of human weakness which comes to the surface from time to time but which on the whole is rare. Reconstruction Finance Corporation was scarcely launched when the first big scandal broke and almost wrecked its reputation and effectiveness. I recall the Charley Dawes move when he as head of this very agency now under fire used the credit of the Reconstruction Finance Corporation to bail out his foundering banks in Chicago, then resigned leaving the portfolio of the agency stuffed with worthless Insull paper, which to this day, so far as I am able to learn, has never been revitalized or made to be worth anything. Just from memory I recall that the worthless loan amounted to $92,000,000 and was never repaid. It was a total loss. Despite this early jolt the Reconstruction Finance Corporation survived and served for the most part thereafter the interests of small business, and as I want to point out, has shown an over-all profit to the Government of the United States.

The Reconstruction Finance Corporation needs no defense at my hands, a fur coat or a 5 percent commission in evidence to the contrary notwithstanding. I submit that an agency which in 19 years of its existence made and serviced 631,351 business loans totaling $16,000,000,000 with losses of only $134,000,000 and withal had shown a net profit of $600,000,000 is not a corrupt or loosely run enterprise. The record of the Reconstruction Finance Corporation is doubly commendable when we take into consideration the fact that for the most part, if not altogether, the loans were made during depressed or emergency times upon such applications as were rejected by the local banks throughout the Nation. Under the law the Reconstruction Finance Corporation is compelled to examine applications of clients and consider loans that have been rejected by banks because of a potential risk. Many loans made by RFC are rejected by commercial banks for reasons of their own or are prohibited by banking laws. If it were not so these applications for loans would be be grabbed up by the local banks. Thus Reconstruction Finance Corporation gets the milk after the cream has been skimmed.

I am confronted with a bit of favorable evidence in the news article by the well known and able Martin S. Hayden of the Detroit News staff and syndicated through the North American Newspapers Alliance which appeared in the Sunday Star of March 18, 1951, which cannot be refuted. Mr. Hayden merely reports upon the facts as a newspaperman, he does not editorialize or color his interview with Walter E. Cosgriff, director of the Reconstruction Finance Corporation, who properly indicts the privately owned national banking system for failing in its job and the proof is in the article which I submit herewith. More such bold counterattacks should be delivered by the directors and other officials of the agency whenever they have the facts and the performance on their side.

The unfortunately sordid and seamy side of Reconstruction Finance Corporation's operations has been exaggerated and overemphasized out of all proportion while the wholesome and productive story in its favor has been suppressed or ignored.

DIRECTOR COSGRIFF DEFENDS RFC AS ESSENTIAL TO UNITED STATES ECONOMY—ASSAILS PRIVATE BANKS AS UNWILLING TO MEET NATIONAL CREDIT NEEDS

(By Martin S. Hayden)

Assailing the privately owned national banking system for failing in its job, Reconstruction Finance Corporation Director Walter E. Cosgriff yesterday called for a housecleaning of those who have abused authority. He urged the continuance of RFC as an essential to American economy.

The former president of a 16-unit western banking chain and the only RFC director so far untouched by Fulbright committee criticism, Mr. Cosgriff answered in an interview those calling for abolition of the loan agency.

"No one called for abolition of the Army when Maj. Gen. Benny Meyers went to jail," Mr. Cosgriff protested.

The 19-year-old RFC must continue, he contends, because the Nation's private banking system is either unable or unwilling to meet national credit needs.

SAYS AGENCY MUST CONTINUE

"If both long-term loans and the financing of such large new enterprises as the Kaiser-Frazer Corp. were available in the regular credit market, I would favor abolishing RFC even if Abraham Lincoln were its single administrator," Mr. Cosgriff said. "But private banks are not doing the job and, for that reason, I as a Republican, believe the abusers of authority—including myself, if I'm guilty—should be turned out and the agency continued."

To document his charge of banking failure, the 37-year-old Salt Lake City banker who became an RFC director last August, cited key RFC statistics: 631,351 business loans totaling $16,000,000,000 made over 19 years with only $134,000,000 of bad loans and a $600,000,000 net profit to the Federal Government.

"With all the scandal, the influence and the favoritism," he said, "the RFC has a loss record of about 1 percent on more than 600,000 loans. Each of these loans was made after the applicant produced certifications from the bank with which he does business, and from one other, that credit was unavailable. That our bank 'reject loans' pay cut 99 percent seems sufficient evidence that banks are not servicing legitimate credit needs."

PRIVATE BANKS SHUN RISK

Mr. Cosgriff says American bankers fail in today's obligations because Government-backed bonds and guaranteed home loans lead them to shun business risks.

"Businesses that could have got private credit in 1910 are today denied it," he said. "Kaiser-Frazer is an example. Kaiser came to the RFC for $66,000,000, first because big banks that could have made the loan listened to his competitors who did not want it made and secondly, because it was simpler and safer for them to put their cash in Government sure things.

"This typifies a fundamental change in a banking system which, until the 1930s lived off the interest from business loans. In the last 20 years bank deposits have multiplied and, simultaneously, Government bond issues and guaranteed mortgages have offered profitable and sure investments.

"The result," said Mr. Cosgriff, "is that American bankers have turned their backs on the business loans with which America was built.

"I am against wild banking," he insisted, "but the pendulum has now swung too far to the conservative side."

The RFC director agrees with the Hoover Commission that Government guaranties of business loans, similar to FHA insurance of home loans, would be better than direct Federal advances to private borrowers. But he added:

BANKERS' GROUPS KILL PLAN

"Every time a definite business-loan-guaranty plan is advanced," he said, "the American Bankers Association and other powerful groups kill it in congressional committee."

Since its 1932 birthday, the average RFC loan has been for $35,000, and 19 out of every 20 loans made have been for less than $100,000, he said.

"The Commerce Department counts 3,000,000 so-called small businesses. Our record of 500,000 small loans means we have helped one out of every six of them at some time or other."

Why Penalize Work?

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. JAMES E. VAN ZANDT
OF PENNSYLVANIA
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES
Thursday, March 22, 1951

Mr. VAN ZANDT. Mr. Speaker, when I introduced H. R. 2757 on February 19, 1951, I did so with the understanding that it would help the manpower problem during this period of emergency and at the same time assist in destroying the fallacy that retired persons have outlived their usefulness.

I also had in mind that those retired under social security today were being asked to live on fixed income while the cost of living skyrockets to unheard of heights.

The March 21, 1951, issue of the Washington Daily News carried the following editorial in support of my bill, H. R. 2757:

WHY PENALIZE WORK?

The Social Security System's average old-age insurance payment is now less than $44 a month.

It was far less than that until last year, when Congress adjusted payments upward to compensate those who get them for the increased cost of living since the system was adopted.

But the cost of living has continued to rise sharply, and the buying power of the larger old-age insurance payments is again falling behind.

Under the law, a person aged 65 or more can get no payment at all for any month in which, by continuing to work, he earns as much as $50.

Representative JAMES E. VAN ZANDT (Republican, Pennsylvania) has introduced a bill which would change the law so as to permit persons aged 65 or more to earn as much as $100 a month without forfeiting old-age insurance benefits.

Why not? In fact, if a person has been otherwise qualified for such benefits by deductions from his pay and contributions from his employer during the years before he reached 65, why should he be compelled to accept any limit on his continued earning power in order to get those benefits?

The notion that he should was a product of the depression and unemployment psychology prevalent when the Social Security System was set up almost 15 years ago.

Many people then thought there would never be enough jobs for younger workers unless elderly ones were forced to retire.

But now conditions are altogether different. This country urgently needs the continued productive efforts of elderly persons who are able and willing to work—needs those efforts to support the national defense program and keep the national standard of living from falling too low.

It seems foolish and unfair to penalize such persons, by depriving them of old-age insurance checks; if they do work productively enough to earn $50 a month, $100 a month, or any larger amount.

Suppose all limits on permissible monthly earnings were removed. The Social Security System then might have to pay more money than it otherwise would to persons thus encouraged to keep on working and at the same time to get old-age insurance benefits.

However, most of those persons would pay from their earnings into Social Security, and so would their employers. Many of them also would pay income taxes into the Treasury. It appears unlikely that there would be any large net loss to the Government, and highly probable that there would be a very important net gain to the country.

Words to Washington

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. WILLIAM E. HESS
OF OHIO
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES
Thursday, March 22, 1951

Mr. HESS. Mr. Speaker, it is with a feeling of distinct pride that I call attention to the achievements of a young man from Cincinnati, Ohio—Mr. Jimmie Dodd—who has been signally honored this week, for his prize winning song, Washington.

I feel that Mr. Dodd is a fine example of American youth who is proud of his country and proud of his Government. He started his career in radio, television, and musical composition in Cincinnati, and went on to win, this week, over thousands of entrants, from every State in the Union and many foreign countries, first prize in a Nation-wide contest to select a song for our Nation's Capital, Washington, D. C.

Mr. Speaker, I am proud to have been given unanimous consent to enter in the RECORD the words of that patriotic song, Washington, and a proclamation by the Commissioners of the District of Columbia honoring Mr. Dodd:

WORDS TO WASHINGTON

(First prize winner Motorola song for Washington contest, by Jimmie Dodd)

Washington, the fairest city in the greatest land of all.
Named for one, our country's Father, who first answered freedom's call.
God bless our White House, our Capitol, too,
And keep ever flying the Red, White, and Blue,
Grandest spot beneath the sun is Washington.

(Patter)

Cherry blossoms bring a lot of joy each spring;
And the statue of Abe Lincoln greets your eye.
When parades pass in revue down Pennsylvania Avenue
All the people lift their voices to the sky.

(Second chorus)

Washington—the land of mem'ries,
Of the great men of the past;
Jefferson and Patrick Henry,
Who for liberty stood fast.
Ole Stonewall Jackson, and Franklin and Clay
All march side by side through mem'ries today.
Give us strength to carry on for Washington.

(Third chorus)

Washington—the good Lord keep you
With your banner high, unfurled;
Washington—the light of freedom,
Let it shine throughout the world.
May all we people be able to see
How grand is our life in the land of the free.
Freedom's hope beneath the sun is Washington.

PROCLAMATION

MARCH 16, 1951.

Whereas the District of Columbia heretofore has not had a song which could be considered the song of the District of Columbia;

Whereas in order to select a song which could be considered the song of the District of Columbia a committee of distinguished musicians consisting of Howard Mitchell, Sigmund Romberg, Maj. William F. Santelmann, Dr. Sigmund Spaeth, and Gordon Jenkins has considered a great number of songs submitted in connection with a recent song for Washington contest; and

Whereas the committee aforesaid has selected the song Washington by James W. Dodd as the most worthy of all the songs so submitted:

Now, therefore, we, the Commissioners of the District of Columbia, in order to encourage the adoption by the citizens of the District of Columbia of a song they may call their own, and in order to inculcate a spirit of civic pride among the citizens of the District of Columbia, do hereby proclaim Monday, March 19, 1951, as Song for Washington Day, and do urge and recommend to the citizens of the District of Columbia that they adopt the prize-winning song Washington as the song of the District of Columbia.

JOHN RUSSELL YOUNG,
F. JOSEPH DONOHUE,
GORDON R. YOUNG,
Commissioners of the District of Columbia.

Televising Proceedings of Committees of Congress

OF
OF WISCONSIN
IN THE SENATE OF THE UNITED STATES
Tuesday, March 27 (legislative day of Monday, March 26), 1951

Mr. WILEY. Mr. President, there has been a tremendous interest throughout the country on the subject of the televising of congressional committee hearings. Last night two witnesses before the crime committee refused to testify before TV and thus started what is certain to be a historic test of this issue in the courts.

Last Wednesday I issued a release on this over-all TV subject, pointing out the need for a voluntary committee code of self-regulation, so as to prevent abuses of this great medium insofar as Congress is concerned and so as to explore some of the legal ramifications insofar as that is possible at this stage.

On Sunday I issued another statement on this subject, pointing out that it was my intention to prepare a bill so that the Senate Rules Committee would make a complete study of the implications of television to the Congress.

I referred, for example, to the fact that television might some day be utilized in the event of an atomic emergency for decentralizing functions of the Congress.

I ask unanimous consent that there be printed in the RECORD, the text of the initial Associated Press news story written on my approach by Mr. Richard Powers on Wednesday, March 21, to be followed thereafter by the text of my release to the press of last Sunday.

There being no objection, the news story and press release were ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

WILEY URGES CODE TO HANDLE TELEVISING OF WITNESSES

WASHINGTON.—Congressional committees should adopt a voluntary code to handle the touchy problem of whether or not to permit televising of witnesses, Senator WILEY, Republican of Wisconsin, said Wednesday.

WILEY is a member of the Senate Crime Investigating Committee which has had that question tossed in its face.

In its current quiz in New York, the committee agreed to the plea by Frank Costello, the kingpin gambler, that his face be excluded from the range of the television cameras.

However, in a previous session in Missouri, the same committee insisted that James Carroll, a betting commissioner, testify in front of a TV camera. Carroll declined to do so. The committee has voted to cite him for contempt. Chairman KEFAUVER, Democrat of Tennessee, said he would press for Senate approval of the citation.

USGES FLEXIBILITY

WILEY said in an interview that any such code as he suggested must be flexible to meet different situations.

"I have no criticism whatsoever against the rulings made by Chairman KEFAUVER or the crime investigating staff," WILEY said. "They have been models of fairness.

"The point I make is that television of congressional hearings is a relatively new problem thrust upon the committees to handle.

"Television can be the greatest constructive force for public education that has been achieved in this century. It can bring Congress closer to the American people than any other medium.

"However, television of live congressional committee hearings can also become a monster which can destroy innocent individuals, whole corporations, political parties, and entire administrations."

PROPAGANDA MEDIUM

"Think of the possibility of a witness in front of a TV camera unleashing a barrage of unfounded accusations against an individual, business corporation, a political opponent, or someone else he wants to 'get.'

"Or they can make those hearings degenerate into a three-ring carnival of horse play, ham acting and everything but constructive seeking of truth."

As an example, WILEY said, an avowed Communist at a televised hearing "could in a few minutes time reach 10,000,000, 20,000,000 or 30,000,000 viewers with propaganda, sabotage instructions or for some other Red purpose which he could not possibly achieve in any other way."

SUGGESTS CODE

WILEY said a voluntary code by congressional committees might include procedure such as:

(1) Preceding all open hearings by an intensive closed session to explore as many of the issues as possible, which will come up in the public hearings.

(2) Advise wherever possible all individuals, corporations and others whose names will be mentioned that charges or adverse testimony may be presented and they will be given full opportunity to reply.

(3) Careful advice to witnesses beforehand of their tremendous responsibility for fairness and for documentation of their charges rather than talking loosely on the basis of hearsay or other unfounded basis.

(4) A careful check to see that televising of the proceedings would not impair the health or clear reasoning of any individual by subjecting him or her to TV spotlights if they cannot testify properly under such difficult circumstances.

(5) Be particularly careful to assure fair bipartisan representation so that both parties may serve as a check and balance on one another.

WILEY said television of committee hearings "merely accentuates the need of fairness on the part of the committee members."

WILEY SUBMITS A RESOLUTION FOR SENATE COMMITTEE TO STUDY PROBLEMS OF TELEVISING CONGRESSIONAL PROCEEDINGS

I am introducing a resolution to have the Senate Rules Committee make a thorough study of the various problems which have arisen, or which might arise, in connection with past or proposed televising or radio broadcasting or motion picture or other photographing, of proceedings of the Congress and its respective Houses and committees. The committee shall report to the Senate, at the earliest practicable date, the results of its study, together with its recommendations.

Such a study should be made so that we carefully think out how the great medium of television can most constructively serve the interests of the Congress and of our people in this technological age.

I hope the Senate Rules Committee will act on this resolution rather than have the Congress just allow this new development to grow up like Topsy in every which direction.

VOLUNTARY SELF-REGULATION NEEDED TO PREVENT CIRCUSES

I think that the committee could come up with helpful suggestions—not laws—which could serve as a basis for voluntary self-regulation by congressional committees of their TV and related processes. Congress' committees would be put on notice that televising of hearings should not be allowed to degenerate into a three-ring circus, a fourth-rate stage production with hamming and phony theatrics, an unjust inquisition of people under klieg lights, particularly people who might not be able to testify properly under such conditions because of health reasons.

What is needed are common-sense standards of good taste and restraint. Such standards would in no way be prejudicial to the great television industry.

I trust that the Rules Committee will secure the best judgment of Members of the Senate and of the House of Representatives and of the finest minds in the television industry, because it is quite clear that we are going to have to reckon with television in the future work of the Congress.

As a matter of fact, it is obvious to every American that television is going to assume an ever-larger role in the entire political, economic, and social life of our Nation. It may become the most powerful single medium during the 1952 presidential and congressional elections.

IN AN EMERGENCY WE MAY LEGISLATE BY TELEVISION

In the past, I have suggested that television may prove a vital instrument in future national emergencies. If our country were under attack, it might be necessary for Members of the Senate and House at widely dispersed points to legislate by television. They could not possibly assemble at any one single point because they would become subject to enemy sabotage and attack. Yet the Congress as such would have to continue functioning, even though atomic bombs and guided missiles, were raining down on our country.

I approach television, therefore, with a great admiration and respect for its tremendous potentialities, but I also recognize some of the intrinsic dangers in Congress' use of it.

The televising of the crime committee hearings, particularly in New York, have shown TV's tremendous wallop. A vast audience saw real-life prototypes of what Hollywood has been portraying for years in gangster pictures. Moreover, the average man in the street who by and large doesn't get much of a view of his public officials except usually from a distance, was seeing them at close hand and often seeing them squirm. There was conflict; there was drama; there was tremendous human interest in that New York television spectacle.

GREAT DANGERS IN TELEVISING

But any thoughtful individual could shudder at the harm that could have been wrought by such televising to the innocent, not just to the guilty—to innocent persons, political parties, companies, and to governmental administrations.

With a fair committee chairman like ESTES KEFAUVER, with a conscientious committee membership and staff like that of the crime committee, I have less concern than if this powerful medium were in other hands.

A MAN COULD BE "MURDERED" ON TELEVISION

But it is obvious that when a committee calls men who are reported to be murderers, racketeers, goons, etc., it is giving those witnesses a tremendous power for evil. If a man can assassinate another with bullets, how much easier it is for him to assassinate another man with words. He can call his enemy every name in the books; he could attribute all sorts of sins and evils to him; he could smear him, ruin his reputation.

Of course, later on, the accused could come back and try to answer the charges, but he might be doing so probably at a different time of the day, before a different viewing audience. He might not be as good a performer as his accuser; and although his facts might amply refute the charges, he might never escape the cloud that was placed over him. Which man in politics does not have at least one enemy who would be happy to crucify him on television before 20,000,000 viewers?

Let me point out, too, the possibilities for lewd gestures being screened, for profanity, and for other undesirable demonstrations suddenly occurring.

I want us to recognize that there is a point beyond which the exchange of conflicting opinion could become a mere exchange of unfounded smears.

There is a point beyond which the search for corruption could conceivably become an unnecessary dwelling in sordidness and peddling in filth, which is hardly fit subject for televising before a public audience.

SOME HEARINGS ARE ON ISSUES, OTHERS ON PERSONALITIES

We should differentiate between a congressional committee which hears expert individuals testifying on issues, and a hearing in which questionable individuals testify mainly on personalities and alleged misdeeds. Of course, issues and personalities often become intertwined. But our people will understand the point I am making when they consider, for example, how constructive it is for the Nation's television audiences to view someone like former President Herbert Hoover, testifying before the Foreign Relations Committee as compared with someone like Frank Costello.

Now obviously there is usually not the conflict, there is not the dramatic bitterness in a foreign-relations type hearing as in a crime-busting session. The former may make for comparatively duller television presentation. But whereas there are very few people who will doubt the constructive nature of the one type of hearing being televised, there are many of us who have serious doubts about the other type of hearing being continually televised. I say "continually," because I feel that many sessions should be executive, that is, closed, and some sessions should be open. Wherever possible, executive sessions should go over the ground before hearings are thrown open to the public.

THREE STANDARDS FOR CONSIDERING OPEN HEARINGS

We must never forget that the primary aim of congressional committees in making investigations is basically to find the facts on the basis of which to prepare constructive legislation.

Another aim is to enlighten Members of Congress as to their approach on forthcoming issues and votes and reflect by word and deed sound public opinion.

A third aim is to inform the American citizenry of the problems facing the Congress so that they in turn can come to sound decisions on issues and individuals.

It seems to me that all hearings, before being televised, should be evaluated as to whether or not they actually fulfill one of those functions.

PRACTICE OF TELEVISING HEARINGS COULD DEVELOP WILDLY

Now, the usual history of some such development as this TV baby is that the medium becomes more and more used, more and more wildly, with less and less restraint until some dramatic instance comes up in which, say, an innocent man's reputation is completely ruined. Then, the people strike back at the monster they have created by passing repressive rules. I want us to anticipate this danger and prevent it from occurring in the first place. I want us to put on our best thinking caps right now.

I don't want Congress to usurp the powers of courts and of grand juries. Our function is legislative, not judicial. Nor do I want us to ever forget that a television camera is a two-edged sword which can wound the innocent as well as the guilty. Every performer at a congressional hearing—be he Congressman, staff aide or witness—has a terrific responsibility.

TV HEARING COULD BE FULL OF PUBLICITY PLUGS

Lastly, think of the fact that a witness at a TV hearing has a tremendous power to reap commercial publicity for some product or person, to put in a plug which might otherwise cost thousands of dollars if commercial time were bought.

Editorial Comment on Address by Hon. James P. Kem, of Missouri

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. KENNETH S. WHERRY
OF NEBRASKA

IN THE SENATE OF THE UNITED STATES

Tuesday, March 27 (legislative day of Monday, March 26), 1951

Mr. WHERRY. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to have printed in the Appendix of the RECORD an editorial which appeared in the News-Press of Nebraska City, Nebr., on February 21, 1951. It reflects the high esteem Mid-Westerners hold for the thinking of the very able senior Senator from Missouri [Mr. KEM]. It is an honor to have the privilege of asking that the editorial be printed in the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD.

There being no objection, the editorial was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

COMMUNITY CHATTER

The other day Senator JAMES P. KEM of our neighboring Missouri came home to talk to Republican editors. Of course, he talked politics, tearing into the Truman administration.

A lot of what he said makes sense.

For example: "Since the end of World War II more than $45,000,000,000 has been sent by the administration to some 80 countries. Practically every country on the globe has received aid in some form from the United States."

KEM figured that 18 percent of all the taxes collected from the American people has been sent abroad.

KEM said the Truman doctrine is this: "The United States must resist aggression wherever it appears in the world. The United States will strike down aggression wherever it raises its head."

An expensive and bloody assignment.

Korea is just one tiny spot on the map.

The Marshall plan, said KEM, was to be insurance against war. "Our foreign gifts have not brought us any friends," he declared. "We have fewer friends than we had at the end of World War II."

Even Britain has recognized Mao Tse-tung, the Chinese Red dictator who is killing Americans in Korea.

Have our friends helped us in Korea?

Said KEM: "Our fair-weather friends on the bench talk a good game and like to coach. They want us to provide the uniforms, do all the blocking, carry the ball, and collect all the headaches and almost all the bloody noses. We need friends with cool heads, not cold feet."

The Senator recalled that Wilson was elected to keep us out of war, Roosevelt promised in 1940 not to send American boys into a foreign war, and Truman ran on this slogan: "Peace and prosperity—vote Democrat."

"Three wars in 33 years," said KEM. "What have we to show for our foreign adventures carried out under the auspices of the Democratic Party? Some of the best manhood killed or wounded; a public debt of astronomical proportions; the danger of uncontrolled inflation; the threatened ruin of our economic system, and a world in turmoil."

Continuance of Kefauver and Fulbright Committees

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. JOHN W. BRICKER
OF OHIO

IN THE SENATE OF THE UNITED STATES

Tuesday, March 27 (legislative day of Monday, March 26), 1951

Mr. BRICKER. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to have inserted in the RECORD an editorial entitled "The Committees Must Not Die," referring to the Kefauver and Fulbright committees, published in this morning's issue of the Ohio State Journal.

There being no objection, the editorial was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

THE COMMITTEES MUST NOT DIE

Unless the Senate acts this week, the life of the Special Committee To Investigate Organized Crime, better known as the Kefauver committee, will expire on Saturday. Senator TOBEY, Republican of New Hampshire, a member of the committee, has said that the Senate will be asked to continue the investigation for another 60 days. Senator KEFAUVER, Democrat, of Tennessee, the chairman, has taken the stand that the committee has turned up enough evidence to show the Senate what needs to be done in the way of new or strengthened laws.

Woodrow Wilson once wrote that the chief use of the power of Congress to make investigations is the enlightenment of the people. Very few men are unequal to a danger when they see and understand. The informing function of Congress should be preferred even to its legislative function.

More people have seen (thanks to television) and read about the conditions of organized crime in the United States as a result of the Kefauver committee's hearings than ever before. We believe the people are beginning to understand the menace of organized gambling and its ramifications which include corruption of public officials, participation in political campaigns, and the whole gamut of crimes, including murder, as they have never understood it before. The informing function of Congress is therefore operating potently. It must not be allowed to languish.

The end of March also is the time originally marked for conclusion of the work of the Fulbright committee which has been investigating influence peddling in Washington, with particular emphasis on the chicanery, recklessness, and immorality of the Reconstruction Finance Corporation. Senator FULBRIGHT (Democrat, Arkansas) has been willing to drop the inquiry. The other committee members have overridden him and have said the investigation will go on. Those committee members, backed by the Senate and the American people, must see to it that it really does go on.

The facts revealed and publicized by these two committees are symptomatic of the decline of moral standards in our country and particularly in its officialdom in Washington, in some of the large cities, and in some of the States. Congressman at Large BENDER (Republican, Ohio) stated the case succinctly when he said: "The facts brought out by the committee make it evident that too many people are looking for a 'fast buck' and they don't care how they get it, just as long as they don't have to work for it. We have created a good many conditions which encourage this attitude, and it's high time we reversed the trend. We don't reverse it by pulling an iron curtain over the whole mess in an effort to pretend that it doesn't smell."

While the public is aroused the job must be carried to its conclusion—new laws, strengthened laws, grand jury investigations as to whether existing laws have been violated, trials for perjury and other crimes if it is believed they have been committed.

The Kefauver and Fulbright committees must not be permitted to die. If they perish, the criminal and immoral elements will have the green light to proceed with greater speed and to the greater endangerment of the Nation.

The Investigation of the Reconstruction Finance Corporation and of Organized Crime

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. J. WILLIAM FULBRIGHT
OF ARKANSAS
IN THE SENATE OF THE UNITED STATES
Tuesday, March 27 (legislative day of Monday, March 26), 1951

Mr. FULBRIGHT. Mr. President, last Sunday, March 25, there appeared in the Washington Star an extremely wise and well-written editorial about the congressional investigations which have been in progress recently. Because I believe my colleagues and the country should have an opportunity to read the editorial, and since it expresses so well my own thoughts on the subject, I ask unanimous consent that it be printed in the Appendix of the RECORD.

There being no objection, the editorial was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

TIME TO STUDY THE NEXT MOVE

The skillful conduct and the genuine productiveness of both the RFC and the organized crime investigations have produced a strong demand that they be continued. There is a general feeling in the public mind that only the surface has been scratched and that the digging should go deeper.

But partly for personal reasons, the able chairmen of these two investigating committees—Senators KEFAUVER, of Tennessee, and FULBRIGHT, of Arkansas—want to quit. Neither wishes to confine promising Senate careers to a single specialty, especially when the time consumed by that specialty excludes almost everything else.

There are other considerations, however, outside the personal desires of the two Senators most involved. One is that the only valid justification for such investigations is to determine the need for corrective legislation and the form it should take. In the case of the RFC, the form of the legislation for its reorganization has been approved by the House and is now under study in the Senate, with a possibility that instead of reorganizing it Congress may vote to abolish it. As a result of its investigation, the Kefauver committee has uncovered a pattern of organized crime in this country which is to be made the basis for a series of legislative proposals, as yet unrevealed. Both committee chairmen, therefore, believe that their committee missions have been accomplished.

There is another very practical consideration that the public may overlook. One of the reasons that these two investigations have been productive is the careful work of preparation, extending over many months, by excellent investigating staffs. In the case of the Fulbright committee, the public hearings have now covered and extended beyond the ground explored in advance by the investigating staff. If the committee keeps going, its investigations could deteriorate into a hopeful fishing expedition without real objective. Something of the same condition applies in the case of the Kefauver investigation, which was to wind up by the end of this month. If it is to continue its work indefinitely, and beyond the tying up of some loose ends remaining, the staff of investigators must be given the opportunity to explore in advance.

This would be a logical time to conclude the investigations for the time being and to begin the serious consideration of the legislation, for which the investigations were designed in the first place. For the discussion of that legislation in Congress would provide the most appropriate opportunity to decide whether further investigation is desirable, the direction it should take and how it is to be conducted.

Both Senators KEFAUVER and FULBRIGHT favor creation of commissions, to continue what they have begun. Mr. KEFAUVER would entrust to his commission a continuing study of the ramifications of organized crime, with continuing emphasis upon the responsibility of elected officials at the local level. Mr. FULBRIGHT would like to see a commission of eminent men assigned to a study of the level of morality in Government and desirable ethical standards for men in public life.

Such commissions, under the direction and control of Congress, might accomplish something of value. But no commission has the standing, in public estimation, possessed by a carefully directed congressional investigating committee. Perhaps the sensible thing to do is to consider the work of the Kefauver and Fulbright committees as the end of the beginning, but to pause now and give careful study to the next move, which is to consider legislation to deal with conditions exposed by investigation.

It would be unfortunate to see the excellent work so far of the two committees undermined by a disposition to plunge ahead with further investigation, merely because the incidental glamor of public hearings and colorful testimony are temporarily popular.

Tribute to the Late Senator Virgil M. Chapman by John W. Jones

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. JOHN C. STENNIS
OF MISSISSIPPI
IN THE SENATE OF THE UNITED STATES
Tuesday, March 27 (legislative day of Monday, March 26), 1951

Mr. STENNIS. Mr. President, I was so impressed by the remarks made by Mr. John W. Jones, president of the Burley Tobacco Growers Cooperative Association, and intimate and long-time friend of the late Senator Chapman, at a gathering in Lexington, Ky., on the sad occasion of the funeral of Senator Chapman, that I asked Mr. Jones to reduce his impromptu eulogy to writing in order that it might be inserted in the RECORD. I ask unanimous consent, therefore, that the afore-mentioned remarks be printed in the Appendix of the RECORD.

There being no objection, the address was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

TRIBUTE TO VIRGIL M. CHAPMAN

There are so many distinguished gentlemen around this table, Senators, Governors, Members of the National House of Representatives, judges, lawyers, and others of outstanding success in their chosen occupations, that in beginning I will simply say: Gentlemen, you are guests this evening of the Burley Tobacco Growers Cooperative Association, and though the occasion that brings many of you to Kentucky is a sad one, we are pleased to have you as our guests, and we personally appreciate and desire to thank the colleagues of Senator Chapman for the deserved honor they pay our dear friend in escorting his remains to Paris, Ky. Kentucky mourns the tragic and untimely death of Senator Chapman; as yet we have not recovered from the shock. Kentucky loves him, the farm folk of Kentucky love him dearly, and I love him far beyond the love usual for one man to bear another.

He was a true patriot, an outstanding statesman, a loyal friend, great of mind, warm of heart, honest personally, and honest intellectually, always modest and humble. He was a great historian, and I will never cease to wonder at the great amount of exact information he carried in his mind.

His office in Washington was my home when in that city, and how rich the experience when I would sit with him in his office, and also in Kentucky and listen as he talked of international and national affairs, and of constitutional government. Frequently the conversation would turn to outstanding leaders of other days—Jefferson, and the sage of Monticello would come alive and would be in our company, as Virgil spoke of him as familiarly and intimately as if he were present. And then Jackson and the courageous soul of the Hermitage would stand out in all the rugged strength of his unusual character. If still in the mood it would be that matchless Southerner, General Lee. Virgil's voice would be loving and gentle as he described the distinguished service of this Christian gentleman to his people not only in war, but in peace, as he sought to bind up the wound and hurt of war and unite a divided Nation in peace. How blessed to me was such an experience, and how rich such a fellowship. I believe in immortality, personal immortality, and perhaps already there has been a meeting of these great souls. Virgil would need no introduction for he has known them through the years.

Virgil and I started together in making schoolhouse speeches in our effort to form the organization that is your host this evening. Virgil went on to greatness. The Burley organization serves directly one-third of the population of Kentucky, and indirectly every man, woman, and child within its boundary. Virgil Chapman has advocated, and urged, and with the votes of many of you present, has passed the farm legislation that has blessed our people. Better farms, better homes, better living conditions for the farmer's family have been the result of better prices. The farm folk of Kentucky will not forget. A granite shaft will, perhaps, be erected at Paris, Ky., to mark his resting place, but the things that he has done to bless so many of the people of Kentucky, whom he loved, will be his real memorial as children and the children of children hear from the lips of fathers and mothers of his untiring and successful efforts in bringing to them the better things of life. An automobile accident took his life, yet the wear, tear, and exhaustion of an unselfish service for his people had gone far to weaken a strong constitution. I personally know this.

We join in sorrow with you gentlemen from Washington. I am sure Virgil's spirit is near us this evening. We meet with you here because we love him. When my earthly pilgrimage is over, I will find Virgil and there in some sequestered spot in that eternal country I will sit in his company, and listen in as he talks with those who have been the great of all the earth.

Speakers at Temple Ohabei Shalom, Brookline, Mass.

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. HENRY CABOT LODGE, JR.
OF MASSACHUSETTS
IN THE SENATE OF THE UNITED STATES
Tuesday, March 27 (legislative day of Monday, March 26), 1951

Mr. LODGE. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to have printed in the Appendix of the RECORD an article entitled "Army Secretary Pace at Brookline Temple," written by Bill Schofield, and published in the Boston Traveler of March 22, 1951.

There being no objection, the article was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

HAVE YOU HEARD
(By Bill Schofield)
ARMY SECRETARY PACE AT BROOKLINE TEMPLE

Ever since the drive shaft of the Berlin-Tokyo-Axis broke down, this land of ours has heard a lot of talk about service unification. It even has seen certain good theories along that line converted into action.

And now, for a fresh example of unity, let's turn for a bow toward the banquet hall of Temple Ohabei Shalom in Brookline.

There, when the gavel hits the table next Tuesday night, Army Secretary Frank Pace, Jr., will rise on his toes to deliver a speech of national significance.

When he returns to his seat, acknowledging the applause of the crowd, the temple group will have completed the unique feat of entertaining within three successive years the Secretary of the Air Force, the Secretary of the Navy, and the Secretary of the Army.

Not a word has been relayed about it yet, but this alinement suggests that on a March night next year the master of ceremonies will be saying "Ladies and gentlemen, your principal speaker of the evening, Secretary of Defense * * *."

That would round out the cycle, and would be typical of the way Temple Ohabei Shalom has been doing things with its annual Armed Forces and veterans' night dinner.

This unusual sequence of speakers began on March 1, 1949, when W. Stuart Symington returned to his home State as Secretary of the Air Force and spoke to the temple brotherhood. Nobody would have been too greatly surprised if the Amherst-born Cabinet officer had failed to reach Boston that night.

For one thing, it was blowing a gale of snow and his chances of getting here by plane were as dark and confused as the clouds that blackened the city. For another thing, it was his twenty-fifth wedding anniversary and any man could be excused for wishing to stay home with a few close friends on such a night.

Nevertheless, Symington arrived with Mrs. Symington at his side, and graciously accepted a Paul Revere silver bowl as a gift from his friends of the temple.

Last year, it was Navy Secretary Francis P. Matthews' turn to take the stage. He came at a time when the subject of unification was touchy and delicate. Admiral Louis E. Denfeld had left office as Chief of Naval Operations just a few months earlier, and a coast-to-coast audience was bending a critical ear toward any word of departmental policy.

Matthews that night assured the Nation that Navy discipline and Navy order were taut and shipshape. He characterized the leadership of Admiral Forrest Sherman as brilliant. He left a good feeling in the hearts of 1,000 listeners in the dining hall, and millions on the radio.

And now on Tuesday night, when President Frank Brooks calls the meeting to order, the temple hosts and their guests will rise to greet the third member of the Nation's triangular defense team.

The 38-year-old Pace is not of this part of the country, but neither is he a stranger here. He came originally from Little Rock, Ark., but he grew well acquainted with Boston during his days as a student at Harvard Law School. He'll have words of immediate interest to offer, not only on Korea but also on potential military volcanoes in other parts of the planet.

Col. Elliott A. Niles, in charge of arranging the dinner, has lined up a guest list containing names that would be labeled box office in the parlance of show business. Maj. Gen. Lewis B. Hershey, National Director of Selective Service, will be guest of honor. Speakers will include Omer W. Clark, Deputy National Administrator of Veterans' Administration; Harold Russell, national commander of AMVETS; and Roy E. Johnson, coordinator, military and veterans' liaison, American National Red Cross.

Also attending will be Rear Adm. Hewlett Thebaud, commandant of the First Naval District; Maj. Gen. C. G. Helmick, commanding general New England subarea; Maj. Gen. James W. Spry, of the Air Force; Rear Adm. Harold G. Bradbury, of the Coast Guard; Brig. Gen. William J. Blake, of the Veterans' Administration—and the list runs on through the dozens.

Most of these guests will be honored before dinner at a reception in the Niles home in Brookline. And if the conversation gets around to American unification—as it's bound to do in time—the name of Temple Ohabei Shalom is sure to win applause.

Three services with one goal—it's a program worthy of praise.

Assistance for Disabled Veterans

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. A. S. MIKE MONRONEY
OF OKLAHOMA
IN THE SENATE OF THE UNITED STATES
Tuesday, March 27 (legislative day of Monday, March 26), 1951

Mr. MONRONEY. Mr. President, I wish to call attention of the Senate to the column Sounding Off, by J. M. Hazlitt, of the Pauls Valley Democrat, Pauls Valley, Okla., adjudged by the Disabled American Veterans' organization as being the best article in their newspaper column contest aiding the cause of the disabled veterans.

Out of the 3 years the DAV has conducted this contest, this is the second consecutive year Mr. Hazlitt, of Pauls Valley, has been adjudged the winner. At a time when additional thousands of disabled veterans are being discharged from service hospitals to seek gainful employment and resume their civilian pursuits, Mr. Hazlitt's column was deemed by the judges to be particularly significant.

There being no objection, the article was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

SOUNDING OFF
(By J. M. Hazlitt, Pauls Valley (Okla.) Daily Democrat)

The great factory is in production again. After a lull in manufacturing its own special product, the process is going again, and the products are being scattered across the land.

For a scant 5 years the wheels and spikes of war ceased the output of broken bodies, torn flesh, and scarred minds. But now the pipelines are full again, and the stream of wrecked lives swells daily.

The process from healthy civilian to trained fighter is a relatively short one. The actual creation of a disabled veteran takes only a second or two of time. A machine gun burst, an angry grenade, a sudden and sickening eruption of a land mine, the rending and tearing of a torpedo, a quick flash of fire, a crashed plane, or the longer and slower process of numbing the mind with horror, are all the tools of the factory which makes the individuals of the long parade of disabled veterans.

When life hangs on by a slender thread, when consciousness returns, if it does, then begins the longest travel, the most endless journey, the steepest trail ever traveled by men. That is the road back to recovery of what is left of life and after that the rough and bumpy road back into the life of the community and Nation.

Only those who travel that road—only those who are products of that hellish manufacturing process—can know what it means to look at our complex economy from the depths of the pit of incapacity.

Of course there is that time of quick and ready sympathy, sometimes developing into sweetly sickening pity. For a time there is an honest desire on the part of most people to be helpful. Then comes the realization that the world moves on and hasn't time for the man who can't keep up in the race.

Of course there is an attempt on the part of Government to bridge the gap between what a man was and that to which he is reduced. But even that comes into question quickly. Pensions and compensation soon become easy money in the eyes of the public and the disabled veteran cashes his checks in a surreptitious manner, bordering on apology.

Of course time brings its compensations and adaptations. The man survives and learns better to overcome and minimize the handicap under which he must labor to carry his own load in the economy of the most complex Nation on earth.

All these matters are part of the pattern. All these things come about in an orderly manner and each takes its toll. Through it all the veteran is glad that he isn't confined in a hospital and his sympathy runs to those whose bodies and minds won't heal and who face days and years in the walls of the forgotten, in the backwash of war, in the storage rooms of the factory of death and near death.

If people could just understand—if the general public could just be aware—that all the veteran asks, all he wants, and all he hopes for, is a chance to care for himself in dignity and decency.

The records of a thousand employers prove that the disabled have discarded the prefix to disability and meet the world on the basis of ability itself. The record proves that disabled men with all degrees of disability can and do hold jobs with greater fidelity and skill than their whole compatriots.

It may require some minor adjustments in routine, some special arrangements of various kinds, to accommodate the handicap of the man coming back along that trail, but the truth is, that he will pay it all back and return a profit.

They come from new places now, strange, oriental names designate the points on the map where the trail starts, Tarawa, Iwo, the Bulge, Kasserine, Sicily, Salerno, Anzio, Guadalcanal, now have such names as Pusan, Taejon, Seoul, Kaesong, and Inchon added to them, but the story and the problem are the same.

You can help, it is up to you to help. Your attitude can make or break the disabled veteran. Don't cry over him, give him a chance.

That's all for today. No color will cheer up a hospital room as much as the color in your face.

Democracy in Turkey

OF

HON. J. WILLIAM FULBRIGHT

OF ARKANSAS

Tuesday, March 27 (legislative day of Monday, March 26), 1951

Mr. FULBRIGHT. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to have printed in the Appendix of the RECORD an excellent article entitled "Democracy in Turkey," by Mr. Farnsworth Fowle. Mr. Fowle is at the present time a correspondent for the New York Times in Frankfort, Germany. His article is based largely upon his experience as correspondent for the same paper in Istanbul from 1949 until recently.

It gives me great pleasure to see the recognition, so well deserved, which our friends the Turkish people are receiving. I wish to congratulate them for the wisdom and dignity with which they conduct their public affairs. I have had occasion in the past to refer to their outstanding contribution to the fighting in Korea.

There being no objection, the article was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

DEMOCRACY IN TURKEY

(By Farnsworth Fowle)

This timely article, showing that the cold war has stimulated democracy in one of Russia's neighbors, comes from a foreign correspondent of the New York Times. Fowle has served as war correspondent to Great Britain and to the United States Armed Forces; as a correspondent for the New York Times in Istanbul, 1949–51; and now represents the same newspaper in Frankfurt.

The Turks are an exceptional people. Generalizations about them have a way of breaking down. Attempts to classify them with their Balkan neighbors or their Moslem coreligionists, or with other familiar types of Asian or European nationalism, are more often wrong than right.

In his early days as president of the Turkish Republic, Mustafa Kemal (as he then was, before he decided that Turks should have surnames and took for himself the style of Ancestral-Turk or Ataturk) was once asked if the new regime was like the Fascists or the Communists. His answer, "We resemble ourselves!" may have seemed a proud man's denial of obvious similarities at the time. Turkey's evolution in the past 20 years suggests that he was right; the more they change, the more they resemble themselves.

The Turks have maintained their political independence in their Anatolian heartland for just under 5½ centuries—ever since Tamerlane's Central Asiatic empire turned out to be a flash in the pan. Behind borrowed plumes of various colors and ages, the Turkish national character can best be described in terms of a pragmatic genius for survival. A record of this sort in one of the most strategic corners of Eurasia can scarcely be ascribed to luck. The Turks have shown not only the will to survive but the skill.

It is all the more flattering to the democracies that in the present world crisis, in spite of their exposed position, the Turks have chosen—with the same courage as the Greeks but with greater unanimity—to throw in their lot with us, in their internal policy no less than in diplomacy, which, after all, has always produced strange bed fellows.

There is nothing new and nothing imposed about the westernization of Turkey. Characteristically, it was in military matters that the Ottoman sultans first decided to learn from the patently superior techniques of the European powers. In 1826, a generation after the first attempt to introduce army reform ended in the assassination of his ruling uncle Selim by the Janissary Corps Mahmoud II abruptly liquidated this obsolete Praetorian Guard and started rebuilding his army from scratch on western models under French and Prussian advisers. As the nineteenth century progressed, more of these western techniques in engineering, medicine, and administration were introduced along with the new military organization. They took root wherever their practical superiority was proved—and where they did not present an outright challenge to the obsolescent Islamic structure of state and society.

The harsh surgery of the First World War and its aftermath virtually eliminated the non-Turkish lands and peoples from Ottoman rule. The further partition of Turkey, prescribed by the Allied Powers at the Paris Peace Conference, was prevented by a 3-year war of national resistance led by Mustafa Kemal.

As an authentic national hero he always had the great majority of the Turkish people behind him, sometimes enthusiastically, sometimes—as in the case of his determined campaign against the conservative power of the Moslem clergy—grudgingly. During the 16 years from his military victory in 1922 to his death in 1938, he used his extraordinary prestige to eliminate the sultanate and the caliphate and to complete the westernization of the state structure, the educational system, and—as much as he could—the modes of social behavior.

Kemal Ataturk's methods were dictatorial: the National Assembly, which had represented many shades of opinion during the unifying war of independence, became after 1925 a rubber stamp for his dramatic moves. In 1930 he ordered several of his most trusted friends to organize a Liberal Party in opposition to the monopolistic People's Party. The experiment lasted only 100 days; long before the election stage was reached, Ataturk permitted the Liberals to drop the whole matter. They believed that Prime Minister Ismet Inonu was terrified by the popular response to the opposition group, and convinced his chief that the foundations of the Republic were threatened.

As time went on, the People's Party was dressed up to look more and more like a dynamic totalitarian movement. Dubious theories of race, language, and history, designed to reassure the Turkish people as to their central position in human civilization, received official sponsorship. In foreign policy, paradoxically, the growing Axis threat to the status quo had impelled Turkey, like the Soviet Union, to join the League of Nations in a belated effort to achieve collective security. Even before Ataturk's death and Inonu's succession to the presidency in 1938, the foundations were laid for a supplementary defensive alliance with Britain and France, which was concluded just after the outbreak of war in 1939.

The war years, with every country on Turkey's frontiers sooner or later involved in the struggle, were scarcely a time for liberal experiment. In 1945, the emergence of an expansionist Soviet Union as the only surviving great power in Eastern Europe brought about a reexamination of policy at home and abroad.

Inonu's achievement in staying out of the war while maintaining alliance and friendship with the western wing of the victorious coalition was almost universally applauded in Turkey. On both counts it was a conspicuous improvement over Turkey's status at the end of the First World War. Internally, there was no compelling reason for a change.

In view of Moscow's territorial claims advanced in June 1945, the urgent need for obtaining the support of the West shed a different light on the matter. Britain and France, Turkey's two formal allies, were no longer in a position to form a counterweight to Russian interest in the Straits, Kars, Artvin, and Ardahan. As viewed by the classical school of Turkish diplomacy, American policy was not committed to back Turkey and was even more subject than Britain and France to the moods of public opinion. Turkey's wartime neutrality might be regarded as both correct and useful by western diplomatists, but it did not inspire anything like the popular sympathy won by the Russians as fighting allies.

It was at this stage in the fall of 1945 that a former Prime Minister, Celal Bayar, a silent back-bencher in the National Assembly ever since Inonu became president, issued a call for reform within the ranks of the People's Party. Instead, he was expelled along with three other dissidents—Refik Koraltan, a veteran public prosecutor; Fuad Koprulu, Turkey's best-known historian, and a prosperous landowner; Adnan Menderes, who takes his name from the still-meandering river of his home in the rich Aegean coastal region. The four rebels proclaimed the foundation of the Demokrat Partisi.

In spite of the precedent of Ataturk and the Liberals of 1930, the Democrats certainly did not begin as a gleam in the eye of Inonu. If the President had decided to appoint an opposition leader, he would have selected a more congenial figure. The experiment having been thrust upon him, he decided to accept it; suppression would have been doubly embarrassing to Turkey's prestige in the west. Preparations were made for the republic's first direct elections to the National Assembly in July 1946.

Bayar's plea for more political and economic freedom was taken up by most of the big metropolitan newspapers of Istanbul, weary after years of heavy-handed control and suppression. The patriotic character of the opposition was assured when Turkey's only field marshal, Fevzi Cakmak, agreed to emerge from retirement and run as an "independent" on the Democrats' list.

The election was marred by intimidation of the voters and administrative perversion of the results in many cases: the Democrats should have received many more seats than the one in six they were awarded after much embarrassing delay in declaring the results. A new bitterness entered the relations between government and opposition.

In the People's Party, nervous politicians of the old school wanted to go back to the good old days when nobody crossed the government. President Inonu, however, looked instead to younger men like Nihat Erim and Kasim Gulek to give a more democratic tone to the party.

The Democrats were always in danger of becoming a mere voice of uninhibited denunciation, rather than an organization preparting to offer the people an alternative government. One wing, finding Bayar's policy of patiently building a nation-wide organization too tame, split off to form a third, or Nation, party, led or at least fronted by the august Marshal Cakmak. In the long run, this probably helped the Democrats by drawing off the hotheads, and, with them, the attention of the government, always tempted to strike in anger.

In the years that followed the 1946 election, Russia remained just as unfriendly and America showed increasingly active sympathy and support for Turkey's stand. Truman aid in 1947 and Marshall aid the next year opened new perspectives for Turkey's military and economic strength. Most Turks saw that it would be inexpedient to abandon the democratic experiment on the one hand, or for party rivalries to boil over and create internal weakness on the other. This peculiar international situation produced a hothouse atmosphere favorable to the growth of transplanted western democracy.

A year before the 1950 election its prospects were far from brilliant. Both opposition parties were still boycotting local elections and byelections because the Government had not yet met their demand for a fair election law. Political debate was frequently centered on hair-splitting questions that were significant only because they seemed to show that the Government might be looking for grounds to suppress the opposition. The press, however, was increasingly free and increasingly independent of all three parties, to the considerable disgust of the Democrats. This fact helped to raise the tone of the debate.

Finally the Government incorporated most of the Democrats' suggestions in the new election law, and the Democrats agreed to run. Grave doubts remained as to whether the parties, the administrative machine, and the general public could make it work. In a land where the literacy rate is still extremely low, where bipartisan poll management was unprecedented, and where the law's complicated appeal mechanism could hold up the results almost indefiniately, many things could go wrong.

The consensus was that at least in the cities of Ankara, Istanbul, and Izmir an honest election was possible and even likely. Here the Democrats were well organized, literacy and political interest were both relatively high, and a repetition of the 1946 scandal would have been a conspicuous national disgrace.

As for the smaller towns and the 35,000 villages of Anatolia, many doubted whether the peasant, even if he dared to trust the secrecy of the poll, would care very much which politicians ruled in Ankara. Above all, in the eastern provinces between the Euphrates and the Caucasus frontier, so much more backward than the rest of the country and so tightly under the administrative and military thumb of the Government, it was easy to believe that the People's Party would pick up enough seats to produce a comfortable national majority. A solid east seemed in prospect. If the peasants were somehow persuaded to vote for the Government, this would mean a clean sweep for the People's Party in every election district except the province of Istanbul, the only one in which city dwellers outnumbered country folk. The most generous prelection nonparty estimate I heard was two seats out of five for the Democrats.

To my surprise, a swing through central and eastern Turkey a month before the election showed a picture scarcely distinguishable from that in the cities. In spite of alleged campaign outrages played up in the metropolitan and provincial press, the temper of the country was nowhere near the boiling point. People were interested in what the parties were saying but not demonstratively enthusiastic. A common remark was: "I don't know how the province will go, but this village will probably vote for the Demirkirat Party." Slightly twisted, democrat means iron-breaker in Turkish. Even more significant, the rural and provincial Democrats had few complaints to make about administrative obstruction. Not at all like 1946, they said.

Celal Bayar went east for the final week of the campaign. In Elazig he proclaimed: "If you are satisfied with your present condition, vote for the People's Party. If not, vote for us."

On a rainy election Sunday, May 14, every polling station I visited inside and outside Ankara presented the same sceen of decorum, approaching solemnity. The police and gendarmes kept their distance, and there were no disorders anyway. Silently men and women waited their turn to complete the complicated paper work and make their private choice. They sensed the historic responsibility before them, and some inner discipline told them to accept it with calmness and dignity.

That night at the Democrats' modest national headquarters on Inonu Boulevard they kept their excitement under firm control as the returns began coming in. Bayar read us a list of telegrams from many provincial centers reporting an orderly poll and a lead in the count. He cautioned us against jumping at conclusions: there was still no word at all from the east. While he was talking, another blue telegram was brought in and he opened it. It was from Mus, one of the most remote districts of the doubtful area. There was no change in his voice as he read to us: "We are ahead."

Next morning, when the outlines of an overwhelming Democratic landslide became clear, it only remained for the People's Party to scotch rumors of an army coup d'état by announcing that they were preparing to turn over the reins of government in an orderly way. On a Monday afternoon a week later, the new National Assembly met to elect Bayar president of the republic, with Menderes as Prime Minister and Koprulu as Foreign Minister.

The election was an expression of dissatisfaction, but it was more than that. For the first time the Turkish people were given a chance to show that they were the master of the government—so they quietly but firmly asserted themselves. The article in the constitution of the republic which reads, "Sovereignty belongs to the people, without limitation or restriction," had come to life.

The new government made few sweeping changes. They listened to business interests more sympathetically, and brought a more critical eye to bear on the entrenched military bureaucracy. In foreign affairs, however, the Democrats showed more energy and initiative than Inonu's cautious waiting game. They were the first United Nations government to offer unconditionally ground reinforcements for the American troops in Korea last summer. The Turkish brigade has since distinguished itself in the stubborn defensive bayonet warfare of their tradition.

Turkey has even offered to throw away its loophole to neutrality by assuming the obligations of membership in the Atlantic Pact. This comes from a reasoned calculation that they do not want to be space to be sold against time in the event of all-out war; they want to be assured of a place within the main line of defense of the West. The Pentagon apparently was not ready to extend its commitments, and consultative machinery was as far as the Atlantic Powers accordingly agreed to go at this stage.

The cold war continues to provide a hothouse atmosphere favorable to the growth of Turkish democracy. Already it is clear that the plant is putting out genuine roots of its own in Turkish soil. If democracy is not discredited by its eccentricities in the United States and its timidities in Western Europe, if its Turkish practitioners prove reasonably effective, it stands a good chance of surviving and flourishing at the very frontier of Soviet absolutism.

Comments by Walter Winchell On Responsibility for Gambling

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

OF WISCONSIN

Tuesday, March 27 (legislative day of Monday, March 26), 1951

Mr. WILEY. Mr. President, I have before me this morning's column by Mr. Walter Winchell on the subject of the real source of responsibility for interState gambling. Mr. Winchell, who fought communism, cancer, and crime long before it became fashionable to do so, has written another of his hard-hitting columns—punching straight from the shoulder.

His remarks will, I believe, raise blood pressures, lift eyebrows, but most important, elevate the sights of a lot of people so that they can see exactly what one very keen observer feels is really involved in the multi-billion-dollar gambling syndicate. Whether or not one agrees entirely with Mr. Winchell—and there will be some heated differences—I doubt very much that there will be many folks who do not respect his frank approach on this subject of hypocrisy and gambling. I ask unanimous consent that the column be printed in the Appendix of the RECORD.

There being no objection, the column was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

WALTER WINCHELL IN NEW YORK

MR. AND MRS. UNITED STATES: The Kefauver committee has done a good job of showing up the American underworld with its political tie-ups. But never in history has the sinful life been given the effective—and misleading—advertising it got from the Senate hearings in the last few weeks. When the average hard-working, debt-ridden citizen heard that a Frank Costello can swing elections and keep $50,000 in cash around the house for spending money—his first reaction was not apt to be indignation as much as envy.

But that's one of the limitations of this modern world. Television can give a picture, but only the mind can give a view. For every so-called successful Costello there are 5,000 misled kids in reform schools and 10,000 men behind prison bars. Frank Costello, on the surface, was a winner. But the losers in the criminal game—the prisoners in the penitentiary—could have testified that all of Costello's money isn't worth the right of a freeman to take a walk in the spring.

When the chic Virginia Hill unfolded her amazing life story (contributing nothing to the committee's knowledge of crime—after her tardy arrival was excused by Senator KEFAUVER with the explanation "ladies from my part of the country are traditionally late") many a young girl must have wondered: Who really knows best? Mother or Virginia Hill? After doing all the things called wrong, there she was on top of the world, with a beautiful home in Miami Beach and a handsome husband and baby.

But it is a very hard life for any women to receive more attention than affection—and even harder to receive more affection than respect. The life of Virginia Hill sounds glamorous to the uninitiated. But as Damon Runyon said: "It reads a whole lot better than it lives." Most women would gladly trade every fur coat or Miami mansion they might own to avoid having the man they love shot between the eyes with a rifle—or the thousand tortured hours spent waiting for it. And, of course, for every girl like Virginia Hill who hit the highlights of the shadow circuit, there are 10,000 pitifully dependent upon the whim of a criminal's twisted mind for their next meal. Television could not tell anyone of their stories—not only because it is too gruesome—but because there is nothing more boring than repeated sordidness.

The Senators have proven that the underworld is based on one principal source of revenue: Gambling, and 90 percent of that horse gambling. But some eminent psychologists would tell you the reason public interest and indignation are so high was not because the spotlight was on Frank Costello—but because America was holding the mirror up to itself. Frank Costello, sitting in the witness chair, was not the average citizen's $2 bet come home to win—but come home to roost.

Whether or not the average citizen likes to believe it, it is just as immoral for him to place an illegal bet with the gamblers as it is for the gamblers to bribe public officials. The gamblers do not use their own money to bribe public officials; they haven't enough. They must use the public's. Anyone born before noon today knows that part of his $2 bet goes to the crooked combine between criminals and politicians. Under the common law, knowing that makes him an accessory before the fact—and an accessory before the fact is a principal to the crime. Accordingly, Mr. and Mrs. Betting America, take a good look at Frank Costello, because more than he was your enemy—he was your agent.

What the television pictures lacked was a "montage." They should have had plenty of background shots; in fact, they left out the main character, which was Mr. and Mrs. Millions of Betting Public. They should have shown background shots of the crowds swarming up to the betting windows; the busy horse rooms around the country serviced by the eminently respectable A. T. & T., and the conservative newspapers with the racing results. And, of course, the delegation of happy United States Senators being received by the Governor of Kentucky at last year's Kentucky Derby. Or, to make it more timely, the horde of Washington politicians skipping the Kefauver hearings to swarm out to the opening of Laurel last Good Friday.

This is no defense of gambling or official bribing, but it is an attack on hypocrisy. Under his constitutional rights, Frank Costello need not confess to anything on the witness stand. On the other hand, Costello is perfectly satisfied with the gambling situation. Mr. and Mrs. America and the United States Senate are not. They want to do something about it. But, unfortunately, it is a first rule of the law they say they seek to uphold that the applicant come in with clean hands. Well, Mr. and Mrs. America, at least half of you haven't got them. The hands of half the adult population are soiled by the billions of dollars they have paid out in $2 bets—the tiny little raindrops out of which comes the torrent of corruption. Mr. and Mrs. Two Dollar Bettor, you can stop speculating on who is the man higher up. Not very surprisingly—to those who know how the system works—Mr. and Mrs. Two Dollar Bettor—it is you.

Vice alone does not make a hypocrite. A hypocrite is a man who denies his own vices while he seeks to punish his own failings in others. Whatever the betting laws may say, betting on horse races is an ancient American tradition, a long-fixed habit, and a time-honored institution. Once this is admitted, the public won't need the underworld as its broker any more than it now needs a rum runner to deliver its $8,000,000,000 annual intake of alcoholic liquors. Sure gambling is bad for you, but overeating kills 1,000 times more breadwinners yearly than all the roulette wheels combined.

Gambling is as broad as the Nation and not as narrow as the televised pictures of the witness stand. What people are—and what people should be—is as old a story as the Garden of Eden. As Lincoln Steffens said of that: "It wasn't Adam's fault and it wasn't Eve's fault. It wasn't the serpent's fault, either. It was the fault of the apple they wanted."

Again this is no defense of gambling. But it does charge that the aristocratic bluebloods of the Jockey Club, who stage the races, and Frank Costello, the common gambler, are more than brothers under the skin. They are brothers under the table.

Why Americans Do Not Vote

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. JACOB K. JAVITS

OF NEW YORK

Thursday, March 22, 1951

Mr. JAVITS. Mr. Speaker, pursuing further the inquiry represented by my House Resolution 89 for a special committee to investigate why Americans do not vote there is appended an interesting article on British experience in the same field entitled "Why the British Vote" contrasting the 84 percent who voted in Britain in the 1950 general election with the 43 percent of the Americans of voting age who voted in our 1950 election. The article is reprinted from the Progressive, a magazine founded by Robert M. La Follette, Sr., in 1909, and not to be confused with the political party which bore this name in the 1948 and 1950 election campaigns:

WHY THE BRITISH VOTE

LONDON.—Some British people did not like the results of the 1950 American elections, others did. But all agreed in deploring the low vote in a contest which could so greatly affect the future of the free world. Only 43 percent of Americans of voting age took the trouble to cast their ballots, as compared with 84 percent in Britain in the 1950 general election.

The British envy Americans their know-how in industrial productivity, and have sent many worker-management teams to the United States in recent years to learn what they can about the most up-to-date techniques. Perhaps Americans should return the compliment, and see what can be done to remedy the distressing political apathy of many United States citizens.

Such a team would have to begin by observing that political alertness, like high productivity, is not a matter of techniques alone. Millions of Americans have somehow acquired the conviction that high productivity is good in itself, while viewing politics as a rather shabby affair, and not something in which the best people willingly take part. The businessman has never had the prestige in Britain that he enjoys in the United States; this is one big reason why he is less alert and enterprising. Politics, on the other hand, is held in very high esteem, and attracts some of the ablest and most public-spirited young people in each generation.

On the negative side, British politics is almost entirely free of the aura of petty corruption which hangs about so much of the American political scene. In part, this is due to the fact that Britain is a more homogeneous and self-disciplined community. The law is greatly respected, and firmly—even harshly—enforced. Nothing arouses so much indignation as an attack upon a policeman.

But in part it is because Britain imposes less of a strain on the morality of politicians. Reading the accounts of the Kefauver committee, the British have been puzzled to learn that one of the main activities of the political underworld is the protection of gambling; most forms of it are perfectly legal in Britain, widely popular, and a source of considerable tax income for the state. Americans pay a high price for pretending to be more strait-laced than they are.

The result is that the British voter usually has honest and reasonably able candidates for whom to vote. Even if he is unlucky in this respect, he knows at least that the strictness of party discipline is such that one weak member of Parliament cannot cause the nation any great harm. There is little excuse for being too proud or too self-righteous to vote. On the contrary, the parties generally vie with one another in putting forward the best candidates they can.

They are also interested in getting out the highest possible vote. One cannot have industrial productivity without wanting it. Americans dislike a manufacturer who wants to keep his output low and his prices high. Yet they find little shocking in politicians speculating upon, or even seeking to insure, a low vote. It must be many years since any British politician has done so. From beginning to end, the whole election apparatus is geared to get out the fullest possible vote.

It begins with registration. Application forms are delivered by local government officials at every doorstep in Britain once each year (it used to be twice a year, and will be again when Britain can afford it). The only effort required of the citizen is to fill out the form for himself and his family and drop it, free of postage, in the nearest mailbox.

Since it is a matter of pride with each local government unit to achieve maximum registration, the officials often go further than this. They check the returns against the last registration, and where people have dropped off they send canvassers to check up on them. Here again the shortage of money and manpower is something of an obstacle, and the party machines may have to do more of this work in the future.

Every opportunity is given them to do so. The lists of registered voters are posted in each precinct some time before they are closed. Party workers check them against their records, and send people around to bring in the missing names. This, in fact, used to be the main responsibility of the party "election agent," called in earlier years the "registration agent."

II

These election agents are the top sergeants of the British political battle. Each party tries to have one or more of them in as many constituencies as it can afford. It has become a recognized profession. People qualify for it by taking courses in election law and practices given by the party of their choice, and passing a thorough examination. For full-time agents it is a year-round, lifetime job; each party has established a system of retirement pensions for its agents. Precautions are taken to insure that they do not employ their strategic positions to become candidates for Parliament themselves.

Registration nowadays is only the beginning of the agent's job. The more important work comes after the registration lists are completed and closed. They are then arranged by streets and numbers and printed by local governments. Several bound copies are distributed to each party agent. He and his voluntary helpers cut out the pages and paste them on stout cardboard. They provide the basis for the thorough house-to-house canvass which then begins. Each voter is visited, and rated by the canvasser as "Labor," "Conservative," "Liberal," or "Doubtful." The "Doubtful" people are canvassed a second and even a third time, to win their definite support.

Since he cannot know the date of a Parliamentary election very far in advance (that is decided by the Prime Minister), the agent must maintain a constant state of preparedness. Local elections come at regular dates, as in America, and provide trial runs. But Parliamentary campaigning never comes to a full stop. The sitting Member of Parliament is constantly visiting his constituency; many of them have "clinics" every week, when their constituents, whatever their politics, may come to them for advice and help.

The opposition candidate is usually chosen well in advance, and is also constantly active "nursing" the constituency. Incidentally, it is not required in Britain that a candidate reside in the constituency, and many, in fact, are chosen from outside.

When the date of a general election is announced, the agents and candidates simply shift their smooth-running machines into high gear. Each candidate has the right to have his "election address" delivered to every voter at public expense. From then on, he pays his own way, and his expenditures are limited by law.

He spends the day meeting as many people at their doorsteps as possble, and crowds three or four public meetings into every evening. If the contest is an important one, national leaders, from the Prime Minister and Mr. Churchill down, come to the constituency to speak for him and for their party. Headquarters are set up in each voting district, and manned by volunteers, many of them with experience of several previous elections. They see every voter, not once but several times, in the course of the campaign. So thorough is the canvass that an experienced agent can predict the vote within 1 percent well before election day.

III

It is on that day that the most strenuous action takes place. By then, the agent knows where every one of his party's supporters is to be found. His watchers at the polls note down every person who has voted. Runners bring the names to the neighborhood headquarters, and they are checked off on the printed registration pages. In midafternoon the work of checking up on the laggards commences. This is done street by street, and no possible supporter is left unsummoned. Only those who are determined not to vote, or are utterly indifferent, succeed in evading their civic duty.

Until recent years, the Labor Party election machine, with its many volunteer workers, had an edge on the Conservatives in effectiveness. By last year Lord Woolton, head of the Conservative Party organization, had turned the tables. He had large funds, and was able to hire many energetic people, particularly ex-World War II officers, to do the work. No political machine in British history has ever functioned so effectively as his did last year.

Had the Republicans done half so good a job, Governor Dewey would be President today. The way in which the Tories took advantage of the provisions for voting by mail was particularly impressive. At one constituency after another they turned up a postal vote over the thousand mark, while Labor stuck low in the hundreds. As the party machines square off for the next round, this is a point to which Labor agents are giving earnest attention.

Obviously, even in Britain it is easier to get out a high vote in constituencies where the contest is reasonably close. But all parties do their best even in safe Labor or Conservative seats. They emphasize the importance of the total national vote for each party, as well as the place it wins in Parliament. The candidate who is certain of victory takes pride in exceeding any previous majority. The candidate whose cause is hopeless works hard to improve his party's position. It is a matter of direct personal interest to him, as well.

Many ambitious people begin their pilgrimage to Parliament by taking on a constituency they cannot win. They hope and strive to make good enough showings so that their case for a better constituency at the next election will be improved. Here the British system, by which candidates can shop around for constituencies rather than be restricted to the one in which they live, serves to keep up the minority party's interest even in rock-ribbed Labor or Conservative strongholds.

All these traditions and practices contribute to the large-scale turn-out of British voters. It could, of course, be made even greater. Although the polling hours, from seven in the morning until nine in the evening, are generous, there might be an advantage in holding elections on a Sunday or a holiday, as in places on the Continent. Or voting might be made compulsory, as it is in Australia and Belgium. But most party officials feel that they have done very well as it is, and can do even better in the future.

After looking at the American election results, more than one observer has asked: "If the voice of the people is the voice of God, whose voice is the silence of the people?"

American politicians must sometimes wonder what sort of a nation the 57 percent of the United States electorate who did not vote last November really wanted. British political leaders derive pride and confidence from the fact that they have been put in power by the verdict, freely recorded, of the overwhelming majority of adult Britishers. Some British traditions and techniques may not be suited to America. But they are worth considering.

It is a poor advertisement of American democracy if more than half the people are not enough interested in it to take the trouble to vote.

Gorgas, Ala., Coal Mine Leads the Way to Greater Coal Production, Lowered Costs, and Increased Safety by Adopting Additional Progressive and Efficient Mining Methods

OF
HON. CARL ELLIOTT
OF ALABAMA
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES
Thursday, March 22, 1951

Mr. ELLIOTT. Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my remarks, I include an article by Dr. Milton H. Fies, styled "Greater Coal Production at Gorgas Mine by Roof Bolting and Continuous Miner." This article was originally published in the December 1950 issue of Mining Engineering, a publication of the American Institute of Mining and Metallurgical Engineers.

This article shows how the Gorgas, Ala., coal mine is leading the way to greater coal production, lowered costs, and increased safety by adopting additional progressive and efficient mining methods.

The article follows:

GREATER COAL PRODUCTION AT GORGAS MINE BY ROOF BOLTING AND CONTINUOUS MINER

(By Milton H. Fies, manager, coal operations, Alabama Power Co., and consulting engineer)

The Alabama Power Co. operates its Gorgas mine in Walker County, Ala., immediately adjacent to its steam plant. The coal mine property consists of some 19,000 acres of fee and mineral ownership lands, and all of the production from the mine—approximately 2,500 tons per day—is utilized at the company's adjoining steam plant. The company is presently considering the purchase of additional acreage adjoining its present holdings which acquisition will almost double its reserves. The coal is transported from the mine over a short railroad spur in the company's own equipment, either directly to one of the large plants at Gorgas or to a storage pile. The longest haul is about 1¼ miles.

The mine produces 2,500 tons of washed coal per day of two shifts. The preparation of the coal, resulting in a uniform 3 by 0 inch size product, is obtained by passing the coal through a Bradford breaker, thence to two Jeffrey diaphragm jigs, thence over dewatering screens to a 1,000-ton capacity coal bin for further dewatering and transshipment to the power plants. Flow sheet A indicates the travel of the coal from mine car to railroad bin.

The coal property has been thoroughly drilled and otherwise prospected and contains some 85,000,000 tons of proven recoverable coal in three coal beds. These coal beds, beginning at the surface, are the Pratt, and at an interval of 40 to 70 feet below, the American, and then at an interval of 400 feet, the Mary Lee. Coal is being mined only from the American bed, but resumption of mining from the Pratt bed is planned for 1952.

The data presented relate to the operation of one Joy continuous miner, which began to produce coal regularly in March 1950, and to the application of roof bolting throughout the entire mine, which began at the same time.

The American seam at Gorgas averages about 54 inches in thickness.

The rooms are 25 feet wide, driven 250 feet deep, and the pillars between rooms are 20 feet across. Since the American workings are in advance of the Pratt, no pillars are pulled. The width of the rooms compared to that of pillars is increased with the continuous miner and the percentage of recovery appreciably improved.

The larger portion of the production of the mine other than that obtained with the continuous miner is procured with mobile loading machines, Joy 12 BU, loading onto conveyors. These conveyors load either onto belts in the cross entries, or directly into Sanford-Day 6-ton drop-bottom mine cars. The main line track is laid with 70-pound rail, a part of which is thermite welded, with plans for eventually welding the entire track. This track is slag ballasted, and treated ties are used. Main line locomotives are 15 tons, gathering locomotives 6 to 10 tons.

The bottom below the coal is fire clay, which is fairly soft in its consistency. Directly above the coal in varying degrees of hardness and thickness there are two draw rocks. The first draw rock, which is the most difficult to hold, is from 2 to 6 inches thick, and, above, the other draw rock varies from 10 to 20 inches in thickness. In most sections of the mine only the first draw commonly falls with the coal as it is undercut and shot. Occasionally the second draw comes down, but it is only in rare instances that both draw rocks, which might total 30 inches, cannot be supported. The rock above these draw rocks is a hard, sandy shale, ideal for anchoring roof bolts.

During a period of from 6 to 8 months in 1949 roof bolting was applied to a set of three places where a Joy mobile loading unit was in operation. Then the practice was extended to some three or four additional units. The adaptability of the system to the conditions as they exist at Gorgas was definitely proved before the bolting was applied to the entire mine. Before any definite decision was reached, many tests were made in various sections of the mine and in other operations in the district. The results obtained were helpful in the final decision to adopt the system throughout the entire mine.

Experience demonstrated that one of the most important factors in securing satisfactory roof bolting was to obtain a fixed anchorage for the bolts in the roof stratum. Where the wedge-type bolt is used, the nature of the rock stratum in which the anchor is located, the design of the wedge, the method employed in slitting the bolt end, and the hardness of the bolt steel itself are all factors affecting the holding power or strength of the anchor.

It is recommended that each individual mine using the wedge-type anchor do a certain amount of experimenting and testing in order to determine that the anchorage is sufficient to support the amount of rock required.

Tests made in pulling roof bolts at Gorgas and other mines, using a Continental Gin roof-bolt tester, with gage calibrated to register tension pull directly in tons, gave some interesting results. For example, at Gorgas a 1-inch cut thread, burned-slot bolt was originally used with a ¾ by ¾ by 5½-inch wedge in a 1⅜-inch drill hole. This bolt installation provided anchorage (at 8-ton ram pressure) sufficient to break bolts in all tests. Later, in an effort to reduce the cost of the roof bolts (approximately 13,000 were installed per month at this mine) it was decided to use a 1-inch rolled-thread bolt with a sheared slot. The shank diameter of this sheared-slot bolt is approximately 29/32 inch, and its cost is 12½ cents less than the cut thread with burned slot.

When this latter type bolt was first installed on a trial installation, a ¾ by ¾ by 5½-inch burned wedge was used in a 1⅜-inch drill hole, the same as has been used with the 1-inch cut thread with burned slot. These bolts, however, would pull out at around 5-ton tension, irrespective of the method used in driving the bolt into the roof hole (hydraulic ram, stoper, and hand driving was tried). It was found that by anchoring them in a 1¼-inch hole and using a larger wedge, ⅝ by ¾ by 6-inch burned wedge, and 8-ton ram pressure, the bolt would break before pulling out. It was further found that by using a wedge designed so that the bolt could be rammed to the extreme depth of the hole at approximately 8 to 9 tons pressure, maximum holding was obtained.

At a second mine a number of tests were made with various types of wedges, and the only wedge-type bolt that could be made to hold over 10 tons was a high-grade carbon steel bolt.

In some cases better anchorage can be obtained by increasing the length of the bolt and anchoring it in more suitable stratum. Experience indicates that the expanding shell-type anchor is not affected by the variations in rock strata as much as are the wedge type; and where it is difficult to secure anchorage with the wedge-type bolt, the expanding wedge shell may offer the best solution even though the installation time and expense may be greater.

The roof bolt pull-test data presented herein, table 1, were compiled from a test made at the Gorgas mine to determine the holding strength of various type bolts under varying methods of installation—wedge design and ram pressure. The roof holes were drilled with a rotary electric drill, and the bolts installed with a hydraulic ram.

It soon became obvious that this method of roof suspension offered so many decided advantages over the older system of room props with cross collars that, after all possible checks had been made as to the safety for the men, the system was adopted. It was found, for example, that because of the added maneuverability of machines (such as the boom on the loading machine or the cutting machines working across the face) the efficiency of loading units was increased from 20 to 25 percent. The contrast in the two systems of roof support is emphasized by the pictures heading this article. One shows the method of supporting the roof with props the cross collars, and the other by roof bolting.

It is extremely difficult to support the second draw in most of the working places in the mine by means of props and cross collars because of the consistency of the underlying fire clay. When the timbering in the mine was done by cross collars and props, the props would sink into the bottom as weight came on, and there was continuous trouble. Idle periods, at times only from Friday night to Monday morning, often resulted in reduced production on Monday due to falls in the working places, which required time to clean up before loading could begin. During longer idle periods it was always necessary to send crews into the mine to remove the falls of rock, and often to reset cross collars. Entries and air courses driven in advance of rooms required additional cleaning when the equipment was moved forward. Experience demonstrated that it was particularly troublesome for the face crews to carry props and 3- by 8- by 16-inch cross collars for timbering to the face in such medium thickness coal, and the time lost was appreciable. This work was made much less laborious with the new system where it is required to carry only the lighter materials consisting of bolts, nuts, and small size T-boards.

Roof support by means of bolts has no dependence on the nature of the floor of a mine, and that gain is important where the bottom is soft.

It has been demonstrated that the ability of bolts to support the roof is greater than the strength of props and cross collars, but it has been decided to place the bolts on the same centers as the props, that is 4-foot squares. The maximum draw rock encountered had reached 30 inches, and bolts were fixed at a 40-inch length, which would give an 8-inch penetration into the permanent stratum when the maximum thickness of draw rock was encountered.

While expansion bolts and other types have been tried, the bolt adopted thus far has been the split bolt with a wedge. Table 1 indicates the resistance of these bolts to pull, which emphasizes the supporting strength of the bolt. The factor of safety of the roof bolting, assuming that the rock to be supported is 4 by 4 feet by a maximum of 2½ feet thick, is much greater than that attained in the use of timbers. And since both draw rocks in the mine average less than 18 inches, the factor of safety is high.

Since in the advanced workings of this mine the supporting rock is shaly sandstone, which has become so hard that it is difficult to drill, and since the draw rock in this area has not exceeded 18 inches, the length of the roof bolt has been reduced to 30 inches. When the bolts were first installed in rooms it was decided to use wooden T-boards against the roof just inside of the washer and nut of the bolt. These were originally 3 by 8 inches by 3 feet, and were used only in rooms. Experience has justified the reduction in the size of the T-boards to 3 by 6 inches by 2 feet. In the entries or haulageways where roof bolts are used, timber is not employed directly under the roof, but only the metal plate washers, 6 by 6 by one-quarter inches thick.

Prior to the adoption of roof bolting throughout the entire mine and during the preliminary stages of the work, it was felt that if an effective, flexible method of drilling the roof could be devised, one that would not involve such costly initial expenditure as is required for portable air compressor, jack hammer, and impact wrench and piping, approval to adopt the system throughout the entire mine could be more readily obtained. Each loading unit would require the air equipment mentioned, and at Gorgas there were a maximum of nine such units. It was believed also that a rotary electric drill would release less fine rock dust in the drilling operation and that vibration caused by pneumatic stopers, which have a tendency to loosen the roof, would be eliminated by the use of the drill ram.

A light, compact, self-propelling drill rig was designed by Paul E. Glaze, assistant superintendent and chief electrician at the Gorgas operation. These machines have proved very effective. The number of holes per day has averaged 50, and at times the total has reached as high as 80. The men who drill the holes and insert the bolts also perform other duties.

Also included is the new type self-propelled unit for roof drilling. At present these drill rigs are being built by the Continental Gin Co. under the trade name of Drillram. The rotary drill is so mounted on a hydraulic cylinder that upon completion of the drilling operation this drill can be swung out of position, the roof bolt inserted in the hole just drilled, and the hydraulic ram swung into position to set the split bolt with wedge, without relocating the machine itself.

The contribution which the roof bolting has made in the safe operation of the mine has been significant. Roof bolting, when used in conjunction with the continuous miner type of machine, where no explosives are required, will greatly minimize roof falls, the greatest hazard in coal mining. The United States Bureau of Mines during the years has been outstanding in its contribution to coal mining, but it may well be that in its long history no single accomplishment exceeds that of roof bolting in mines.

The cost of roof bolting at Gorgas mine is greater by approximately 10 cents per ton than that by the use of wooden supports, but this difference is small as compared to the added efficiency of the machines, the increased tonnage obtained, and the increased safety of the men.

The continuous miner, purchased from the Joy Manufacturing Co., of the type 3-JCM, maximum height 39 inches, produced some coal during a few shifts in the month of January 1950. It was not, however, until after the mines resumed operation on March 6, following a period of idleness due to a Nation-wide strike, that the work of the miner became regular. Only one continuous miner is employed in the mine at Gorgas at the present time. It operates on two shifts and largely in rooms 17 feet wide, which have a 10-foot pillar between. It will be noted in this connection that this compares with the 25-foot rooms and 20-foot pillars employed in the conventional method of mining, and that the percentage of recovery is markedly increased.

When the machine was first installed, an attempt was made to operate it with one operator, one helper, one car trimmer, and one shuttle car operator, using the intermediate shuttle car, operated by push button on the miner, as a surge. This is not practical in coal 52 to 54 inches thick, for the reason that the operator of the miner does not have sufficient height over the surge shuttle car to properly gage its loading. After the first few shifts a second shuttle car operator was added. The crew then consisted of the machine operator, the helper, two shuttle car operators, and a car trimmer, who loaded the mine car.

Coal was mined at the face, conveyed by the shuttle car to a belt on the cross entry, and from the belt the coal was loaded into a 5½-ton mine car on the main entry. This method of operation was continued through March 1950. Time studies were made on each shift, and it was soon definitely determined that the idle period when the machine was standing was due entirely to the inability of the two shuttle cars to effectively serve it. It was then that one of the assistant superintendents of the mine, John Davis, conceived the idea of utilizing an additional mobile loader, a small 12 BU, between the continuous miner and the intermediate shuttle car. The bottom of the mine acts as the surge. The continuous miner, as it produces the coal, deposits it on the floor and the 12 BU picks it up and loads it into the intermediate shuttle car. It has been the experience at Gorgas that the miner is thus made continuous.

Table 2 shows the cost per ton, separated as to day and night shifts, of coal produced by the continuous miner from January 1, 1950, through August 1950, delivered in the mine car on the main haulage entry. The intermediate Joy mobile loader began operation during April 1950. It will be noted how the tons per man-day have increased with the proportionate decrease in the cost per ton. The figures indicated are raw coal, but tests reveal that the tons of washed coal per ton of raw coal with the continuous miner is 85 percent; whereas, in the conventional method of mining, using undercutting machines, explosives, and mobile loaders, the washed coal is only 72 percent of the raw coal produced on the same basis.

It has been estimated that on a washed coal basis the cost of producing coal with a continuous miner in the mine car on the main entry is about one-third of the cost of producing washed coal with the conventional mobile loaders.

The crew now consists of one continuous miner operator, one helper, one Joy operator, two shuttle car operators, one car trimmer, and one foreman. The average number of tons produced since March per shift has been 297.5 of raw coal, with an average 55 percent wash coal recovery. The greatest advance in solid coal in one shift has been 156 feet, and the largest tonnage per shift has been 443 tons of raw coal.

The savings in explosives cost amounted to about 8 cents per ton.

The noticeable improvement in the condition of the roof in the places where the continuous miner has operated has been most marked. Ribs of pillars are not shattered and accordingly are capable of supporting more weight. Likewise, the hazard of falling rib coal is greatly minimized. Draw rock which formerly came down as the coal was shot, now stands up in places after the supports are withdrawn for as long as 3 months. The 17-foot rooms are timbered with cross collars with 6-foot centers supported by light jacks. These rooms are timbered by the operator and helper as the places advance. After each room is driven to its boundary, which is on an average of every two shifts, the cross collars and jacks are withdrawn to the nearest crosscut and are there available as the adjoining inby rooms interesect these crosscuts. In the entries and air course the roof is supported by bolts.

The use of the continuous miner at Gorgas has convincingly demonstrated that: (1) This method of winning coal from the face is dependable; (2) the use of the machine greatly reduces the hazard of mining (a) by the elimination of explosives, (b) by reducing roof exposure, (c) by reducing man-hours of exposure per ton of coal mined, (d) by concentration of rock dust, (e) by removing the worker from the face (the operator of the machine performs his task at a minimum of 10 feet from the face), (f) by eliminating the shattering of ribs of pillars and thus avoiding falls of pillar coal; (3) the cost of producing coal is greatly reduced.

The matter of the size of the coal produced is of no moment at a mine like Gorgas where the coal is produced for steam purposes only, and this likewise would be true at mines producing metallurgical coal. Sizing tests shown in tables 3 and 4 over a period of a week indicate the difference between sizes of the coal with a conventional mobile loader and undercutting machine as compared to the continuous miner. No noticeable effect has been observed in the quality of the washed coal due to the use of this machine, producing about one-quarter of the total production.

The results thus obtained in the use of this one continuous miner warranted the recent purchase by the Alabama Power Co. of two additional miners. If such results continue, the mine should be completely equipped with these machines.

The writer feels a deep sense of obligation to the following members of the mining staff of Alabama Power Co. for their criticism and suggestions in the preparation of this paper: Harry M. Johnstone, manager of Gorgas Mine; J. W. Shealy, senior engineer; W. O. Hodgkin, mining engineer; and E. W. Booker, superintendent.

Address of Hon. George H. Bender, of Ohio, at Memorial Program for Thomas G. Masaryk, First President of Czechoslovakia

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. GEORGE H. BENDER

OF OHIO

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Thursday, March 22, 1951

Mr. BENDER. Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my remarks in the RECORD, I include an address which I made at a special memorial program for Thomas G. Masaryk, first President of Czechoslovakia. This address was made under the auspices of the American Committee To Fight Communism:

Millions of people throughout the world—the millions who are shackled in their own homes—cannot celebrate, cannot talk or even breathe the name "Masaryk." Red tyrants cannot tolerate the name of this great liberator, but I know that these freedom-loving people abroad are offering a silent prayer in memory of this great statesman and humanitarian.

Thomas Garrigue Masaryk will be remembered for centuries. History will place him as a leader who was born on the threshold of the nineteenth-twentieth century, and who, at the ripe age of 65 years, went in exile to forge and found a new republic which for 20 years was a model of democracy in central Europe.

Thomas Masaryk was more than a liberator to his own people. He is remembered as a world statesman and world leader in the finest sense of Christianity. Born in Moravia, of humble origin, Masaryk married into an old American family. During their entire married life, his wife was a constant co-worker and a great spiritual guidance in his long struggle as a professor and congressman in the old Austro-Hungary Parliament. Their family union was complete.

In the words of Masaryk himself, "When I came back to Prague in 1918, I could hardly wait to be beside her."

Masaryk was a great scholar. He stressed the importance of Christianity in education, I shall quote his own words:

"I cannot picture a human being in our world growing up without knowing of Christ and His teaching; and of course the Old Testament is part of the fundamental cultural background of every European. Anyone not knowing what Christianity stands for would really be a stranger in our cultural domain; and how could anyone understand European history and the system running through it, if he had not been taught about the reality and development of the church? But the difficulty is how to teach it, from what standpoint to appraise the historical facts—a hard problem for the schools.

"I myself am always repeating and emphasizing the fact that religion is the essential element of spiritual life and culture, and for that reason not only religious instruction and instruction about religion in general, but also religious practice is for me a great and unsolved question of school policy."

Thomas Garrigue Masaryk believed in true democracy founded on love and respect for one's neighbor, and toward all neighbors, as the realization of the rule of God on earth. Let me quote him again:

"Democracy is not only a form of government, it is not only what is written in constitutions; democracy is a view of life, rests on faith in men, in humanity, and in human nature, and there is no love without faith. I said once that democracy is a discussion. But real discussion is only possible where men trust one another, and honestly seek the truth. Democracy is a conversation among equals, the thinking of free people open to complete publicity—the word 'parliament' has a fine meaning, if only we could give it body.

"I said among equals. I know that men are not equal; nowhere on the earth or in nature is there equality—there is variety; only as immortal souls are we really equivalent. Liberé, egalité fraternité—even the French Revolution de facto accepted Jesus' commandment, the commandment of love toward one's neighbor. It sounds like a paradox, but it is true: the French revolutionaries were theocrats, even if they had God merely as a highest being.

"The democratic ideal is not only political, it is social and economic. Communism I vigorously reject. Without individualism, without gifted and inventive individuals, without capable leaders, without geniuses society cannot be reasonably and justly organized.

"Democracy on its social side means the abolition of degrading misery; in a republic, in a democracy, it must not be possible for individuals or ranks to exploit their cocitizens—in a democracy man to man must not be merely a means. No organization of men is possible without superiors and subordinates, but it must just be an organization, and not a privilege, not aristocratic coercion but mutual service. Democracy needs leaders, not masters."

Masaryk defended his concept of democracy against protagonists of totalitarian systems of any color.

"I defend democracy, moreover, against dictatorial absolutism, whether the right to dictate be claimed by the proletariate, the state, or the church. I know the argument that dictatorship is justified, since conscience and right, reason and science, are absolute; and I am not unfamiliar with talk about the dictatorship 'of the heart.' Logic, mathematics, and some moral maxims may be absolute, that is to say, not relative as they would be if all countries, parties, and individuals had a special morality, mathematics, and logic of their own; but there is a difference between absolutism of theory, and practical, political absolutism. The most scientific policy depends upon experience and induction. It can claim no infallibility. It offers no eternal truths and can form no warrant for absolutism."

Masaryk, even in his years after World War I, didn't trust, didn't believe in communism. It was he who coined the phrase that "Russian bolshevism is a pathological scum."

Today Masaryk's ideas of democracy, of humanitarianism, and of liberalism and those associated before the name of "Thomas Masaryk" are brutally suppressed in his native land. Even his works are banned, but the remaining free world bows deeply in memory of a statesman who left the greatest impression on his people and free people everywhere.

I know that Czechoslovakia will arise again. I know that the Red plague will be removed. And after victory of democracy, which must come with spiritual weapons, the Red plague will be forgotten, but, the name of Thomas Garrigue Masaryk will live forever.

In conclusion, I want to say on this broadcast, which will be heard not only in our United States but also behind the iron curtain, that my country, the great United States of America, is and will be always the torch and bastion for all who are surpressed, abused, and enslaved. Thank you.

Public Assistance Provisions of the Social Security Act

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. ABRAHAM J. MULTER

OF NEW YORK

Thursday, March 22, 1951

Mr. MULTER. Mr. Speaker, there has been considerable confusion and misunderstanding created by some sources as to the administration in New York State of the Social Security Act. It is my opinion that there is a deliberate effort being made by the Republican officeholders of New York State to hide their own wrongdoing by an unwarranted attack upon the Federal administration.

The following statement, issued March 9, 1951, by the Honorable Oscar R. Ewing, is an unanswerable refutation of the misstatements emanating from New York:

STATEMENT BY FEDERAL SECURITY ADMINISTRATOR ON PUBLIC ASSISTANCE PROVISIONS OF THE SOCIAL SECURITY ACT

The resolution adopted by the New York State Legislature claims that the Federal Security Agency has threatened to withhold funds from New York for aid to dependent children, old-age assistance, aid to the blind, and aid to the disabled, unless the State acquiesced in two arbitrary conditions.

The resolution alleges that one of these conditions "would mandate an inflexible State-wide standard of assistance requiring all persons receiving assistance under a welfare program to receive mechanically the same benefits in total disregard of individualized needs." The second condition, according to the resolution, would require the State "to depart from its long-established civil-service system and compel the adoption of special civil-service standards and procedures for employees dealing with Federal welfare programs or a general revision of our civil-service system."

The 1935 Social Security Act provided for Federal contributions to the States for needy people—under certain conditions. It provided that each State submit a State plan which had to be approved, originally by the Social Security Board and now by the Federal Security Administrator, as meeting the requirements of the Social Security Act. This State plan, the act says, "shall be in effect in all political subdivisions of the State, and if administered by them, be mandatory upon them." Furthermore, since 1940, the act requires that all such plans include "methods relating to the establishment and maintenance of personnel standards on a merit basis."

These are not arbitrary conditions dreamed up by me or anyone else in the Federal Security Agency. They are part of the law of the land. Congress wrote these essential provisions into the Social Security Act because it wanted to protect helpless needy persons from arbitrary and capricious action, and to make sure that they would receive humane and individual consideration wherever they live within a State.

Failure to adhere to these provisions has resulted in serious differences in the treatment of needy people throughout New York State. People in various parts of the State receive shockingly disparate amounts of assistance in relation to their need. The law clearly calls for equitable treatment for persons in need; and persons in New York State have not been getting equitable treatment.

There has been failure on the part of local welfare districts to include basic items in the budgets of needy persons. There has been an alarming variation in the tests applied in determining who is entitled to assistance and who is not. Thus, in some welfare districts a person may be denied assistance if he has as much as $100 worth of personal property, while in a neighboring district a person may be granted assistance even though he has $1,500 or more of personal property. In my opinion, the Congress that passed the Social Security Act was out to prevent precisely this kind of discrimination.

We have not insisted on an inflexible standard that would require all persons to receive mechanically the same benefit without regard to individual need. Quite the contrary. What we have asked the State department of social welfare to do is to establish a State-wide policy that would be simple, objective, and consistent, so that a person in need would know what he is entitled to, and would not have to depend on the whim of a local official.

The Federal Government asks for equality of treatment, not necessarily equality of dollar assistance. The Federal Government asks that New York see to it that people in equal need receive the money to secure the same standard of living. Obviously, the rent costs in a small town upstate will not be the same as in Manhattan. The equal standard requires that a needy person receive the money to purchase equivalent food, clothing, and shelter, wherever he lives within the State.

All of this is well known to the State board of social welfare. As a matter of fact, since 1944 the board has paid lip service to the requirements of Federal law. In that year it issued an instruction to local districts calling for equitable treatment of persons in equal need; but this instruction was never enforced. On January 22, 1951, this board ratified an agreement which the chairman of the board and I had reached on December 29, 1950, relating to aid to the permanently and totally disabled. That agreement provides for inclusion in the State plan of assistance standards to assure equitable treatment for all needy persons.

Thus the State board of social welfare recognizes that there is no basis for the accusations contained in the legislature's resolution and accordingly agrees to abide by the law of the land.

As to requirements for an adequate merit system in the administration of public assistance in New York, the Federal law is perfectly clear. Its intent is to have administration of public assistance in all States free from political pressures. The fact is that New York has some 900 welfare positions exempted from civil service—more than the number of such exempted positions in all other States put together. New York is the only State in the Union where county welfare directors are not under the merit system. Moreover, 55 deputy directors are also exempt, along with a large number of other miscellaneous jobs. This contradicts the express requirements of the Federal Social Security Act. The State board of social welfare has now assured us that it will take the necessary steps to correct any deficiencies which may be necessary in the carrying out of personnel standards on a merit basis in accordance with the Federal Social Security Act."

These facts reveal the inaccuracies and distortions of the resolutions better than any argumentation.

Connections Between Criminals and Law-Enforcement Officers

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. ESTES KEFAUVER

OF TENNESSEE

Wednesday, March 28 (legislative day of Monday, March 26), 1951

Mr. KEFAUVER. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to have printed in the Appendix of the RECORD an excellent statement made by former Ambassador Spruille Braden, chairman, New York City Anticrime Committee, at the session of the United States Senate Crime Investigating Committee in the United States Courthouse, Foley Square, New York City, on Tuesday, March 20, 1951.

This anticrime committee has been recently created upon recommendation of the King's County grand jury. Judge Samuel S. Leibowitz and District Attorney Miles McDonald especially deserve recognition and credit for this effective movement for better law enforcement.

There being no objection, the statement was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

STATEMENT BY FORMER AMBASSADOR SPRUILLE BRADEN, CHAIRMAN, NEW YORK CITY ANTICRIME COMMITTEE, AT TUESDAY'S (MARCH 20, 1951) SESSION OF THE UNITED STATES SENATE CRIME INVESTIGATING COMMITTEE IN THE UNITED STATES COURTHOUSE, FOLEY SQUARE, NEW YORK CITY

Both as chairman of the New York City Anticrime Committee and as a citizen, I appreciate the honor of being invited last week to sit with this distinguished committee and to make this statement today.

Your committee, Senator KEFAUVER, merits the gratitude of all decent Americans for exposing to the light of public opinion the shameful connections between criminals and the law-enforcement officers throughout this country.

Your committee has helped the average man in the street to realize that the apparently innocent placing of a $2 bet with a bookmaker, when multiplied by the thousands who do it daily, is in fact supplying organized crime with huge additional revenues wherewith to corrupt law-enforcement officers, to buy immunity from punishment for all manner of offenses, to make drug addicts of our children and generally to pollute society.

I have watched this committee bit by bit extract from witnesses sordid stories of corruption in this city. My emotions have been mixed, but I am confident that they are typical of all those who by television, radio, and the press have followed events in this courtroom. We plain citizens have resented the arrogance and impertinence shown before this committee. We have been shocked to hear a city commissioner admit to hobnobbing with gangsters and receiving in his office such loathsome creatures as the so-called policy king. We have drawn the only implications that can be drawn from these evil associations between the hoodlums and high officials of this great city. Momentarily we have, perhaps, felt a certain measure of frustration that swift and severe punishment is not meted out both to the gangsters and to the venal officials. We are increasingly angered—in a cold reasoning rage—because self-evidently these racketeers could not have grown rich and powerful, as they have, if they had not been in complicity with law-enforcement officers. Were it not for this complicity, we realize that these criminals never could have accumulated wealth and influence to a point where they must be consulted on the reorganization of Tammany Hall or as to who should or should not be a supreme court justice or even a candidate for mayor of New York City. We know that crime cannot exist on a major scale or on organized or syndicated bases unless there is something rotten in city hall. Finally, we plain citizens are determined to put an end to these outrageous conditions. We are awake at last.

This Senate committee has contributed to this awakening. Its activities should be continued. I voice the ardent wish of thousands of citizens in New York City that it be continued after March 31.

Also I wish to pass on to this committee and to the television companies the desire expressed in many messages I have received, that the more important scenes in these hearings be repeated extensively at night over television, for the benefit of those whose occupations prevented their watching during the working hours of the last week.

I have said that the citizens of New York are determined to eradicate corruption. More, we are already under way. On January 31, 1951, the December 1949 grand jury in Kings County handed up a presentment stating that—

"The history of past investigations reveals a sudden relaxation of the public temper, when the headlined activities of the malefactor have been filed away in forgetfulness. That public apathy is the fertilizer that nurtures the soil for unbridled graft and corruption."

The grand jury, with the vigorous support of Judge Samuel Leibowitz and District Attorney Miles McDonald therefore "urged the immediate establishment of an entirely new and permanent city-wide crime commission to be supported by public contributions. * * * This body under no circumstances to undertake the business of law enforcement itself. Rather it must concentrate on purposeful systematic observation of those who are duly entrusted with the conduct of our law enforcement, and on keeping the community informed of the results of this observation."

To these ends, within a few hours on that same day, the New York City Anticrime Committee was formed by a group of prominent citizens from Bronx, Kings, New York, Queens, and Richmond Counties. On the committee are men and women of different creeds, color, and racial origins. They are leaders of industry, labor, education, social organizations, banking, and other callings. Our membership is absolutely nonpolitical and contains no one ambitious for public office.

Our group, as a watchdog committee, will give every support to those law-enforcement officers who are performing honestly and efficiently. If through the meticulous observation by our staff of investigators we find proven cases of ineptitude or worse in the courts, the district attorneys' offices, or parole boards, the police, or elsewhere, the facts will be presented to the appropriate authorities in order for them to take prompt remedial action. Should they fail to do so, the committee will then go to the public with these facts. In short, the purposes of the New York City Anticrime Committee, as expressed in its certificate of incorporation, are as follows:

(a) To keep continually before all the people of the city of New York the principle that no lasting happiness or prosperity can be established without due respect for law and order, and that crime and vice can be suppressed only by the firm determination of the people and consistent action by law-enforcement officers and their superiors.

(b) To give aid to law-enforcement agencies in the proper discharge of their duties.

(c) To keep the public continually informed as to conditions showing criminal activities and to promote vigilance in the suppression thereof.

(d) To receive private voluntary contributions to be used solely to effectuate the foregoing purposes.

The New York City Anticrime Committee has established offices at 270 Park Avenue, where information respecting crime conditions in this city will be welcomed, treated confidentially, and investigated by an expert staff.

The New York City Anticrime Committee in zeal and effectiveness will outmatch the crooks and conniving law-enforcement officers. We are in this fight to the finish. We demand and will see to it that there are honest and competent law-enforcement officers throughout the five boroughs.

Senator TOBEY, like everyone else who heard you, I was profoundly moved last Wednesday by your eloquent and impassioned plea for a spiritual and religious revival in this country if crime and corruption are to be exterminated.

So much do I agree with you that for many years I have at every opportunity in public addresses and otherwise declared that the greatest single problem confronting humanity today is the breakdown in morality everywhere, but especially in government. Basically it is precisely this lack of morality which is responsible for communism, aggression, and Russian expansionism along with all the many other political ills that afflict us in domestic as well as in world affairs. Unless our citizenry, and in particular every one of those who govern and who are charged with law enforcement, get back to morality and common honesty, our other efforts and struggles will be sterile. We will be attacking symptoms rather than the disease itself.

This leads me to another aspect of the crime and corruption situation on which heretofore—so far as I know—there has been little or no comment. I refer to its repercussions on our foreign relations.

Irrespective of whether we want it or not, the mantle of world leadership rests on our shoulders. On how well we wear it depends not merely the fate of these United States but of civilization itself.

We can only exercise that leadership successfully if we have self-respect and are respected by and enjoy the confidence of other peoples. For respect there must be complete integrity and confidence in that integrity by the authorities and peoples on both sides.

I regret to say that we have been losing that respect and confidence of other nations which we formerly held.

Through the years I have been proud when repeatedly my foreign friends have remarked, "Of course, you have some crime and corruption in the United States, but you keep it at a minimum because you have sanctions; the punishment is swift and sure."

In contrast to these statements, of late years these same friends, pointing to the revolting conditions disclosed by this committee, the Brooklyn grand jury, and other investigations, have commented sadly on our moral deterioration.

One of the outstanding statesmen of this hemisphere, a former Ambassador and President of his country, in effect, told me only a few weeks ago:

"The scandalous connivance of the police disclosed by the Brooklyn grand jury is known throughout Latin America. It destroys overnight your efforts to win the minds and hearts of our people. If dishonesty amongst your officials continues, you might as well forget about the Voice of America and other efforts to keep us on your side. The millions of dollars you are spending for these purposes will go down the drain unless you get back to your old system of integrity in public life."

Just as the people, and particularly the youth, of a country are prone to imitate their leaders, so a great and powerful country such as ours sets the tempo for others. Thus, the bad example set by some of our public officials will be followed elsewhere. In any event, we cannot rationally protest against corruption abroad ruining our investments when there is such blatant corruption right at home.

This means that as corruption spreads, capital will not dare venture into other lands, and the point 4 program, which in large part must depend upon private investment, will fail.

Just as Caesar's wife must be above suspicion, so any official directly or indirectly having to do with law enforcement, must not only be good but must appear good. This is imperative from the aspect of our foreign relations. Here, at home, we may judge the corrupt or indiscreet official as an individual, but to foreigners he represents and typifies the United States, and so this Nation's reputation for integrity may stand or fall by what he does or seems to do.

The loss of moral prestige by the United States and its repercussions on others was vividly demonstrated last October, when a report issued by an official of a friendly government stated that the "bankruptcy and corruption" existing in his country, "have an intimate relation to the American example in racketeering."

One of the phenomena accompanying the breakdown in morality, to which I referred, may be stated practically as a law of nature: just as dictatorships almost always become corrupt, so conversely corruption often leads to dictatorship. This happens because either the crooks and dishonest officials become dictators in order to continue stealing, or there is an armed revolution to throw them out. In the latter case the resultant chaos and exercise of force in turn lead to dictatorship. This vicious circle has destroyed the Roman and other civilizations and could do the same to ours, if we do not take preventive measures.

In other words, either we must wipe out these mobsters and their political partners or we will lose our way of life.

Joe Stalin, if he had planned it that way, could not find a speedier and surer way to defeat the democracies than by subsidizing these gangsters and foul politicians. Actually, as I have seen in other countries how closely the gangsters and Communists work together, I sometimes wonder if the Soviet is not, at least in some measure, inciting these vermin to defile our system of law and order.

But whether or not this be so, of one thing we can be sure, the Costellos, Adonises, and the rest of this scum and still more the miserably corrupted law-enforcement officers, are among the Kremlin's best allies. Perhaps, in a sense, they are even more dangerous than the spies convicted of stealing our atomic and military secrets. After all, by ingenuity and hard work we can compensate for and replace these thefts, but the loss of morality in government will cause us to lose our self-respect and the respect and confidence of other peoples. From such a catastrophe no nation has ever recovered.

A most important result of the Senate investigating committee's work is that it is demonstrating to the entire world that our democracy is essentially sound and honest, because a bipartisan group of legislators without fear or hesitation, free from political bias, letting the chips fall where they may, are exposing to the purifying light of public opinion the crime, graft, and bribery which has existed in this and other communities.

The importance of your work, Senator KEFAUVER, from a purely domestic viewpoint, cannot be exaggerated, but I dare to say that in restoring and fortifying our country's position of respected leadership in the world you and your associates, and such bodies as the Brooklyn grand jury, can strike one of the most vital blows required for our defense and the preservation of the confidence in and friendship for us of other nations.

Our citizens are aroused, and an aroused citizenry is irresistible. They will relentlessly demand honest and competent officials, who will drive the criminals into prison, out of the country, or into the electric chair.

The New York City Anticrime Committee was formed to help in this work. You may be assured it is at your service at all times, and we hope to join with other crime commissions throughout the country to make this a great national campaign, an unremitting crusade.

H. R. 1 Provides $10,000 of Free Insurance for Every Member of the Armed Forces

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. CARL ELLIOTT

OF ALABAMA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Thursday, March 22, 1951

Mr. ELLIOTT. Mr. Speaker, on January 24, 1951, the United States House of Representatives passed a free insurance bill for members of the Armed Forces by a vote of 390 to 0.

This bill, when and if it becomes law, will have the great advantage of providing every member of the Armed Forces with $10,000 of insurance during the period of his military service and for at least 90 days after his discharge, without cost to the serviceman.

Thus, we can be assured of universal insurance coverage of all members of the Armed Forces, a result which we were never able to attain in World War I or World War II.

Experience has heretofore been that the dependents of deceased servicemen who did not have either national service life insurance or Government life insurance, were generally among those who needed the benefits of insurance most. Universal coverage of all who serve in our military forces is a much-to-be-desired ideal. The bill, H. R. 1, will, for the first time in the military history of this country, enable us to attain that ideal.

Under leave to extend my remarks, I include an article by James Marlow entitled "Free Insurance Bill Covers Servicemen Killed Since June 27" from the Wednesday, February 21, 1951, edition of the Evening Star:

FREE INSURANCE BILL COVERS SERVICEMEN KILLED SINCE JUNE 27

(By James Marlow)

Veterans with national service life insurance may be puzzled about a move in Congress to set up a new kind of GI insurance.

Up to now, men in service could get this national service life insurance, insuring themselves up to $10,000. They had to pay for it, but no one had to buy it. Roughly 20 percent of the men now in service, with dependents, don't have the insurance.

If a serviceman bought it, he could drop it when he was discharged, and that would end it. But if he wanted to, he could keep it to cover him in civilian life.

If he kept it, he could have the cheapest kind, called term insurance, or convert it to a more expensive permanent policy. In either case, he'd have to keep on paying for it. Only about 4,000,000 World War II veterans have kept the national service life insurance they had while in service.

HOW IT WOULD WORK

That's the way the story has been and is now. But a week ago the House Veterans Committee approved a new kind of GI insurance.

If it goes through as approved, this is the way it will work:

Every serviceman will be insured for $10,000 by the Government for as long as he's in service and for 90 days afterward. He won't have to pay for it. At the end of those 90 days, the insurance stops.

If he comes out of the service disabled he can keep the insurance—it is called "H" policy—but he'll have to pay for it then. The maximum "H" policy is $10,000.

If he comes out of the service totally disabled, then he gets this same "H" policy free for the whole period of his total disability. The "H" policy in that case is a flat $10,000.

RETROACTIVE IN DEATHS

And this new law would take care of the survivors of men who died in service since June 27, 1950, if they were not protected at the time of their death by the present national service life insurance.

For example: John Jones was killed in Korea in July but had no national service life insurance. Still, he had dependents. The new law would provide $10,000 for them.

Or, Tom Smith was killed in Korea. He had dependents, too, but only $5,000 national service life insurance. Under the new law those dependents would get an additional $5,000, to make the total insurance payment to them $10,000.

But what of those 4,000,000 World War II veterans who kept national service life insurance after being discharged and have been paying on it ever since? The new law wouldn't affect them or their policy in any way. They'd continue to pay on their national service life insurance policy.

BACK-IN-SERVICE CASE

But suppose a veteran with this old national service life insurance is called back into service now and this House committee bill becomes a law. He'd get a break.

Once back in service, he'd be covered free with the new $10,000 policy. He could give up his old national service life insurance policy.

If he had a permanent national service life insurance policy, he'd get back from the Government, when he gave it up, the policy's cash surrender value.

If he had the cheaper national service life insurance term policy, he'd get nothing back when he gave it up after returning to the service.

But what happens when this veteran—who went back into service and gave up his national service life insurance policy—is discharged later on? As noted above, the protection of the $10,000-for-free policy under the new law would end 90 days after his discharge. Is he then left without any insurance?

COULD GET IT BACK

No. Once discharged, he could get back his old national service life insurance policy:

1. If he had the permanent kind, he can get it back by returning all the money he had received when he gave it up, plus a sum slightly less than what he would have paid on it from the time he gave it up until he wanted it back again. And he could get this back without a physical examination.

2. If he had the national service life insurance term insurance, he could get it back simply by paying a sum equal to two monthly premiums. But he'd have to take a physical examination.

If he was disabled and couldn't pass the term insurance examination he'd get the "H" insurance mentioned before, up to $10,000 and pay for it month by month.

If he was totally disabled, he'd get a full $10,000 "H" policy for free for the whole period of his total disability.

Posthumous Award of Congressional Medal of Honor to Sgt. William Russell Jecelin

OF

HON. HERBERT R. O'CONOR

OF MARYLAND

IN THE SENATE OF THE UNITED STATES

Wednesday, March 28 (legislative day of Monday, March 26), 1951

Mr. O'CONOR. Mr. President, the Congressional Medal of Honor is the supreme tribute which our Nation can pay to the valor of one of its fighting men. Its recipients have always been held, and rightly so, in a specially exalted classification among all the heroes of our Armed Forces.

It is with a sense of pride, therefore, that I bring to the attention of the Senate the posthumous award of this decoration to Sgt. William Russell Jecelin, of Baltimore, for incredible courage in saving the members of his platoon by covering with his body an exploding hand grenade after he had led and rallied his men to storm and capture an enemy ridge in Korea.

"Greater love hath no man than this, that a man lay down his life for his friends." The account of the award and the reasons therefor will be, I am sure, an inspiration to all the countrymen of this gallant young man, and I ask unanimous consent that the story of the award and of the heroism which merited it, as published in the Baltimore Sun of March 27, together with an editorial from the same paper this morning, be published in the Appendix of the RECORD.

There being no objection, the article and editorial were ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

[From the Baltimore Sun of March 27, 1951]

CONGRESSIONAL MEDAL OF HONOR ANNOUNCED FOR BALTIMORE HERO—SERGEANT JECELIN THREW HIMSELF ON GRENADE IN KOREAN FIGHT TO SAVE MEN

The Congressional Medal of Honor, the Nation's highest military decoration, has been awarded posthumously to a young Baltimore soldier who threw himself on an exploding hand grenade in Korea and saved his comrades from almost certain death.

"This incredible courage" of Sgt. William Russell Jecelin, who lived at 228 Henneman Avenue before entering the Army, climaxed his company's direct frontal attack on a strongly defended enemy ridge which was blocking the advance of United Nations troops.

BRADLEY TO GIVE MEDAL

The action took place September 19 near Saga during the first United Nations advance up the Korean peninsula.

The blue-ribboned medal, the sixth to be awarded in the present conflict, will be presented to the sergeant's father, John Jecelin, Jr., at 2:30 p. m. next Tuesday by Gen. Omar N. Bradley, Chairman of the Joint Chiefs of Staff.

The ceremony will be held in the Pentagon in Washington.

TEXT OF CITATION

The citation reads as follows:

"Sgt. William R. Jecelin, Company C, Thirty-fifth Infantry Regiment, distinguished himself by conspicuous gallantry and intrepidity above and beyond the call of duty in action against the enemy near Saga, Korea, on September 19, 1950. His company was ordered to secure a prominent, saw-toothed ridge from a well entrenched and heavily armed enemy force.

"Unable to capture the objective in the first attempt, a frontal and flanking assault was launched. He led his platoon through heavy enemy fire and bursting shells, across rice fields and rocky terrain, in direct frontal attack on the ridge in order to draw fire away from the flanks.

"The unit advanced to the base of the cliff, where intense, accurate hostile fire stopped the attack.

"Realizing that an assault was the only solution, Sergeant Jecelin rose from his position firing his rifle and throwing grenades as he called on his men to follow him. Despite the intense enemy fire this attack carried to the crest of the ridge, where the men were forced to take cover.

"Again he rallied his men and stormed the enemy strongpoint. With fixed bayonets they charged into the face of antitank fire and engaged the enemy in hand-to-hand combat. After clubbing and clashing this force into submission the platoon was forced to take cover from indirect frontal fire of a self-propelled gun.

SAVE THOSE AROUND HIM

"Refusing to be stopped he leaped to his feet and through sheer personal courage and fierce determination led his men in a new attack. At this instance a well-camouflaged enemy soldier threw a grenade at the remaining members of the platoon. He immediately lunged and covered the grenade with his body, absorbing the full force of the explosion to save those around him.

"This incredible courage and willingness to sacrifice himself for his comrades so imbued them with fury that they completely eliminated the enemy force. Sergeant Jecelin's heroic leadership and outstanding gallantry reflect the highest credit upon himself and uphold the esteemed traditions of the military service."

General MacArthur has sent a letter to Sergeant Jecelin's sister, Mrs. Marie De Vaux, expressing his regret at the "untimely and tragic loss of your brother." Sergeant Jecelin had named Mrs. De Vaux as the relative to be notified should he be killed or injured.

"I am confident," wrote the commander of the United Nations armies, "that his devotion to duty, at the cost of all he held dear, will hasten the day when ruthless aggression shall disappear from the face of the earth and freemen everywhere will live together in peace and harmony."

SINGING ALL THE TIME

Mrs. De Vaux, who lives at 8106 Walnut Avenue, Rosedale, described her brother yesterday as a quiet, soft-spoken boy "who seemed to be singing all the time."

"He was real lively," she said, "and liked to listen to jazz music and go to football games.

"One thing about him, though, he couldn't stand an argument. In fact, if some people were arguing in the room, he would walk out till it was over. He always did that."

Sergeant Jecelin lived with his sister several years before enlisting.

PARACHUTE DIDN'T OPEN

His father, who lives at 2107 East Chase Street, has been a trackman for the Baltimore Transit Co. for the past 21 years. His mother, Mrs. Bertha Killmeyer Jecelin, died a few years after he was born.

Mrs. De Vaux recalled yesterday that her brother wanted to be a paratrooper when he first entered the Army. He trained at Camp Breckinridge, Ky., when an incident occurred which led to the heroic Korean episode.

"He had already made one jump in a parachute," Mrs. De Vaux said, "when, the next time up, he saw a friend of his jump out of the plane, but the parachute didn't open.

"RIGHT IN THE THICK OF IT

"He told them, after that, that he didn't want to jump any more. They said he would have to finish the training or else go overseas. He told them he would rather go overseas."

Sergeant Jecelin left for Japan March 11, 1949. He had enlisted November 21, 1948. He entered Korea with the Twenty-fourth Division soon after the North Koreans crossed the thirty-eighth parallel.

"He was right in the thick of it" until the day he was killed, Mrs. De Vaux said.

THIRD OF FOUR CHILDREN

Sergeant Jecelin was born May 24, 1930, at 1002 North Chester Street. He was the third of four children of the Jecelins, all born at that address. He has an older brother, George, 31, now ill in the Maryland General Hospital, and two sisters, Mrs. De Vaux, 28, and Miss Agnes Novena Jecelin, 17.

The family moved later to 1514 North Chapel Street and were there about a year when Mrs. Jecelin died after a fall down their cellar steps.

Mr. Jecelin married again and with his children moved to 2107 East Chase Street. Sergeant Jecelin attended Elementary School No. 2, Chase and McDonald Streets. He left school after the sixth grade.

"He never was one for school," Mrs. De Vaux said. "He got a job with a dairy and drove a milk truck for them. He worked at that for three years and then enlisted.

"He really seemed to enjoy his work. He worked the night shift, from 12 to 8, and when he came home he usually would sit around and listen to the radio or else go out and meet some of his friends.

"He worked hard, though, and saved his money. When he went in the service he had $2,000 saved up."

His family said he was a baseball fan.

SENT MONEY FOR NEW HOME

Mrs. De Vaux said that he sent regular allotments home and had invested most of his money in a new house in Rosedale. Most of the family live there now and Mr. Jecelin usually visits them on week ends, she said.

Sergeant Jecelin's last letter home, written to his brother, George, was dated August 29, 1950. After describing a hand-to-hand fight with a North Korean unit, he ended by writing:

"Well, George, that's about all for now so drop me a few lines soon. There go some B-29's over to raise some hell further up the line. Well, George, I think I will catch a couple hours' sleep while there is nothing doing.

"P. S.—Tell Dad to take it easy and not to worry too much, because I will be home soon.

"BROTHER BILL."

A NEW AMERICAN HERO, SGT. WILLIAM R. JECELIN

Bill Jecelin was not the kind of boy who believes the world owes him a living. He left school at 15 and went to work for a milk company, in Baltimore, from midnight until 8 a. m. By the time he enlisted in the Army at the age of 18 he had saved $2,000, which he invested in a house for his brother and sisters. He hated arguments, liked jazz music and football games, and seemed to be singing all the time.

By the time Bill Jecelin was 20 years 3 months and 26 days old, he was dead. He was dead on top of a saw-toothed ridge in Korea which he, a platoon sergeant, was responsible for capturing in repeated charges against seemingly overwhelming enemy fire. He was dead on top of a grendate which he had covered with his body in a successful effort to shield his men from the ensuing blast. He was dead, but his complete and devastating devotion to duty continued to lead his men to further victories.

Nobody has ever successfully answered the question: What makes a hero? Certainly Bill Jecelin, the youngster behind the wheel of a milk truck, could not have been singled out as likely to become the sixth American among many thousands of Americans in Korea to win the highest military award this country has to offer. Certainly the boy who always left the room to avoid a family argument and who balked at making a second jump as a paratrooper was not likely to become the man who rose up again and again in the fury of concentrated enemy fire and led his platoon into hand-to-hand combat.

All we know is that when the military situation called for heroic action, it was Bill Jecelin who stood up and met the challenge. In losing his life he truly saved it, because the name of Baltimore's Bill Jecelin will surely live long on the American roll of honor.

America's No. 1 Farm Problem

OF

HON. JOHN J. SPARKMAN

OF ALABAMA

IN THE SENATE OF THE UNITED STATES

Wednesday, March 28 (legislative day of Monday, March 26), 1951

Mr. SPARKMAN. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to have printed in the Appendix of the RECORD an article entitled "America's No. 1 Farm Problem," written by Lauren Soth and published in the current March issue of Successful Farming. This article, in popular language, discusses the problem of underemployment of rural families, and is based upon a staff report to the Joint Committee on the Economic Report prepared at the request of this committee's Subcommittee on Low-Income Families, of which I am chairman. At my request there was printed in the Appendix of the RECORD of March 22, 1951, at page A1656, a summary of the staff report.

There being no objection, the article was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

AMERICA'S NO. 1 FARM PROBLEM

(By Lauren Soth)

America's No. 1 farm problem today is not fair prices for farmers. Neither is it adjustment of production, soil conservation, nor any of the other perplexing questions which have bothered farmers and the Government in recent years.

It is manpower.

We are beginning a vast expansion in our military strength, to meet the threat of world communism. For the indefinite future, we shall have to maintain a high degree of armed readiness. This takes men for the Army, Navy, and Air Force. More important, it takes men away from producing civilian goods, and puts them to work on military airplanes, tanks, cannon, ammunition, and so forth. National defense comes first.

In certain industries, manpower already is scarce. By the end of 1951, when defense production gets into full swing, nearly all factory managers will be pleading for more workmen. By that time, also, many farmers in the commercial agriculture regions will be short of help.

This will mean a drastic reduction in the output of many civilian goods, including some farm products, unless we can find ways to add new workers to the labor force—or use our present labor force more efficiently. The degree to which we maintain our present high living standards will depend in large part on our success in this manpower job.

Where can we get additional manpower?

Several sources come to mind quickly:

We can reduce the number of unemployed. But of a labor force of 65,000,000, only a little over 2,000,000 are out of work at present. This is about normal for a full employment period. In a free economy—where people are changing jobs often—some slack must be maintained. Even in the stress of World War II the unemployed figure never dropped below one million.

Factory workers can work longer hours. Already, the average number of hours per week has gone up; it will increase further.

More women, young people, and older people ready for retirement will go to work.

These things will help. But the biggest source of new manpower is the underemployed. These people are working full time, but are so inefficient they add little to the Nation's output. A large block of these underemployed persons are in farming.

So the manpower problem is a farm problem from two angles: Commercial agriculture needs more labor, and another section of agriculture has a surplus of usable labor.

A committee of Congress, under Senator JOHN SPARKMAN, of Alabama, has just completed a searching inquiry into the facts about underemployment in farming. Some of the figures will surprise you. They show that our vaunted efficiency in American farming has some holes in it.

They show that while most of United States' agriculture has been moving forward—using more machinery, better seed, better fertilizer, and so on—a very large group of farm people has been standing still. These farmers still are using the methods of their grandfathers. They have not caught up with the industrial age.

Here are the Sparkman committee findings:

1. About 1,600,000 farm families produce less than $2,500 worth of products a year, based on 1945 prices. At present prices, this figure might be $3,000. That's total, gross value—including all products sold and used at home.

Of these 1,600,000 families, 1,000,000 produced less than $1,500 worth of crops and livestock in 1945.

You can estimate for yourself how much net income was left after paying expenses—and how dire is the poverty in which these people live.

2. The Sparkman committee found another 400,000 part-time farm families, who had total earnings of $2,000 or less in 1945.

It is estimated that of the Nation's total of 5,700,000 farm families, 2,000,000 (1,600,000 full-time farmers and 400,000 part-time) produced less than half as much as the families on medium-sized, commercial family farms. (In computing these figures, the Sparkman committee eliminated all families where the head of the family was under 25 or over 65. Thus, these are farmers of working age.)

In other words, more than one-third of the farm families of this country are less than half as productive as the average family on a commercial farm.

3. In addition, says the Sparkman report, there are about 1,500,000 nonfarm families, living in rural areas, who had family incomes of $2,000 or less in 1945. Here again, these are able-bodied people of working age—not the very young or very old.

And, finally, there are about 1,000,000 hired wage workers, who work part time or full time on farms, who earned an average of only $530 in cash in 1945. They worked an average of only 158 days in that year. To a large extent, these wage workers are included in the nonfarm families mentioned above.

"If the workers in these three groups," says the Sparkman committee, "could be employed at jobs where they would produce as much as the average worker on the medium-sized commercial family farm it would be the equivalent of adding 2,500,000 workers to the labor force."

Where do these people live? The greater share of them are in the South. But some are in the cut-over lands of the Great Lakes States and the far Northwest, and in some of the isolated mountain areas of the West. Some are in the southern, hilly fringe of the rich Corn Belt States.

Are these farmers mostly tenants and sharecroppers? No; about 57 percent of those who had a gross of less than $1,500 in 1945 owned the small acreages they farmed.

What are their farms like? Well, here's a typical Piedmont region farm in North Carolina: It is a 45-acre place run by an owner-operator. The farmer has 19 acres of woodland and wasteland, 2 acres of pasture land, and 24 acres of crops. He has small fields of cotton, tobacco, corn, wheat, oats, and lespedeza; 2 cows, 2 hogs, and 40 chickens. The farm takes only 180 man-days of labor per year.

Here's a typical southern Appalachian farm: The farmer-owner has 24 acres to work with, of which 10½ acres are cropland. He grows a little tobacco, has 4 acres in corn, and about 6 acres in other crops. He has 1 cow, 2 hogs, and 20 chickens. The business takes 120 days of man labor.

A southern Illinois owner-operator of 120 acres has 23 acres in crops. The farmer raises 7 acres of cotton and 16 of lespedeza. He handles 2 dairy cows, has 6 beef animals, 7 hogs, and 60 chickens. The farm is operated with 120 days of man labor.

The net cash income in all three of these cases, which were selected as representative of their areas by the Department of Agriculture, was less than $500 at the 1945 level of prices (or about $550 at 1950 prices). The farm families got about as much income in the form of food consumed at home as in cash.

This is real poverty. It is tragedy. But the effects of this poverty on the farm families themselves—the lack of education for the children, the poor nutrition, the ill health—need not concern us here. In this article let's look at the problem from the standpoint of the rest of us, from the standpoint of the Nation as a whole.

Clearly, the goods we all have to consume, including the goods we need to be militarily strong, come from what we all produce. The failure of 2,000,000 farm families to produce more than one-half their share is a heavy burden on the Nation. It seriously cuts down on our ability to maintain the national standard of living during a time of great military expense.

The underemployed farm families are a burden on the rest of us in other ways. Their health is poorer on the average. So more of them require public aid for health services and fewer of the young men are eligible for military duty. Many of these people have to go on relief when they are too old to work.

Their children aren't as well educated because local schools are poorly financed. So we are seriously considering a Federal aid program which would improve educational standards in the poor farm areas. We cannot afford to have a large group of young people so poorly educated that they are a liability instead of an asset to democratic government.

But all this welfare and relief, which costs lots of money, doesn't get at the root of the problem: underemployment or lack of productivity. How much wiser it would be to undertake a national program to raise these people up to the American standard of productivity. Then they could take care of themselves in good, old-fashioned, independent American style.

It is an easy "out" for us to say that these poor farmers are shiftless, lazy, and incapable of doing more. It is easy to say, "Well, this is a free country. Why don't they move to bigger farms or move to the cities?"

But that simply bypasses the issue. The facts are that most of the poor people on poor farms stay there. In spite of the great wave of prosperity in the last 10 years, we still have 2,000,000 families, according to the Sparkman study, who seem anchored to their pitifully unproductive farms.

Ordinary price and wage incentives do not seem to be enough to pull many of the underemployed farm people out of their ruts. In the current emergency, we cannot count on this problem solving itself—at least not fast enough to help the defense effort.

What can be done, then?

The first step is to improve practices and methods on present small farms. You would think that with all the extra labor time they have, the operators of these small farms would have high crop yields per acre and high production per unit of livestock. But they do not. They need to learn how to farm by modern methods—to use fertilizer, improved varieties of seeds, and more productive livestock.

Can they, or will they, learn? Experiences of the extension services in the Southern States, and of the Farmers Home Administration are encouraging. Once they are given the chance, plus financial help to get started, many of these so-called backward farmers prove to be very good producers. We need to place much greater emphasis on FHA and extension educational programs for the poorest farmers.

The next step is to provide larger farming units for those who demonstrate capacity to handle them. This means more credit facilities for this group of farmers. It may require a land-purchase and recombination program by the Federal Government. FHA needs additional authority from Congress to do this.

Hand in hand with this program to improve methods and expand the size of farms goes the need for machinery. During the next several years, it would pay the country to give high priority to southern agriculture on farm machinery.

If we are to make full use of manpower from southern farms, we must make machinery available to replace it.

A set-up of efficiency in the poor farming areas will not by itself solve the manpower problem. Displaced labor from these areas must be helped to find work elsewhere—in factories and in commercial farming areas. The Federal-State employment services need to expand their informational and guidance activities in the poor-farm areas. At present they have few offices, and no special information programs in such places.

Probably the most important single action that could improve the productivity of southern people would be more industrial development. Private business already has done much to encourage new factories in the South. But it is obviously impossible to locate enough factories close to surplus labor areas to give everybody a job without moving from home.

During the last war one of the chief obstacles to getting jobs for southern farm people was the difficulty of moving. Maybe we need to give some thought to providing Government funds for buying up farms of people who want to move to other farms or nonfarm work. These pieces of land could be resold to other families in the neighborhood who need bigger units.

Clearly, this problem of making fuller use of manpower on farms is many-sided. No one cure-all is possible. At several different points, however, we can make our system of free choice work better. We can remove some of the obstacles that prevent the exercise of free choice.

The heavy pressure of work which the world crisis has placed upon us demands that we make every ounce of manpower as effective as possible. Making fuller use of manpower now available on farms is the most important task for the Department of Agriculture in the immediate future.

The United States Department of Agriculture might well shift some emphasis away from price supports and other programs for commercial farmers in order to concentrate on manpower. These other programs are not needed now, anyway, because prices and incomes of commercial agriculture are certain to remain high during the defense period.

An effort to overcome the stagnation in our poor farming areas will not only help the defense effort, but it will give us a better balanced and more profitable agriculture for the long-run future.

CARE Completes 5 Years of Significant Service

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. BROOKS HAYS
OF ARKANSAS
Thursday, March 22, 1951

Mr. HAYS of Arkansas. Mr. Speaker, I have just read the fifth annual report of that great American organization known as CARE, under the splendid leadership of Paul Comly French, the executive director. In the 5 years in which this private organization has been active in relief and rehabilitation, it has assembled and distributed to needy people throughout the world 10,000,000 packages of food and textiles. As the report suggests, here are 10,000,000 ambassadors of good will. Mr. French, his able staff members, and the rank and file workers throughout America, utilizing our church and benevolent institutions, have given the most tangible evidence of our concern for the victims of war and other disasters. The report carries words of appreciation from the heads of government in Europe and Asia whose peoples have been helped by this activity. Included also is a fine appraisal of its significance by Gen. Douglas MacArthur. The American people can be proud of CARE's magnificent record.

OF
HON. HUBERT H. HUMPHREY
OF MINNESOTA
IN THE SENATE OF THE UNITED STATES
Wednesday, March 28 (legislative day of Monday, March 26), 1951

Mr. HUMPHREY. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to have printed in the Appendix of the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD two excerpts from the magazine Newsweek. The first is from the magazine's issue of February 26, 1951, and is a telegram from the Honorable Francis Biddle, distinguished former Attorney General of the United States and now national chairman of Americans for Democratic Action. The second excerpt is from the magazine's March 5, 1951, issue and is a letter from Mr. Walter P. Reuther, president of the United Automobile Workers, CIO. These items are pertinent for the RECORD in order to be read together with an insertion made on Wednesday, March 14, by the junior Senator from Wisconsin [Mr. MCCARTHY].

The three insertions read together will, I am confident, leave no doubt in the minds of reasonable people as to what the facts are. Mr. Reuther's opposition to communism is irrefutable. His record of militant, practical, and successful opposition to communism is well known.

There being no objection, the excerpts were ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

[From Newsweek of February 26, 1951]

IN BEHALF OF REUTHER

As national chairman and presiding officer at last ADA national board meeting, statement attributed to Walter Reuther in Moley article February 12 issue of Newsweek totally inaccurate. Reuther's positive program of attack on communism within trade-union movement and at national and world level is outstanding and has long spoken for itself. Public distortion of his vigorous and effective stand against Communist doctrine as well as Communist military aggression serves only totalitarian propaganda ends.

FRANCIS BIDDLE.

WASHINGTON, D. C.

(The questioned statement was picked up from Victor Riesel, labor columnist, who is standing by what he was told by his source.)

[From Newsweek of March 5, 1951]

REUTHER'S REBUTTAL

My fight against communism of all varieties, including world communism, is sufficiently on record as to need no defense or explanation. However, I would like to keep the record straight.

I was supposed to have said, according to a quotation used by Raymond Moley in his column (Newsweek, February 12): "I am not interested in fighting world communism. I am only interested in fighting Communist imperialism. I draw a distinction between world communism and Communist imperialism. I'm willing to leave the fight against world communism to MCCARTHY and the Republicans."

I believe I have clearly demonstrated in work and action (a) I am against world communism, (b) I regard imperialism as only one of the many ugly sides of communism, (c) I do not draw any distinction between world communism and Communist imperialism, and that (d) I most certainly am not willing to leave the fight against world communism to the McCarthys because McCarthyism cannot win the fight against communism.

What I actually said at the ADA meeting to which Moley referred was this: "I am not interested in a purely negative fight against communism, because a negative fight will not succeed. I will leave that kind of fighting to the McCarthys. I am for a positive fight against communism, because that is the only way to win.

"We must build military strength to resist aggression on the battle front, and at the same time, fight against poverty and hunger on the economic and social front because poverty and hunger are the sources of Communist power."

Use of Television by Congress and Committees

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
OF WISCONSIN
IN THE SENATE OF THE UNITED STATES
Thursday, March 29 (legislative day of Monday, March 26), 1951

Mr. WILEY. Mr. President, this morning's Washington Post contains an interesting editorial on the subject of a proposed voluntary code to be worked out so as to make sure that television is constructively used by Congress and its committees. This was the substance of the suggestion I made in my public statements on this subject which were reprinted in the Appendix of the RECORD on Tuesday, March 27, 1951.

The Washington Post suggests that the Subcommittee on Congr ssional Reorganization of the Senate Committee on Expenditures in the Executive Departments be the group to handle this issue. I personally feel that it might better come within the purview of the Senate Committee on Rules and Administration, which might concentrate on this particular subject rather than become involved in a great mass of other congressional reorganization details. Whoever does the job, however, I trust that it will be done promptly and in the public interest.

I ask unanimous consent that the text of the Post editorial be printed in the Appendix of the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD.

Prior to the Washington Post editorial, however, I should like to have included in the RECORD a copy of a Tuesday, March 27, editorial that appeared in the New York World-Telegram and Sun on this same issue. I think that this is one of the most stimulating editorials which has been published to date regarding the new TV "baby." This editorial very kindly commends my suggestion to the effect that we should not allow TV to be used recklessly and without careful thought. The editorial points out in a very sensible fashion the fact that in other hands the televising of congressional hearings could become a very dangerous instrument. The fact that our subcommittee has been conscientious in its handling of the hearings does not detract from the fact that some other committee might not exercise such high standards.

There being no objection, the editorials were ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

[From the New York World-Telegram and Sun]

THE TV "BABY"

Many thoughtful citizens are uneasy about television's spectacular role in the hearings of Senator KEFAUVER's crime investigating committee.

They concede the tremendous popularity of the fascinating show provided for millions of people throughout the country.

They aren't concerned for the tender sensibilities of underworld big shots who complain of "fear psychology" when required to testify under the glaring lights, even though not in direct range of the TV cameras.

And they agreed that Senator KEFAUVER and his colleagues have sought commendably to conduct the hearings with dignity and restraint.

But they are apprehensive about what could develop now that the precedent has been established.

All congressional investigations, unfortunately, are not inspired by motives as good as those of the Kefauver committee. Some have been—as some may be hereafter—conducted by men ruthlessly bent on smearing honorable persons whose political or economic views differed from their own.

There is nothing fanciful in the fear that innocent witnesses, subjected to ordeal by television before future Senate or House committees, may suffer ruin of their reputations if their rights are not carefully protected.

Senator WILEY, a Wisconsin Republican and a member of the Kefauver committee, is one who sees this danger plainly.

He has proposed a thorough study of television's part in hearings and other congressional proceedings, with a view to establishing definite standards and preventing abuses. He says:

"The usual history of developments such as this TV 'baby' is that the medium becomes more and more used, more and more wildly, with less and less restraint, until in some dramatic instance, say, an innocent man's reputation, is destroyed. Then the people strike back at the 'monster' they have created by passing restrictive rules."

The Kefauver committee's hearings have made such a hit on TV that public demand for more like them is sure to be strong. And congressional desire to meet that demand also is certain.

Now, therefore, is the time for Congress to act on Senator WILEY's excellent suggestion. Unless its committees are required to observe common-sense standards of good taste and restraint, he says, correctly:

"Televised hearings will degenerate into three-ring circuses, fourth-rate stage productions with hamming and phony theatrics or unjust inquisitions under klieg lights."

Other mediums of public information—the press, the news cameramen, the radio, the newsreels—also should not object to fair and sensible standards for their coverage of congressional hearings and proceedings.

CODE ON USE OF TV

The grinding of television and motion picture cameras and the flashing of newspaper photographers' bulbs were probably only a convenient excuse seized upon by Morris Kleinman and Louis Rothkopf to cover up their unwillingness to testify before the Kefauver committee. Both had been dodging subpenas for 3½ months. They were brought before the committee under arrest. If no cameramen had been present, the pair would probably have sought some other excuse for not testifying. Nevertheless, their refusal to talk with the television audience looking on will furnish an interesting test of whether Congress may compel testimony under these circumstances. We hope the case will be ably and thoroughly presented to the courts.

At the outset it should be understood, however, that the courts cannot settle the larger issue that has been raised. Presumably the decision of the courts in this case will tell Congress only whether or not it may compel a witness to talk directly to the country as well as to itself. Beyond this question of legal rights lie momentous questions of policy: To what extent should television and motion pictures be utilized in congressional investigations when witnesses do not object? To what extent should their objections be overridden if the courts decided to sustain contempt convictions for refusal to talk for TV? Decision of the legal issues will not relieve Congress of the necessity of adopting a policy of its own.

It is a timely moment for Congress to be thinking about a code for the guidance of its investigators—a code that would include other rules of fair investigative practice aside from the use of television. With expert assistance, the Subcommittee on Reorganization of the Senate Committee on Expenditures in the Executive Departments is currently studying ways and means of improving the performance of Congress and its committees. One of its primary tasks might well be the writing of a code of fair procedure for congressional investigators, with special emphasis on this new problem that Congress has not yet had time to think about.

Congressional Probers Again Prove Their Value

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. KARL E. MUNDT

Thursday, March 29 (legislative day of Monday, March 26), 1951

Mr. MUNDT. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to have printed in the Appendix of the RECORD an article entitled "Congressional Probers Again Prove Their Value," by Leslie Gould. The article appeared in the March 22, 1951, issue of the New York Journal-American.

There being no objection, the article was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

CONGRESSIONAL PROBERS AGAIN PROVE THEIR VALUE

(By Leslie Gould)

The value of congressional committee investigations has again been proved.

Eighteen years ago, a congressional committee showed up the racketeering in finance and some lines of business. The things exposed were known, but had never been gathered together in one shocking package.

More recently, a congressional committee turned up the Communist infiltration into Government and caught in the net Alger Hiss.

If it hadn't been for the congressional committee, Hiss would never have been exposed. He was one of the darlings of the New Deal and part of the conspiracy that sold the country out to the Russians and killed the peace won by the blood, sweat and tears of World War II.

A congressional committee turned up Andy May—the double dealing Congressman who had headed the powerful Military Affairs Committee—and the Garsson brothers.

Currently the racketeering in Government is being exposed, with the RFC bowing to influence in making unsound, political loans. The influence trail to the RFC leads right into the White House.

The links between the most vicious gambling and criminal elements in the country, going back to the dark days of prohibition, to important figures in local, State and National Government are being revealed in all their disgusting detail.

The investigations of 18 years ago brought a long overdue clean-up of the financial markets, but they also have brought along powerful Government interference with private business and some of this influence is crooked.

The pendulum has swung now far to the left. Criminal elements are political powers. They control many of the unions, particularly those along the water fronts.

If the shocking revelations of the Kefauver committee and the Fulbright committee bring the long overdue clean-up, the public will be the gainer. But if just one or two figures are sacrificed and the matter ends there, with the same thing continuing only under new names, the investigations will mean nothing.

The investigations have hardly more than scratched the surface. This is particularly true of the Fulbright inquiry into the RFC. This is only one agency. Many of the other agencies in Washington are similarly operated.

Behind the whole stinking mess are lawyers peddling influence, hiding behind their cloak of immunity of lawyer-client privilege. A real housecleaning is needed in the legal profession.

Politics and the American Legion

OF

HON. LEROY JOHNSON

OF CALIFORNIA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Thursday, March 22, 1951

Mr. JOHNSON. Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my remarks I include an article from the Stockton Legionnaire, which I wish every American could read. The American Legion has often been charged with politics and with inordinate selfishness.

From its inception the Legion determined to keep out of partisan politics and as far as the American Legion in California is concerned, which is the only one of which I have intimate knowledge, they have done exactly that. This has been one of the strong characteristics of the American Legion. The Legion supports principles, community activities and institutions but, very wisely, it does not support candidates for political office.

Also, the Legion has consistently and persistently taken a strong stand against subversive activities against our Government. There has been no deviation in its course in this regard. Furthermore, it has consistently taken a strong and vigorous stand on national defense. From the beginning it has many times affirmed that it believes universal military training is the one way to make and keep America strong. It has been my privilege to hear some of the men who represent the Legion speak before the House Armed Services Committee. Some of the best presentations of the need for and the utility of universal military training have been made by Legionnaires. The one that I remember more vividly than all others is the presentation made by Perry Brown, of Texas, who is one of the Legion's past national commanders.

This article referred to was printed in the Stockton Legionnaire, the Post paper of Karl Ross Post No. 16, my Post in my home town of Stockton, Calif.

I believe I can truthfully say that Karl Ross Post is one of the great legion posts in the entire United States. The main reason it has been such a constructive force in our city is that there has been practically complete harmony among the post members. No matter what the members' political differences might be—or differences on other matters—when they come into the legion meeting they pull and work together. The post has done a great many fine things for the city of Stockton and for its people and has contributed many thousands of dollars toward public improvements. It has carried on a vigorous program in support of our public schools and in disseminating wholesome information regarding the benefits of the American political and social system. There is a comradeship in Karl Ross Post that I have never found in any other group and I can truthfully say that, of all the other organizations that I belong to, I cherish my membership in Karl Ross Post more than my membership in any other group. I am very proud of the fact that I once served as the commander of this post.

Following is the article:

The formation of war veterans into peacetime organizations seems to be one of the invariable results of modern demobilization. These organizations have been many, and varied in general plan and purpose. Some seek only to promote the selfish interests of their members, while others seek to render public service in peace as well as in war. It is perhaps natural that the American Legion, originally formed by veterans of a war to make the world safe for democracy, should fall into the latter class. The preamble of our Constitution, one of the greatest dedications to high patriotism ever written, discloses a determination to be ever militant in the defense of the ideas our comrades died to save.

Recognizing that the military struggles of the last decade are but a renewal of the battle for democracy—a battle that will continue until the people learn to turn from their pacifists and demagogs long enough to make good, in peacetime, the victories for democracy won by the blood of their sons in war—membership in the Legion was opened to the veterans of later wars.

To keep the organization on as high a level as possible, for as long as possible, the constitution provided that it should be nonpolitical, in the sense that it would not be used to promote the candidacy for public office of any person, or to advance the cause of any political party. Our determination, as previously suggested, was to be militant in defending the Constitution of the United States of America, a 100-percent Americanism, combating the autocracy of the classes and the masses, making right the master of might, promoting peace and good will on earth, and perpetuating the principles of justice, freedom, democracy. It was never suspected at that time that such a program would conflict with the programs of persons in public office. But the people forgot that eternal vigilance is the price of liberty, and hundreds of those who would destroy what we fought to save wormed their way into high places in our National Government. For a while the Legion was practically alone in warning the American people that termites had invaded the foundations of our national structure, and were becoming ever more effective in their program of destruction.

Our work was, of course, very obnoxious to certain groups, and they set out to destroy us. The rumor of a meeting on perhaps the most prominent lawn in Washington, D. C., one hot summer afternoon during World War II, for the purpose of planning the formation of an organization to put the American Legion out of business, is well founded. The plan failed, and the organization that was to wipe us out has fallen into disrepute.

But the battle continues, and as usual in such cases, one of the weapons is to try to shake the confidence of its members in the organization. So they began asserting and repeating that the American Legion is too much in politics. Some of the more or less gullible members began repeating it, and some even went so far as to assert that eligibles were declining to join because of the activity of the organization in party politics. Of course no one ever actually refused to join because of that false statement, but it is not to be denied that many who have other reasons may find satisfaction in advancing that excuse for declining. It sounds pure and holy, and we ourselves have often not been too skillful in calling attention to the Stalin philosophy that a lie, repeated often enough, is bound ultimately to be believed by someone.

It is natural, therefore, that many of the founders of the organization viewed with alarm the introduction, some months ago, of a resolution which, if adopted on a national scale, would completely disarm the organization, and subject us to just criticism of having shrunk into a simple treasury-raiding outfit. The backers of the resolution were of undoubted sincerety and loyalty. But they lost sight of our main objectives. Fortunately the proposal for this self-emasculation was caught in time, and the resolution amended so as to call for no weakening of our past policy or practice.

Tell me that the American Legion has failed to sign up 2,000,000 members because we are not sufficiently active in the support of our high purposes, and I will believe you. I frequently hear the criticism, "You talk about these things, but you don't do anything about them." For instance, it is not easy to explain why when surveys showed 80 percent of the people of the United States behind our military training program, we did not actively engage in the defeat of two Congresses, one Republican, one Democratic, which refused to do anything about it.

But look well into the background of someone who repeats, parrotlike, the assertion that the American Legion is too much in politics, as an excuse for not joining. Read him the preamble, and ask him if he believes in the same things we do. Maybe he is not going our way.

If we are to remain true to our principles, it is our duty to do all in our power to combat the infiltration of communism and communistic influence in our Goverment, as well as to combat the childish stupidity that gave Stalin half of the world on a platter, a situation that will cost millions of lives to correct, if indeed it can ever be corrected. The American Legion is a truly democratic organization, and as such it has not always been free from the faults of democracy. But to our everlasting credit it must be said that, while often blundering in our methods and inconsistent in our acts, we gave the Nation the only leadership it had, for a long period of time, in the battle against the fifth column. If we force ourselves to withdraw from the fight now, on the ground that we are treading on some politician's toes, then next time we meet, let's not forget to bring along our knitting. We won't be good for anything else.

The Final Chapter of the Alger Hiss Case

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
IN THE SENATE OF THE UNITED STATES
Thursday, March 29 (legislative day of Monday, March 26), 1951

Mr. MUNDT. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to have printed in the Appendix of the RECORD in one place, under the title "The Final Chapter of the Alger Hiss Case," three newspaper clippings, being editorials or articles. The first one is an editorial entitled "Final Chapter in Alger Hiss Case," from the Daily Argus-Leader, of Sioux Falls, S. Dak.; the second is an editorial entitled "Hiss Is Lucky," taken from the South Bend Tribune, of South Bend, Ind.; and the third is a news article entitled "Alger Hiss Is Taken to Lewisburg Prison," from the front page of the Washington Times-Herald for March 29, 1951.

There being no objection, the editorials and article were ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

[From the Sioux Falls (S. Dak.) Daily Argus-Leader]

FINAL CHAPTER IN ALGER HISS CASE

The United States Supreme Court this week wrote what is perhaps the final chapter in the case of Alger Hiss when it refused to review his conviction on a perjury charge.

Thus goes into the archives one of the most extraordinary episodes in American history—not extraordinary solely because Hiss betrayed his Government but also because he rallied to his support so many men in high places.

TRUSTED BY MANY

Hiss was one of the top aides in the Department of State at the time of his violation of public trust. He was a trusted adviser of President Roosevelt—one of his primary helpers at Yalta. He helped frame the basic set-up of the United Nations at San Francisco, acting as a chief agent of the United States.

When charges were first voiced against him, an angry outcry was heard in Washington. It was, his friends and supporters said, a horrible case of "character assassination." It was tragic, indeed, they contended, that such a fine and noble man as Hiss should be subjected to such shocking abuse.

President Truman joined in the chorus. Two Justices of the United States Supreme Court appeared as character witnesses at his trial. Even after he had been convicted, Secretary Dean Acheson of the Department of State made the almost incredible statement that he wouldn't turn his back on him.

TOUGH GOING

We recall the early developments in this case. At that time Senator KARL MUNDT was a Member of the United States House of Representatives and an active leader in the House Un-American Activities Committee. As events unfolded he became more and more convinced, he told us, that Hiss was not the innocent character depicted by his associates. But his committee encountered difficulty in getting the proper assistance to ferret out the facts. President Truman virtually commanded the Department of Justice, including the FBI, to leave the case alone. So the committee had to function as best it could without benefit of the Government's established agencies. Because Hiss had so many friends of unusual influence, the going was tough. Not only was there opposition from the President, but various columnists and others sought to belittle the committee at every opportunity. In consequence a considerable degree of public sympathy was lost.

But the committee was so certain that it was proceeding along a good trail that it didn't desist. MUNDT took the leadership in the probe and it was his adroit and vigorous questioning that eventually played a prominent part in the developments resulting in the arrest and subsequent conviction of Hiss.

HOW MANY OTHERS?

Now this episode is over. But it is tremendously disturbing to realize that a man who was virtually a spy for another country could work himself into such a high position and command the respect of so many important officials.

The worrisome question today concerns how many others like Hiss are in the Government. The matter is particularly aggravating in view of the apparent unwillingness of President Truman as well as Secretary Acheson to promote a really thorough investigation.

HISS IS LUCKY

What many, perhaps most, Americans had not expected to come to pass became a reality Thursday when Alger Hiss surrendered to begin serving a prison term for perjury. Two trials in Federal court and much litigation in the appellate area were necessary to bring this about. Even when he was found guilty by a jury in New York City on January 21, 1950, many observers were skeptical about his ultimate imprisonment.

Hiss, the "one-time bright young star of President Roosevelt's New Deal," actually is lucky as he becomes a convict. The perjury conviction means that he has been found guilty, in net effect, of betraying the United States for the benefit of the Communist conspirators in the Kremlin. As Russia was not officially an enemy of the United States when Hiss thus degraded himself he was not subject to indictment and trial as a traitor. So he is under a 5-year sentence ostensibly for perjury, but actually for what was essentially a crime that has spelled death for so many other wrongdoers in the history of the human race.

ALGER HISS IS TAKEN TO LEWISBURG PRISON

Alger Hiss, former high State Department official convicted of perjury, was taken yesterday from New York to the Federal penitentiary at Lewisburg, Pa., to serve his 5-year term.

Letters From GI Who Has Recently Returned From Korea

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. GEORGE P. MILLER

OF CALIFORNIA

Thursday, March 15, 1951

Mr. MILLER of California. Mr. Speaker, there has come to me a request from one of our recently returned GI's from Korea. He has asked me to read into the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD a plea he is making in the interest of his buddies who are still fighting and suffering and dying and winning far from home and kin. He tells of the meaning to these brave fellows of mail from home, and his plea is that we give them more and more of this comfort and joy. It is a fine, straight-forward appeal, and I ask that Sgt. Wilbur F. H. Radeline's letter to me and his appeal to the people of this country be printed in the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD:

FELLOW AMERICANS: I am Sgt. Wilbur F. H. Radeline, of the United States Army, recently returned from Korea and now stationed at the Presidio of San Francisco, Calif.

I am not writing this in any official capacity.

I do not expect, nor do I think I merit any special consideration, commendation, or privileges for what I am doing. I am simply trying to keep a promise I made to my buddies in Korea.

Some time ago my good friend, Don Blanding, wrote a dramatic, true poem about a certain Private Willie who, when the ever-welcome mail call came, and after the names of the Zylowskies, the Perkins, Van de Veers, and others had been called, would linger awhile, outside the circle, his name uncalled. Then, with a look of deep, hurt loneliness in his eyes, would turn away, forgotten, heartsick, and forlorn.

Today, over in Korea, in Japan, Okinawa, and, yes, even right here in the United States, especially in our Armed Forces hospitals, Private Willie is present and disappointed at too many mail calls.

Oh, his name isn't always Willie. It might be John, Rastus, Richard, Max, or even your own boy's name, but he is there, his name uncalled, forgotten.

I, myself, have spent over 6 years overseas, and months in Army hospitals, and I know the worth and value of mail from home. I also know the heartache and misery when you are forgotten.

I have seen many men and boys, of all races, creeds, and ages, in Korea and elsewhere, who receive little or no mail from home, and no matter what their position in life was before they entered the service this failure to write on the part of the folks back home makes these men believe and feel as though they were forgotten and their efforts unappreciated. I promised to them that I would prove to them that this was not so, but only you can make this promise come true. How? By writing a cheery, newsy letter, with your latest snapshot, to some relative, friend, or acquaintance overseas. Or, better still, why not send him a small package containing some inexpensive gift?

If you do not have anyone of your own overseas and still want to help bring cheer and happiness to our men overseas, you can do so by sending your mail to me, with forwarding postage if possible, and I will forward it for you. I have the names of many men in our Armed Forces overseas who receive little or no mail, as well as promises from chaplains and the Pacific Stars and Stripes—the servicemen's newspaper—to help me pass on your mail to where it will do the most good.

Now I've told you my story, and it's up to you.

Are you going to sit still and do nothing and let those fellows over there continue to believe that their suffering, their struggle, and their pain is unappreciated and in vain? Are you going to make these men wage an additional battle against lonesomeness as well as against the enemy? Or are you going to prove to them with your letters and packages that you do appreciate what they are doing for you and not let them down?

I assure you they will not let you down. I thank you.

Sgt. WILBUR F. H. RADELINE.
PRESIDIO, SAN FRANCISCO, CALIF.

PRESIDIO, SAN FRANCISCO, CALIF.

Hon. Mr. MILLER: I really haven't any legitimate excuse for not thanking you before for everything you have done for my wife and myself, but I am humbly saying "thank you" now. But at the same time I am also saying "please" again.

Since I have returned I have taken a furlough and on my own time and at my own expense I have gone to Hollywood and talked to executives, producers, writers, and actors at both independent radio stations and networks about a campaign for mail from home for men overseas. Their cooperation has been wonderful and not only have they had me appear on programs but many other programs are "plugging" my campaign. Magazine editors have also promised me their help.

Then the Pacific Stars and Stripes has given my campaign write-ups, and when the men found out about it they started writing me, begging me for mail from home. They believe in what I am doing and are asking for mail from their home States and towns. I honestly and sincerely believe that I can do much to build up morale and happiness if I can do what they want. And I also am convinced that as long as I continue to do this personally and without any official ties-ins the real concrete belief in and response will be better. Oh, I hasten to tell you that although I am doing this personally and unofficially, I have cleared with and received the permission to do so from the Sixth Army PIO (Public Information Office), as long as I do not obligate or embarrass the Government or the Defense Department or do not bring discredit upon the military service.

So this brings me to my request for help from you. Could or would you, after you are convinced yourself that you would be doing the most good for the most people, read the inclosed copy into the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD. No; wait a minute, sir; it is not for the purpose of self aggrandizement or for desire of publicity for myself. It is for the purpose of getting as many people in the United States as possible to read and cooperate in my appeal and thus help the many thousands of men in the service by writing to them. I feel sure that if you could do this, and then call the press gallery's attention to it, their papers might pick up our appeal and reprint it in their columns. Then you and I could honestly feel that we had done something worth while for those GIs over there in a really unselfish manner. I'll forward the mail.

The reason I am appealing to you to do this is this: In the past as soon as I would receive a request from a serviceman overseas for mail from any particular section of the country I would write out the copy I am enclosing in this letter and mail it to the newspaper in his home town (but not mention his name, in order to avoid embarrassment to himself or his family), and then when or if mail from there came in I'd restamp it and forward it overseas. This has gotten to be too big and too expensive a procedure and thus I am appealing to you. And I honestly feel as though this concerns everyone, not just any one section or faction, in our country, and maybe they will wake up and stop forgetting the boys overseas and send them that all-important mail from home. Thank you and God bless you.

Sincerely yours,

SGT. WILBUR F. H. RADELINE.

How Good Is the Voice of America?

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

Friday, March 30 (legislative day of Monday, March 26), 1951

Mr. MUNDT. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to have printed in the Appendix of the RECORD the transcript of a recent broadcast in which I participated on the subject of How Good Is the Voice of America?

There being no objection, the matter referred to was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

REPORTER'S ROUND-UP: HOW GOOD IS THE VOICE OF AMERICA?

(Mutual Broadcasting System, March 15, 1951)

Moderator: Everett Holles.

Reporters: Frank R. Kent, Jr., Robert E. Burns, and Earl H. Richard.

Mr. RICHARD. Do you agree with the sentiment expressed by some Senators that control of the Voice of America should be taken from the State Department?

Senator MUNDT. No, I do not, Mr. Richard. What is meant—and I presume it is—that we should make that change at this time; but it seems to me, actually, this is about the poorest time that could be selected for taking the Voice of America program away from the State Department because that would necessitate the establishment of a new agency at once, the staffing of it, the manning and training of it and leave this country without any effective foreign information program for a hietus of perhaps 90 or 120 days. What I have suggested in S. 731, now before the Senate Foreign Relations Committee, is that we establish a sort of Hoover Commission to study the entire foreign information program, a commission of 12 outstanding Americans, 6 Republicans and 6 Democrats, to make findings and, on the basis of those recommendations, we would then make some changes in the Voice of America programs.

Mr. RICHARD. You would leave the Voice in the State Department until your commission would report.

Senator MUNDT. That's correct, and then I would be governed in large part by the findings of these 12 American experts.

Mr. RICHARD. Do you think the State Department's doing a good job with the Voice now?

Senator MUNDT. I think it is doing a good job. I don't think it's doing the best job that's possible. I think it's doing a considerably better job than it was 12 months ago, and an infinitely better job than it was 24 months ago.

Mr. RICHARD. To whom do you attribute that?

Senator MUNDT. I think largely to the fact that—and this is a point a great many of the public fail to understand—that it's not being run now simply as a sort of an adjunct of the State Department, but is actually run by a general manager, Charley Hulten, who, operating under the general authority of the Assistant Secretary of State, Ed Barrett, runs the thing administratively as a general manager precisely as it would have to be run if it were in any other department of the Government or handled by some private agency.

Mr. KENT. Senator, I've heard the argument made that if the Voice were taken out of the State Department much higher type, higher caliber men, could be attracted to the Voice as an independent agency than as would be within the State Department, where opportunities are much more limited.

Senator MUNDT. I've heard that argument, too, Mr. Kent, but I think it presupposes that if we take it away from the State Department you're going to turn it over to some private radio company, where, of course, in private industry salaries are higher than they are in Government. But no matter what agency you were going to give it to within the Government, the salary schedule would be precisely the same as that in the State Department, so I don't see how it could attract men of any higher caliber than they can attract them now under the guidance of the Department of State.

Mr. KENT. I've heard the ECA—the European—Economic Cooperation Administration—cited as an example of the men of high ability in business who have been attracted because of its independence as an agency.

Senator MUNDT. I think they have been attracted, not so much because of its independence but because of the hope that it's a temporary program, and you can get, as you know, fine people down here at a dollar a year for 1 or 2 or 3 years, but when it becomes a career proposition I don't think there would be any difference, regardless of which division of Government happened to manage the Voice of America program.

Mr. BURNS. Senator, you said the Voice of America is doing a better job than it did a few months ago. How do we know that? What evidence of it?

Senator MUNDT. We have some pretty concrete evidence, and let me quote you just one excerpt which I think is rather interesting, and that's no later than February 15, 1951. You know we monitor the programs of foreign radio stations, and that's one way we get some idea of the reaction foreign countries have to the Voice of America program. So, speaking over the Czechoslovakian radio on February 15, President Clement Gottwald said this—and I quote him—he said: "It is grievous that there are sons and daughters of Czech mothers who have staked their fortune on United States cards. Let me now warn all those who rather than listen to the voice of their hearts listen to the Voice of America."

Mr. BURNS. But, Senator, not many American taxpayers listen to the Czech radio. Isn't it on the part of the Voice of America that the American taxpayer doesn't know that?

Senator MUNDT. Well, you would never get from this particular Republican Senator a complaint that a Government agency has failed to have enough public relations officials to keep the taxpayers acquainted with what they're doing. [Laughter.]

Mr. BURNS. Isn't this rather a bipartisanship?

Senator MUNDT. Yes; it should be, but I rather congratulate the Department of State, at least the Voice of America section of the Department of State, on the fact that it is not spending a lot of money to tell Americans what they're doing overseas.

REPORTER. Do you know whether the Voice of America is effective in our allied friendly countries? What we see in the newspapers is mostly the stories of anti-American feeling, in Britain, for example, the last week or so.

Senator MUNDT. Well, I might suggest the fact that I talked to a traveler who had just come back from Turkey last week, and he said that all over Turkey the name of Marshall was much better known that the name of either Truman or Acheson. I said, How does that happen? Well, he said, they keep on hearing the Voice of America program about the Marshall plan, so apparently they are doing a pretty good job of telling the Turks, at least, and, I think, the people of other countries the fact that this Marshall plan aid does come from the United States, and that's part of the deal that we have in connection with the publicity program of this country—to make the foreign nations aware of the fact that when we contribute something to them for free, that it actually comes from the United States.

REPORTER. Wouldn't it be easier for you, as a Senator, and for the other Members of Congress, though, if the ordinary taxpayer got some concrete evidence along with his breakfast coffee that this program did have some effect?

Senator MUNDT. Yes; I think so, and I believe that, by and large, the newspaper and radio fraternity of this country—on their own, good private enterprise activities—have been telling the country what's been done by the Voice of America program. Certainly it's getting a much better press, and radio commentators are treating it more kindly than was true either 1 or 2 years ago. I would just hate to see the Department of State spending any of the taxpayers' money telling the taxpayers what a good job they think they're doing with the Voice of America program.

Mr. HOLLES. Senator MUNDT, I would like to get down to one of the real fundamentals of this thing. Just what are we trying to do with the Voice of America? Are we primarily trying to stir the Russian people to revolt?

Senator MUNDT. No, I think not, Mr. Holles. I think that insofar as we've broadcast behind the iron curtain, especially into Russia, we do it with the intent in mind of making the Russian people realize that our quarrel is with their leaders, and not with the people of Russia; that we recognize that many of the people of Russia are not Communists; that many of the people of Russia would like to own their own farms instead of work on collectivized farms; and that here, in America, when they listen to the Russian broadcasts talking about how we are constantly quarreling with Russia, that that quarrel is with a group of 14 men in the Kremlin in Moscow—the high command of the Communist Party—and not with the people of Russia.

Mr. HOLLES. Well what do we expect those Russian listeners to do about that situation though?

Senator MUNDT. We expect them to do a great many things which they can do. One of them very definitely is not to revolt at this time, but we do expect them to sort of soldier on the job, to slow down in the defense activities, to fail to respond to 5-year programs which would step up production on the farm and in the factories. We expect them, on occasion, as they have, to pull out of Russia and to escape to a free country and to come here so that we can learn from Russians who know what kind of defense establishments they're building behind the Urals and in the defense centers of Russia.

Mr. HOLLES. You say, Senator, that we're not asking them to revolt. But are we coming right out and asking them in plain and simple language to—well, that is, loaf on the job—to slow down.

Senator MUNDT. No, I think what our job primarily, Mr. Holles, is to drive a wedge of suspicion between the ordinary Russian mujik, the peasant, the workman, the shopkeeper, and the government gauleiter who goes around as one of the Communist high command, and if we can constantly keep in the minds of—say—a hundred and ninety of the hundred and ninety-five million Russians, a big suspicion that their politicians over there are not doing right by them—they'll think of their own ways of trying to get even with the Kremlin and the Communist command.

Mr. HOLLES. How are we going to impart that suspicion, though? Isn't it reasonable to believe that the Russians will have the same attitude toward our propaganda broadcast that we would have—say—in this country toward Russian propaganda?

Senator MUNDT. Not if we continue our present policy, which is to keep the broadcasts factual. What we try to do is to tell the truth about America in the conviction that the truth about America is better than any fiction that a Communist storybook writer could write about Russia, and if we establish credibility in the minds of the Russians, I think we have achieved a great deal. Now the reason it's easier to develop this suspicion on the part of the ordinary Russian against his government than it would be for the Russians to develop that kind of suspicion in our country is that here, after all, the people elect the Government, they elect the President, they elect the Senators and the Representatives; but over there every Russian knows in his heart that when the Voice of America broadcast says to him, Look Ivan, you didn't have a chance to elect your officials and explain that to them, they'll say, "We were given a ballot with just one name on it. You had to either vote for that fellow or no one." They know we're telling them the truth, and that creates a suspicion in their minds.

Mr. RICHARD. Well, Senator, we're not telling them that in the broadcasts, are we?

Senator MUNDT. I don't know as to that particular statement, but we are talking directly to Ivan, we're talking directly to Tara, we're talking directly to the Russian people, and that kind of convinced the Communist leaders, of course, to change their particular political propaganda line.

Mr. RICHARD. Well, what concrete evidence, Senator, do we have that the program's getting through to the heart of the iron curtain, Russia, itself; do we have any?

Senator MUNDT. Yes; we have evidence just like I gave you from Czechoslovakia. We have, for example, the tangible evidence which comes from our monitoring stations, where we have discovered that the Russians are today devoting twice the number of man-hours toward jamming our programs and keeping them out of Russia as compared to the amount of man-hours we're devoting to put the programs into Russia, and the Russians wouldn't be doing that if it were not for the fact that without trying to jam them, too many Russians would be hearing too many Voice of America programs.

Mr. BURNS. Senator, Gen. Bedell Smith, the former Ambassador to Moscow, testified last summer before a subcommittee here that he thought the best way to approach the Russians was through the satellite countries and through the Russians who were stationed there. As I understood his testimony, he did not think the broadcast to Russia, itself, was the most effective way of reaching the Russian people.

Senator MUNDT. Well, I think we should all keep in mind, Mr. Burns, that when we're talking about the State Department foreign information program the Voice of America is just one litle segment of the program. As you know, I was the author of the so-called Voice of America Act, and I quite agree that radio is not necessarily the most important part. I think that if you can make contacts through information libraries, if you can make contacts by sending friendly people behind the iron curtain, and all of those contribute considerably to the goal which we have in mind, and all of those are part of this whole State Department information program—I am not trying to point out that radio alone is solely the best way to proceed. For that very reason I put all these other devices in my original legislation. They are there today.

Mr. BURNS. As I understood General Smith's testimony, though, it related entirely to radio in that respect. He did not, as I recall it, mention movies or information libraries or the other things.

Senator MUNDT. If his testimony is to the effect that it's easier to convince people in the satellite countries that the Politburo in Moscow is a bunch of rascals, I think that probably is true.

Mr. BURNS. That was one of his points. As I remember, he said, 50 percent of them knew about freedom.

Senator MUNDT. That's right. They've had some experience with freedom, whereas the people of Russia, generally, have had no experience in freedom at any time in their lives.

Mr. KENT. Senator, there has been some talk about a so-called Marshall plan of ideas in the propaganda field. What do you think about that?

Senator MUNDT. I think we have it. I think in the Voice of America program you have what is equivalent to a Marshall plan of ideas because we have good cooperative working conditions with BBC in Great Britain. We get splendid cooperation from Radio Luxemburg in Luxemburg. We have some cooperation, in varying degrees, from Italy and France. The Republic of Turkey is actually sending messages behind the iron curtain, which are much more to the point, and, I think, doing a better job than the Voice of America.

REPORTER. How?

Senator MUNDT. The Republic of Turkey has constant access to people who are freshly across the border, and frequently, they put them on the microphone. They broadcast in the Russian language to their Russian neighbors, but there is always quite a time lag, of course, between the time a Russian leaves Russia and gets over to this country so he can broadcast.

REPORTER. Is that financed by Turkey, itself, or by the Marshall plan?

Senator MUNDT. Well, like most European expenditures it's financed by the Government after they get the money from us! [Laughter.]

REPORTER. Isn't it true that we are largely on the defensive on the Voice of America? Russia makes the big lie, and then we come through and deny it and say its the big lie, and then we try to put the facts straight; but we are really on the defensive, aren't we, all the time?

Senator MUNDT. I think there is a lot of validity to that criticism, and it's one of the things I mentioned in my speech on the Senate floor when I suggested we establish a Hoover Commission to study the product of the Voice of America. Certainly, I would like to have them become much more positive and get off the defensive. I quote a few words here from the editorial in the New York Times of today, for example, which says—its heading is "Strengthening the Voice"—and the concluding paragraph is this: "But reputation by itself is not enough. The Voice of America must be an enthusiastic spokesman for the traditionally American way of life." I agree completely; we should get over on the positive to the greatest extent possible. On the other hand, we must never stop answering the slanderous falsehoods that the propagandists of Moscow continuously drill into the unsuspecting ears of the people of Europe.

REPORTER. Well, that's all very well, Senator. You speak of taking the offensive and getting off the defensive; but just how do you take the offensive? What do you tell them?

Senator MUNDT. You tell them the truth about America. You tell them what it means to have trial by jury. You tell them what it means to have freedom of religion and freedom of speech. You tell them what it means when you go to a polling place to have a choice between two or three or four candidates. You tell them what private ownership means, and the thrill that you get from farming your own piece of soil instead of the state's piece of soil. That's what I mean about getting on the affirmative.

REPORTER. Ah, that seems to me like that's still defensive. You're not a part of the Russian system, which, after all they're living under, when you're doing that.

Senator MUNDT. Well, that's what I would say instead of being positive would be a program of offense, and certainly I don't object to doing that. I think that you do that, however, more successfully if there's some subtlety in connection with it. I think if it becomes too obviously propaganda that you're not nearly as successful as if you plant these seeds of doubt and suspicion in the hearts of the people behind the iron curtain as against their government, giving them a sort of a feeling of homesickness for the days when they did have a chance to go to church, when they did have a chance for private ownership, when they did have a chance for freedom of speech. I think those in the long run are more effective than to simply engage in a cantankerous argument against the philosophical and theoretical practice of communism.

Mr. BURNS. Senator, this survey commission you're proposing, does that look to making the State Department information services a permanent agency?

Senator MUNDT. It is a completely objective study. I would select the 12 best Americans available to make that study—6 of them Democrats, 6 of them Republicans; 6 of them selected from public life in the executive and legislative branch of Government, 6 from private life in the field of radio and education and newspapers. And then I would tell them to make a complete analysis of what has been done, of the needs that we must supply, and to bring back recommendations as to where they think this instrumentality should best be housed, in the State Department or some place else.

REPORTER. You spoke a moment ago disparagingly of propaganda. How would you make an agency like this—or how would you keep an agency like this from becoming—a propaganda bureau?

Senator MUNDT. Simply by making it a showcase through which the rest of the world can look and see what's happening in America, without trying to color the truth or to gild the lily; simply letting them see us as we are.

Mr. RICHARD. Senator, before this program gets over I wanted to ask you, How do the people back in your home State of South Dakota regard the Voice of America program and your interest in it?

Senator MUNDT. Well, as you know, I was the author of the Voice of America bill when it passed the House—and it was during the Eightieth Congress—and cochairman of the committee along with Senator SMITH of New Jersey that took a group of Senators and Congressmen to Europe to study the needs for it over there, so that the legislation bears the name the Smith-Mundt Act. People back home certainly know of my interest in it, and I would say that, by and large, regardless of party affiliation, the people of South Dakota, and the Midwest generally, are supporters of the whole Voice of America and the conviction that the best way to attain peace is to cultivate and capture the minds of men in the countries of the world who might otherwise become our enemies.

REPORTER. Now, is your thinking on this typical of Republican thinking, particularly Midwest Republican thinking?

Senator MUNDT. I think so. I think it's typical of Midwest Republican thinking and pretty much typical of Midwest Democratic thinking, too; that midwesterners are generally inclined to believe that the spoken word is mightier than the sword, and that if we engage in an intelligent foreign policy, if we engage in the fine art of trying to win friends abroad, we're not as likely going to have a war and to kill each other off in a conflict.

Mr. KENT. Senator, a moment ago you spoke of propaganda. I gather that you would not like to see the Voice of America become an agency such as the British Broadcasting Co. that is in liaison with the Foreign Office but acts independently of them and I think is acknowledged to be one of the better propaganda instruments in the Western World.

Senator MUNDT. That's right. In the first place I don't want to see radio in this country run by the Government. I don't like the idea of the BBC situation because the whole radio network over there is a socialistic enterprise. In the second place, I believe that the State Department has acted wisely in bringing in as many private enterprises as they have who work in liaison with the State Department, preparing programs and writing scripts and helping to set up different kinds of programs. I think, from the standpoint of propaganda, that so long as we're not in a shooting war against a country we should continue to tell the truth. Once you're involved in a war, then you get into the field of psychological warfare, where anything goes that helps to win the conflict.

Mr. HOLLES. Senator MUNDT, you spoke a moment ago of the fact that our Voice of America broadcasts should be rather subtle. Russia has been rather successful in her propaganda around the world, particularly in the Far East, has she not?

Senator MUNDT. On the contrary, Russia has failed to take over a single country of the world by the volition of the people in that country——

REPORTER'S VOICE. That's not by any means subtle, is it?

Senator MUNDT. No; she has made her conquest by conspiracy, by intrigue, and by aggression. What we're trying to do is appeal to the minds of men, and I don't want it [Voice program] to develop a degree of subtlety so that the fellow of average intelligence can't understand it; but neither do I want it to become so blunt that anybody up and down the highway will recognize that as obviously being western propaganda.

MODERATOR. Thank you, gentlemen. Three prize-winning questions from the listening audience are to be selected. Senator MUNDT will answer the three questions.

Question from Oliver V. Kessler, of Stroudsburg, Va.: The Voice of America recently devoted a 15-minute program to dog cemeteries in the United States, telling of $500 funerals and $1,000 tombstones for dogs. Is that the way to sell democracy?

Senator MUNDT. I wouldn't think that would be the best way to sell democracy, Mr. Holles, but I don't see anything particularly wrong with letting the rest of the world know that over here we do consider that a man's best friend is his dog, and that we are willing to pay some tribute to the dog. [Laughter.]

Mr. HOLLES. From Joseph K. Kidder, of La Crosse, Wis.: If the Voice of America used Senator MCCARTHY'S charges against the State Department on its broadcasts, would it raise or lower this country's prestige with the people whom we're trying to influence?

Senator MUNDT. I think that would depend in part, of course, upon the auditors in the country that we're trying to influence. I am confident, however, that it would raise the prestige of the Voice of America programs from the standpoint of their credibility because they would recognize that the State Department was willing to broadcast information which obviously was unpleasant to the members of the State Department.

Mr. HOLLES. From David E. Ferrin, of Johnstown, R. I.: It's been said that one of the Voice of America's main faults is that it overemphasizes the material wealth of America. Is this true?

Senator MUNDT. I think that that is a pretty valid criticism, and that frequently in the past we have tended to place too much emphasis upon the fact that every American can be riding in an automobile at the same time, and that a great many Americans have electrical refrigeration in their kitchens and have central heat in their homes, and there's constantly the necessity of analyzing and appraising these programs to gear them down to the type of civilization in which our listeners are living—talking about conveniences and comforts which they may some day hope to have right in their own locality and in their own foreign cities.

Tribute to the Late Edgar Rickard by Belgian American Educational Foundation, Inc.

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. H. ALEXANDER SMITH
OF NEW JERSEY
IN THE SENATE OF THE UNITED STATES
Friday, March 30 (legislative day of Monday, March 26), 1951

Mr. SMITH of New Jersey. Mr. President, on the 21st day of January last, there died in San Francisco one of America's leading citizens. Mr. Edgar Rickard, who was closely identified with former President Hoover during Mr. Hoover's entire life and public career, and was a symbol of cooperative action that meant much to the United States at the time of World War I and the periods between World War I and World War II.

As one of the originators, with Mr. Hoover, of the Commission for Relief in Belgium, which saved the Belgian people in World War I, Mr. Rickard continued to be the rallying voice for all the important educational and relief work that followed World War I in Belgium and other countries of Europe. During his entire life Mr. Rickard had a devoted group of friends, many of whom have been active since World War I in public life.

As Edgar Rickard's principal activity was the Belgian American Educational Foundation, which was set up after the close of World War I, I ask unanimous consent that there be printed in the Appendix of the RECORD the minutes of that Foundation on the occasion of Mr. Rickard's death, and the resolution adopted at a special meeting held in New York City on January 23.

There being no objection, the minutes and the resolution were ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

The Belgian American Educational Foundation announced the death of its chairman, Edgar Rickard, in San Francisco on January 21, 1951. Mr. Rickard had been an original incorporator in 1920, and successively secretary, vice president, president, and chairman of the foundation.

Mr. Rickard was a retired mining engineer who had practiced his profession in the United States, Alaska, Tasmania, and Mexico from 1896 to 1905, when he became a publisher of mining journals in San Francisco and in London.

With the outbreak of World War I he joined with his fellow Californian, Herbert Hoover, in the organization and management of the Commission for Relief in Belgium, which continued until the end of active operations in 1919. This Commission was the first large-scale relief effort in wartime, and its operations set a standard for later relief work in subsequent years and in many countries.

With the entry of the United States into the war in 1917 Mr. Rickard joined the newly organized United States Food Administration, serving as Assistant Administrator in 1918 and Acting Food Administrator in 1918–19. He was active in the work of the American Relief Administration during the armistice and postwar periods and was a member of the Purchasing Commission for Russian Relief in 1921–22 by appointment of the President. This Commission purchased wheat, corn, and other grains valued at over $18,000,000 in this country for use in the Russian famine areas where the distribution was supervised by the American Relief Administration.

Mr. Rickard was active in a number of postwar relief and welfare organizations in association with Mr. Hoover, but he held no official Government office during Mr. Hoover's years of public service other than that mentioned above.

A special meeting of the Belgian American Educational Foundation was called on January 23, 1951, to take appropriate action. At the meeting were Herbert Hoover, honorary chairman; Perrin C. Galpin, president; Admiral Lewis L. Strauss, former member of the Atomic Energy Commission; John L. Simpson, financier; W. Hallam Tuck, formerly Director of International Refugee Organization; Maurice Pate, Director of the United Nations International Children's Emergency Fund; Sidney A. Mitchell, former associate in the Commission on the Reorganization of the Executive Branch of the Government; Scott Turner, mining engineer; Edwin P. Shattuck, attorney; and Clark Stillman, secretary of the foundation. Absent due to official duties was United States Senator H. ALEXANDER SMITH.

The resolution adopted at that special meeting was as follows:

"RESOLUTION ON EDGAR RICKARD

"Resolved, That the members of the executive and finance committees of the Belgian American Educational Foundation, assembled in a special joint meeting in New York City on January 23, 1951, hereby record their deep sense of loss at the death of Edgar Rickard, chairman of the board of directors, on January 21, 1951, in San Francisco, Calif.

"At this meeting the following minute was approved and entered on the permanent records of the foundation:

"A member of the Commission for Relief in Belgium from its inception in October

1914, our friend and associate, Edgar Rickard, gave continuous devoted and loyal service to the work of the Commission and its successor organization, the Belgian American Educational Foundation, during more than 36 years until his death. In addition Mr. Rickard served as Mr. Hoover's chief aide and assistant in the United States Food Administration and the American Relief Administration during World War I and all the overseas and war service organizations and their successor associations that followed. No one gave greater fullness of devotion to his chief and to the operations of these service organizations—no one gave more of himself to aid his friends and to help young men and women advance to positions of trust and responsibility. He gave such inspiration to men and women that his associates responded with their best efforts to further any undertaking with which they were concerned. His sound practical judgment and his true modesty combined with his personal charm made him a delightful companion and a valued friend.

"Devoted to his country, to his profession, to his friends, he lived a full life and his passing will be mourned by all whose paths crossed him during his active and rewarding life."

Overloading of Commercial Trucks

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. EDWIN C. JOHNSON

OF COLORADO

Friday, March 30 (legislative day of Monday, March 26), 1951

Mr. JOHNSON of Colorado. Mr. President, Interstate Commerce Commissioner James K. Knudson, the head of the Defense Transportation Administration, shocked the Nation 2 weeks ago when he invited State officials to approve the overloading of commercial trucks in the name of national defense. Just how many crimes are to be committed in the sacred name of national defense?

Every schoolboy knows that overloaded trucks traveling at high speeds are destroying American highways faster than we can build them. The State highway departments are bleeding the passenger-car motorists white to get money to build good highways. The motorists do not object to these high taxes, because they know that building good highways is directly in the interest of national defense in a very important degree. But it is pretty discouraging to them to build good highways for Mr. Knudson to destroy by arbitrary and unwarranted bureaucratic orders from his Ivory Dome Room in Washington.

I hope the States will resist this selfish conspiracy to destroy our greatest national defense asset. Surely truck lines do not want to kill the goose that lays the golden eggs for them. No one should be more active in protecting the highways than they.

In this connection, I ask unanimous consent to have printed in the Appendix of the RECORD an article by James Daniel which appeared in the Washington Daily News today.

There being no objection, the article was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

SO LET'S CHANGE THE RULES—DTA CONSULTANT'S FIRM VIOLATED LAW 665 TIMES

(By James Daniel)

John L. Fraley, adviser to James K. Knudson, head of the Defense Transportation Administration (DTA), is on leave from a trucking firm which has been caught in 665 violations of Virginia's truck weight laws.

Mr. Fraley was assistant to the president of the Carolina Freight Carriers Corp. of Cherryville, N. C. Now he is "consultant on street and highway maintenance" to Mr. Knudson.

And Mr. Knudson, as head of the DTA, recently wrote to all State governors urging, for the sake of national defense, that they ease up on their truck weigut laws in order to speed up the movement of truck cargo.

Mr. Fraley was one of three DTA officials present when the letter was discussed. The others were Mr. Knudson and Joseph E. Keller, an attorney who is advising Mr. Knudson on removal of "trade barriers."

DISCUSSED LETTER

Mr. Keller said that he wrote the letter and discussed it in his home with Mr. Knudson and Mr. Fraley.

J. A. Anderson, chief of the Virginia highway department, said Mr. Fraley's company had been caught 665 times since 1940 with trucks loaded above the legal limits.

Violations since the war accounted for 486 of the offenses.

ONLY A FRACTION

Mr. Anderson said since only a fraction of the trucks passing through Virginia in that period were stopped and weighed, so the total of 665 overloads may not have been all.

Mr. Fraley came to work in Washington in January.

He said his title as consultant on street and highway maintenance had been misunderstood. "I just deal with the maintenance of vehicles using the streets and highways," he said. "I advise Mr. Knudson on things he wants to be advised on."

Mr. Fraley said he met his Government boss last September while serving as his host at a North Carolina truckers convention. About that time Mr. Knudson, an Interstate Commerce Commissioner, was appointed to perform the transportation duties arising from the Defense Production Act. By his own decree, Mr. Knudson then created the Defense Transportation Administration, with himself as head.

KEPT HIM COMFORTABLE

The head of the company for which Mr. Fraley worked was also president of the North Carolina Truckers Association.

"Four or five of us were assigned to kind of keep Mr. Knudson comfortable," Mr. Fraley recalled.

Mr. Fraley said the next thing he knew, he was invited to come join Mr. Knudson's staff. "I didn't ask for the job," he said.

Mr. Fraley, who is 30, rose from a private to captain in World War II and later started a knitwear business in North Carolina. He gave that up and went to Germany to manage a hotel for the occupation forces. In 1949 he joined the trucking firm as a salesman and traffic generator.

BASED IN STATE

Many big east coast trucking firms are headquartered in North Carolina, which has milder truck laws than some other States. Recently a move in the North Carolina Legislature to bring the State's code into line with Virginia's and the recommendations of the American Association of State Highway Officials was stalled by a telegram from Mr. Knudson.

Virginia Highway Director Anderson is currently head of the American Association of State Highway Officials, which is leading a fight against the DTA. The highway officials say the DTA is trying to break down the enforcement of State truck laws. Mr. Anderson said he now has round-the-clock weighing stations on four of the five main north-south routes and occasional weighing stations at 40 other Virginia points.

PRIVATE CARS WATCH

He said the truckers have private cars traveling the State highways at all times spotting the weighing points and werning truck drivers up and down the line. Many filling stations and roadside restaurant operators also warn truckers of weighing operations. Not long ago a State highway employee was suspected of being bribed to give out weighing schedules a week in advance. He was dismissed.

Mr. Anderson said individual truck drivers now are assisting the enforcement program. He said his department recently was telephoned by a driver for a Carolina concern that he was coming in with a 72,000-pound load (Virginia maximum for a four-axle truck is 50,000) and was tired of being told to travel back roads at night. The driver spilled the employing company's entire plan of operations, producing a fresh haul of violators.

Common Sense Versus Legalism

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

OF WISCONSIN

Friday, March 30 (legislative day of Monday, March 26), 1951

Mr. WILEY. Mr. President, I believe that most of my colleagues are familiar with the excellent work performed by the Washington staff of the Christian Science Monitor, a great international daily newspaper. Day after day this bureau, like its counterparts elsewhere, reports clearly and quite objectively on the great events of our Nation's Capital.

There may be times when we disagree with specific editorial views of the Monitor, but I doubt that there is any Senator who questions the refreshing, constructive approach which this newspaper takes in both domestic and foreign affairs.

At times the Monitor has disagreed with me personally, at times it has agreed, but throughout my entire period in the Congress I have always read it with respect and with tremendous interest.

I have a copy of an article entitled "Common Sense Versus Legalism," written in the Tuesday, March 20, issue, by Mr. Joseph C. Harsch, chief of the Washington bureau. This article endorses my interpretation of the basic questions at stake in the present foreign-policy debate.

I am grateful for that endorsement, not so much because it relates to me personally, but rather because I think it helps focus attention, as many of us have sought to do, on the actual points at issue.

I ask unanimous consent that Mr. Harsch's article be printed in the Appendix of the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD.

There being no objection, the article was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

STATE OF THE NATION

(By Joseph C. Harsch)

COMMON SENSE VERSUS LEGALISM

WASHINGTON.—One of our quieter and less talkative Senators, ALEXANDER WILEY, Republican, of Wisconsin, deserves credit, I think, for listening to others present their dialectical points through long weeks of debate over the troops-to-Europe issue and coming out finally with a reduction of the problem to common sense.

The legal issue, he points out, is not over whether the President has power to send troops to Europe. It is, rather, over whether the President has the power under the North Atlantic Treaty to put American forces into an international army under an international commander without the consent of the Congress.

The issue goes back to article 3 of the treaty. The article pledges that the United States and other signatories "separately and jointly, by means of continuous and effective self-help and mutual aid, will maintain and develop their individual and collective capacity to resist armed attack."

Under the Constitution, Senator WILEY points out, a treaty is binding on the United States as law. It takes precedence over domestic laws. The North Atlantic Treaty has been ratified by the Senate. It is, therefore, the law of the land.

If article 3 had obligated the United States specifically to commit its troops to an international army to be set up under the treaty, then the President would have not only the right but the obligation to send American troops to such an army. However, the treaty was not explicit as to details of implementation. The furthest it goes is to "require" the signatories to "develop" their "collective capacity to resist armed attack."

Some supporters of the President contend that this requirement to develop "collective capacity to resist armed attack" is in itself sufficient not only to permit but even to require the President to send more troops to Europe. However, this is a matter of interpretation

And it is a fact that in the debates over the treaty spokesmen for the administration declared that the sending of United States ground troops to Europe was not contemplated. Therefore, the decision to increase the number of United States troops in Europe and to put them under an international command goes beyond what Congress contemplated at the time it ratified the treaty.

There is no doubt about the constitutional power of the President to send United States Armed Forces outside the United States. Senator WILEY pointed out that not once in the entire debate has anyone criticized the President for sending United States naval and Air Forces to many places outside the United States. He makes the point also that if the President ordered American ground troops to Germany to implement the occupation there could not be the slightest basis for legal protests.

As Commander in Chief, the President can send American Armed Forces anywhere he chooses. However, Congress also has the power to strangulate such a policy by withholding appropriations.

The nub of the question, therefore, is untouched either by the constitutional power of the President to send troops where he deems it necessary, or of the Congress to check the President by withholding appropriations if it disagrees with the President's action. It is touched by the question of duties under the Atlantic treaty.

Without that treaty there could be no legal or valid North Atlantic army under General Eisenhower's command. The only valid legal question is over the President's right to commit American forces to that command. Doubt about that question will be removed if the Senate approves the pending resolutions. Those resolutions will not have the force of law. But they will express congressional approval of what the President intends to do.

What emerges from the debate, therefore, will not be an agreement between President and Congress on respective authority. It rather will be Congress challenging the right of the President to act alone, but approving what he is doing; while the President will be denying the right of Congress to interfere, but happily accepting a resolution approving what he is doing.

There will be no resolution of the irresolvable constitutional issue. There will be agreement, in effect, on the course to be taken.

Regulation of Immigration

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. HERBERT H. LEHMAN

OF NEW YORK

IN THE SENATE OF THE UNITED STATES

Friday, March 30 (legislative day of Monday, March 26), 1951

Mr. LEHMAN. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to have printed in the Appendix of the RECORD a recent statement submitted by the American Jewish Congress to the Joint Committee on Immigration in regard to two pending omnibus bills under consideration by the joint committee.

There being no objection, the statement was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

STATEMENT OF AMERICAN JEWISH CONGRESS ON THE MCCARRAN-WALTER OMNIBUS IMMIGRATION PILLS (S. 716 AND H. R. 2379) SUBMITTED TO JOINT SENATE-HOUSE COMMITTEE ON THE JUDICIARY

The American Jewish Congress is an association of American Jews committed to the preservation and extension of the democratic way of life and to the assurance of the fundamental freedoms of man through the elimination of all forms of political, social, and economic discrimination on grounds of race, color, religion, ancestry, or national origin. Our concern with the nature of the immigration laws of this country is rooted both in our general concern with the quality of American democracy and the nature of our organization.

The immigration laws of any society both reflect and shape its fundamental character. Freedom of movement, both of emigration and immigration, have long been recognized as among the most fundamental of human freedoms; it is the hallmark of totalitarianism that it seeks rigidly to limit the free movement of people. It seeks to deny its own subjects the freedom to live elsewhere. It seeks to deny to others access to its soil or any contact with its peoples. Conversely, it is the very essence of democracy that people should be free to choose where they wish to live or those with whom they prefer to associate.

Immigration laws crystallize and express a society's basic human values, for they deal with our relationship to people other than our immediate neighbors. Such laws affirm the degree of our acceptance or rejection of the essential equality of all human beings. They codify our prejudices or our freedom from prejudice. They reveal the measure of correspondence between our professed ideals and our actual practices. Because the American Jewish Congress is profoundly concerned with the maintenance and reaffirmation of our democratic heritage, we are inevitably concerned with the character of our immigration legislation.

Our concern, however, is rooted as well in the particular character of our organization. The American Jewish Congress was founded more than 30 years ago by men who, like the late Stephen Wise, were born in lands other than the United States or who, like the late Justice Louis Brandeis were the descendants of immigrants to these shores. We take deep pride in the contributions which such men have made to the enrichment of American life and freedom; we are gratified that our movement has steadfastly and, we believe, significantly, served and helped to fashion America's highest ideals. That unique and intimate experience has strengthened our adherence to, and enables us to testify to the validity of, the most fundamental of American tenets: that a person's loyalty and service to America and its principles are measured by his character and ideals rather than determined by his biological or geographic origin.

The American Jewish Congress regards it as highly desirable that the proposed codification of our basic immigration laws set forth in the McCarran-Walter bills should be made the occasion for a comprehensive revaluation of our immigration laws. Indeed, such revaluation is long overdue. There has been no systematic consideration of our basic immigration policies since 1911 when the Immigration Commission created by Congress concluded its 4-year study (S. Doc. 758, 61st Cong., 3d sess.). A great deal has happened in America and the world since that time. We have learned that democracy cannot remain static and maintain its vitality. We have come to understand the subtle and devious methods through which democracy can be corrupted and undermined, even unwittingly. We have acquired new responsibilities in a world of nations. It is therefore mandatory that we examine the concepts at the heart of our immigration policies for the past quarter of a century to see whether they adequately express the democratic principles it is the duty of this country to affirm and to practice and to ascertain whether the proposed legislation conforms to such principles.

What has been our basic immigration policy? That policy, enacted in 1924, has become known as the national origins quota system. Under its provisions, a total of about 150,000 people was to be admitted to this country each year, with a maximum quota fixed for each country. Exceptions were made of the nations of the Western Hemisphere, to which no numerical limitations were attached and most Asiatic countries whose inhabitants were in effect completely barred from admission. Quotas were to range from 100 to 65,000 (the latter the quota for Great Britain) and each country's quota was based on the percentage of persons of that national origin resident in the United States in 1920.

That formula was no legislative accident. It was deliberately designed to limit the number of immigrants from South and East Europe and to encourage the immigration of Englishmen, Irishmen, and Germans. The theory on which it rested was compounded of bigotry and ignorance—that people from certain lands, particularly Great Britain and Germany, possessed hereditary qualities which made them highly desirable additions to our population, while others were less desirable because they were likely because of their national origin to prove less assimilable.

There was thus enacted into American law a racist concept based on what the minority report of the Immigration Commission at that time correctly termed "an unfounded anthropological concept."

No scientific evidence worthy of consideration was introduced at the time to support that racist theory. It was clear then, and men like Secretary of State Charles Evans Hughes and Rabbi Stephen Wise emphasized the fact, that the racist concept which was elevated to the status of law, flagrantly violated the fundamental principles of American democracy. America's most distinctive and creative contribution to the world has not been the automobile or the radio, the atom bomb, or even the television screen. It has been the affirmation of the basic equality of all human beings, an affirmation whose increasing translation into law and public practice has constituted America's greatness. The eloquent affirmation of the Declaration of Independence that "all men are created equal" was never intended to be translated as "all Americans" or "all Anglo-Saxons." It expressed the cardinal democratic belief that all persons were to be regarded as equally capable of intelligence, freedom, and social usefulness, that every individual could claim the right to be judged on his own merits. The immigration policy enacted in 1924 was a repudiation of that doctrine, for it asserted that persons in quest of the opportunity to live in this land were to be judged according to breed like cattle at a country fair and not on the basis of their character, fitness, or capacity.

Scientific study and social experience have surely withered those racist fictions with the finality of an atomic blast. The findings of science must force even the most prejudiced among us to accept as unqualifiedly as we do the law of gravity that intelligence, morality, and character bear no relationship whatever to geography or place of birth. Mental or moral characteristics cannot be associated with race, however broadly or narrowly that dubious concept is interpreted, or with national origin. It is highly paradoxical, to say the least, that America, which prides itself on its loyalty to the dictates of scientific knowledge and discovery, should continue to base so significant a portion of its legal and legislative structure on foundations thoroughly and irrevocably corroded by scientific finding.

Social experience, no less than scientific study, reinforces that conclusion. The experience of two wars has amply demonstrated that no national group can claim a monopoly on loyalty to America and to its ideals; people of all national origins have contributed inspiringly to its defense and to its enrichment. Indeed, time has made nonsense out of that 1924 policy, even in its own terms. It may not be without interest to remind ourselves that a land whose inhabitants were in 1924 regarded as among the most desirable acquisitions to America ushered in the most devastating war in human history, murdered millions of people in fulfillment of its own racist doctrine, and sought to wipe democracy and human freedom off the face of the globe.

The laboratory which is this Nation itself has offered the most persuasive rebuttal of the 1924 doctrine. America's richness has not been merely our material resources, amply endowed though we are. It has been, even more, our diversity of peoples and cultures and our unique ability to fashion a creative national unity out of that diversity. That has proved to be our strength as well as our richness. Totalitarianism carries within itself the seeds of its own destruction through the mechanical uniformity it seeks to impose, for imposed uniformity must ultimately result in social and human degeneration. Uniformity can emerge not only from legal or physical coercion, but as a result of rigidly limiting the human resources on which we should be free to draw. The "American type" has not been nourished at a single fount; it has drawn from many springs, and it must continue to draw from many springs if it is to be enriched—indeed, if it is to remain healthy.

Our knowledge and experience, as well as our historic traditions, therefore should have long made mandatory the abrogation of the national origins system as the basis of our immigration policy. Both the moral imperative and the practical necessity of bringing our national practices into conformity with our democratic professions should have required the formulation of an alternative approach such as we shall later suggest.

Unfortunately, neither the McCarran bill (S. 716) nor the Walter bill (H. R. 2379) make any such effort. Both measures merely tinker with the application of the 1924 doctrine. But they accept that doctrine wholly and unreservedly and would leave untouched in our law a racial anachronism that blemishes our national record. They would, in effect, reaffirm the 1924 repudiation of our fundamental democratic concept. They would reveal that we have learned nothing in a quarter of a century, that our prejudices have remained untarnished by the light of knowledge. They would retain the qualifications which the act of 1924 introduced into the Declaration of Independence.

Such action, under any circumstances, would scarcely do this country credit. Under present conditions, the enactment of such measures will gravely impair the national effort we are putting forth. For we are engaged in a war for the minds and hearts of men. The free nations of the world look to us not only for material aid and armed might. They turn to us for moral and spiritual reinforcement at a time when the faith which moves men is as important as the force they wield. Our responsibilities of world leadership require us not to reassert our moral errors but to expunge them. We seek to embrace the world in a companionship of free peoples, demanding as a qualification nothing more than a common abhorrence of authoritarianism. We cannot expect such companionship to be freely and eagerly given if we announce that we continue to repudiate more than half the human race, as we repudiated it in 1924, on no grounds other than geography and national origin.

These bills, however, go beyond even the retention of the national origins system. They continue to base the national quotas on the 1920 census, ignoring any changes since that date in the composition of the American population. They thus affirm, with emphasis, the spurious anthropology and the genuine prejudice of the 1924 act.

Even within these limitations, they would more rigorously limit entry to this country by the provisions they embody. Both propose a restrictive system of priorities for the distribution of visas to prospective immigrants. The McCarran bill provides that 50 percent of the visas under any national quota be allocated to persons whose technological proficiency or special skills are urgently needed in the United States, while the Walter bill suggests an allocation of 30 percent to such persons. Thus, for a very substantial number of persons who might enter this country, there is added to the existing qualification of national origin, a new qualification, that of exceptional skill. The basic motivation of our immigration system is thus transformed from its life-giving and life-saving quality into a device for extracting maximum industrial benefit from our immigrant potential. It is, of course, unchallengeable that such skilled persons will constitute a valuable addition to our population. But it is difficult to escape the conviction that restriction of entry rather than the entry of skilled persons is the dominant purpose, certainly of the McCarran bill. For, if the 50-percent quota allocated to skilled personnel is not used, those visas cannot be used for other immigrants, even of the same national origin.

While there are other restrictive provisions in these measures, we do not intend to dwell on them in detail. We do, however, wish emphatically to point out that certain sections of S. 716 and H. R. 2379 embody, in addition to the quota provisions, racist features repugnant to our traditions of equality. Under section 202 (a) of both bills, an alien born within the so-called Asia-Pacific triangle and an alien born outside that triangle but attributable by as much as one-half of his ancestry to a people or peoples indigenous to the Asia-Pacific triangle is chargeable to the quota of the country of his ancestry or, if no such quota exists, to the special Asia-Pacific quota of 100 whose establishment is proposed. This section represents a slight measure of advance in that it extends quota visas, however limited in number, to Asiatic countries for the first time. The advance is more than cancelled out, however, by the fact that the section applies a far harsher test to those who originate from the triangle. Here eligibility is required to be determined not by place of birth but by blood and ancestry. We are thus in effect announcing to the millions of inhabitants of that area that we are continuing arbitrarily to attach an onus to their racial identity and that, as far as this country is concerned, they will never escape that onus, no matter to what ends of the earth they or their children may migrate. That section canonizes a primitive and irrational belief that character and capacity are functions of blood and ancestry. At a time when Asia has become the battleground on which democracy and communism vie for the loyalties of millions of men, the enactment of such a discriminatory and primitivist measure would represent for us a defeat more calamitous than a reversal on the field of battle. That defeat would not be rendered more endurable or less catastrophic because it would have been self-invited and self-inflicted.

In addition to these racist provisions, both measures reflect a hostility, unconscious or otherwise, toward immigrants and naturalized citizens, a grudging reluctance to accept the alien as a full-fledged member of the American community and an inclination to interpose barriers in the path of his total and ultimate acceptance. That attitude is clearly revealed in section 312 of the proposed bills which, unlike earlier immigration laws, provides that petitioners for naturalization must be able to read and write as well as to speak the English language. In the light of the successful naturalization of hundreds of thousands of immigrants who were admitted to citizenship on showing that they understood English without being required to demonstrate their ability to read or write it, this section becomes an arbitrary and unnecessary withholding of the privilege of citizenship from deserving residents. For many, if not the majority of, immigrants are adults, relatively advanced in years, and it has long been acknowledged that writing, particularly, is a skill difficult to acquire in adulthood. Nor can such a provision be defended as serving the best interests of this country. The media of mass communication, the multilanguage press of this country make it fully possible for anyone to familiarize himself with our political and social problems without requiring the ability to write. The provisions of the Nationality Act of 1940 requiring as qualifications for naturalization only the ability to understand and to speak English are fully adequate.

Sections 103 and 104 of the McCarran bill, requiring that the Commissioner of Immigration and Naturalization and the Administrator of the Bureau of Passports.

Visas, Security, and Consular Affairs shall be native-born citizens of the United States are gratuitously insulting and offensive not only to all naturalized citizens, but to all Americans who recognize no gradations in citizenship or any automatic category of unreliables. This provision introduces a concept of second-class citizenship abhorrent to American tradition and principle. H. R. 2379 contains no comparable provision.

One other provision of both bills similiarly attempts to relegate naturalized citizens to an inferior status by depriving them of rights accorded native citizens. Section 352 (a) (2) continues the discriminatory expatriation clause of section 404 (c) of the Nationality Act of 1940 which makes mandatory loss of nationality by a naturalized citizen who resides continuously for 5 years in any foreign state, although native-born citizens may reside anywhere for any length of time without penalty. This section, as the American Jewish Congress pointed out in a brief in the case of Lapides v. Clark, submitted to the United States Supreme Court, derives directly from a bureaucratic antagonism to American Jews supporting the Zionist ideal of the rebuilding of a Jewish homeland. Testimony by Government officials at the hearings on the section which ultimately became section 404 (c) of the Nationality Act made it clear that the provision stemmed from a desire to dissuade naturalized American Jews from subscribing to a deeply held ideal which some officials in contravention of American policy regarded as undesirable rather than from an effort to deter or punish the commission of fraudulent or illegal acts. To the extent that this statute is directed at narrowing freedoms belonging to American citizens, it constitutes an unwarranted invasion of those rights which indisputably belong to all citizens, whether native born or naturalized. It should be repealed.

The American Jewish Congress, therefore, urges the rejection of the omnibus bills under consideration because they retain the national origins system of 1924, based then on prejudice and ignorance and based today, in defiance of all scientific knowledge, on prejudice alone. We further urge their rejection because they incorporate provisions restrictive even within the national-origins system, because they introduce new concepts of racism and because they seek, in certain respects, to deny to naturalized Americans the full rights and privileges of citizenship.

This public reexamination of our immigration policies will render useful service to America if it prevents the enactment of the two measures now being considered. But we should regard it as an error, possibly less serious than the enactment of these measures but scarcely less lamentable, if this reexamination failed to result in the formulation of a new immigration policy superseding the national origins quota system.

It has long been our view that such a system can be formulated which is in full conformity with our democratic principles and which is politically and administratively practicable. Nor are we advocating, whatever our views on present numerical limitations on entry into this country, the reestablishment of the earlier American practice of free and unrestricted admission. A system consonant with democratic traditions can be established within the framework of whatever numerical limits may at any time govern the rate of entry. Thus, for example, existing laws provide for an annual issuance of slightly more than 150,000 visas per year. Assuming the maintenance of that limitation for the present time, full and adequate safeguards exist to prevent the kind of abuse which it is sometimes suggested would follow the abolition of the national origins system. The laws provide minimum conditions for admission with regard to the health, financial support, loyalty, and moral qualifications of the prospective immigrants. These laws provide ample assurance that persons mentally, politically, or morally unfit would not be permitted to enter.

We can therefore find no substantial reason for refusal to adopt a plan which would make the total number of visas apportionable to all quota countries available to immigrants in order of their applications without distinction as to place of birth, subject to their ability to satisfy all other eligibility requirements. Such a plan would constitute the most direct and effective method of expunging from our immigration laws the inequities, implied prejudices, and racial connotations of the national origins system. Individual character, need, and merit, rather than geography or biology, would once again become the factors governing admission to this country. The result, as we have indicated, need not necessarily be a greater volume of immigration, but it would certainly produce more equitable immigration.

Nor would this system present any insuperable administrative difficulties. The present British quota, for example, is 65,000 per year. Within that quota, nonpreference visas are issued on the basis of priority in filing, and there have obviously been no insurmountable difficulties in the administration of that quota. There is no reason why it should not be equally feasible to administer a system based on priority of application for a total number of visas slightly more than twice the size of the British quota.

Within such a system, it is equally feasible to establish certain limited preferences and priorities for such categories as near relatives of citizens or legal residents of the United States and victims of racial, religious, or political persecution, preferences whose purpose and effect would not be restrictive but, on the contrary, would constitute a fulfillment of the humanitarian character of immigration. To give even greater flexibility to the program, emergency situations could be handled by Executive order creating special priorities within the nonpreference classes.

We are not naive enough to believe that abolition of the national origins system will prove an easy task. Its acceptance as an integral part of our national pattern is reflected by the fact that none of the legislation under consideration suggests its modification, let alone its elimination. On the contrary, these measures seek to impose further rigidities and inequities in its operation. Thus, vital legislation rooted deeply in antidemocratic concepts and prejudice can become deeply embedded in our national consciousness, affecting not only the areas of social concern it is intended to regulate but corrupting thought and practice over widening areas of our national life.

During the course of these hearings, certain suggestions will be made by spokesmen for major national Jewish organizations for the amelioration of some of the harshest consequences of the national origins system. While, in our view, those suggestions leave the heart of the problem untouched, we fully associate ourselves with them. One of the most unfortunate aspects of the existing system is that visas assigned to a particular country which are unused by the end of the year cannot be utilized for any other persons. Thus, a staggering number of quota places theoretically available for immigrants have been unused and lost each year. While only 836,085 quota immigrants were admitted to this country between 1930–49, it is estimated that 2,240,169 quota members supposedly available during that period were lost. (S. Rept. No. 1515, p. 890.) That has occurred not because of a dearth of qualified immigrant applicants throughout the world but because the national origins plan, through its own system of gerrymandering, provided the largest quotas for countries with the least pressure for migration.

We therefore fully endorse the proposal that a pooling system be established whereby unused quota numbers will be distributed on a nonnational basis, either in accordance with priority of filing or some secondary system of priorities. While this pooling system would fail to erase the racist overtones of the national origins plan, it would help relax some of its most objectionable effects and introduce, in somewhat limited form, the allocation of visas without reference to national origin or place of birth.

Under a pooling arrangement, preferred status might be granted, as we have suggested earlier, to victims of persecution, close relatives of citizens or residents or persons with special occupational qualifications. A bill incorporating these suggestions was introduced in the second session of the Eighty-first Congress (S. 3950). That measure provided for the pooling of unused national quota visas and the allocation of 25 percent to skilled specialists, 25 percent for the purpose of reuniting families, 25 percent for persecutees, and 25 percent for a nonpreference class in order of the registration of applicants. Enactment of such a measure is surely the least which any body reexamining our immigration policies and procedures may reasonably be expected to recommend.

The growth of the American ideal has been the record of the triumph of great ideas over small men. At various times in our history, men of limited vision have sought to interpose barriers in the path of the fulfillment of the promise of American democracy. Occasionally, they have had momentary victories. But they have proved unable to withstand, for any appreciable period of time, the dynamic of the idea that is America. Probably no success they have achieved, however, has been more fateful or long-lived than the enactment of the national origins quota system in 1924 when bigotry replaced knowledge and the justice of humanitarianism gave way to the expediency of prejudice in a significant area of American life and law.

The acceptance of American leadership throughout the world during the past few decades has been a tribute not to the growth of American might; other powerful nations have failed to win such leadership. It has been, rather, a tribute to the strength of the American idea. Impairment of that idea will inevitably mean impairment of our capacity, if not limitation of our right, to give such moral leadership. Such impairment is serious enough when it occurs in any aspect of our national life. But it becomes critical when, as in the present instance, it affects our relationship and expresses our attitude to our fellow human beings throughout the world. The national origins system of 1924 was such an impairment. Its continuance for a quarter of a century has sharpened, rather than dulled, its impact. Its reaffirmation today would be more than an impairment; it would constitute a political and moral catastrophe.

Today, we seek to rally nations of the world to the cause of democracy and freedom through the Voice of America. We firmly believe that the soul of America would serve to rally the peoples of the world more spontaneously and effectively. And nothing could more dramatically reveal the genuine soul of America than the abrogation of the national origins quota system of 1924, so offensive to millions of the people whose partnership and cooperation we are seeking in order to maintain inviolate the ideals on which this country has been built.

Boss of Army Base Here Calls Borough Tops for Living

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. ABRAHAM J. MULTER
OF NEW YORK
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES
Tuesday, March 20, 1951

Mr. MULTER. Mr. Speaker, from time to time Brooklyn has proudly proclaimed the accomplishments of many of its native sons. We are just as proud when we can proclaim the accomplishments of men who have come to Brooklyn from other places.

On March 18, 1951, the Brooklyn Eagle chose Brig. Gen. Edward H. Lastayo as "Brooklyn's man of the week." It was an excellent choice. General Lastayo has done a remarkable job at the New York Port of Embarkation in Brooklyn. He is highly respected by all who have come in contact with him.

As he says, he likes Brooklyn; on behalf of Brooklyn, I am glad to say that Brooklyn likes him.

The following is the article about him as it appeared in the Brooklyn Eagle.

BROOKLYN'S MAN OF THE WEEK—BOSS OF ARMY BASE HERE CALLS BOROUGH TOPS FOR LIVING

(By Jeanne Toomey)

Brig. Gen. Edward H. Lastayo, commander of the New York Port of Embarkation, including the Brooklyn Army Base, has seen the world, but he still ranks Brooklyn tops as a place to live.

Ask why he was selected for West Point from the New Jersey National Guard in July of 1918, he will answer mildly, "On the basis of service."

"Hard work, not romance," is the way he sums up 34 years of military duty.

A handsome, quiet-spoken man of 53, General Lastayo lives at Fort Hamilton with his wife, the former Virginia H. Dillard, of Chattanooga, Tenn. He has two married daughters—Ann, whose husband, Lt. John D. Howard, is serving with the Third Division in Korea, and Virginia, wife of Shane Riordan, of Dobbs Ferry, a former infantry sergeant.

BOSSES ATC'S BIGGEST BASE

Head of the largest United States installation of the Army's Transportation Corps, General Lastayo describes himself as "not a combat soldier," and has no recollection of any "exciting moments" in his career.

Tracing his life, however, shows this statement to be dictated by reserve rather accuracy.

He transferred from the Field Artillery in 1942 after 22 years with that branch and left with an invasion convey for his Transportation Corps assignment in England. From May to October of that year he commanded the Third Port at the Bristol Channel Ports, England. In November he left for north Africa.

"We took over the port of Oran and operated it until March 1943," he said in his office at the Army base the other day. General Lastayo commanded the port during that period. Later he was transportation officer for both the Mediterranean and Peninsula base sections. Charged with the loading of invasion forces and the landing and transporting of men, equipment and supplies as chief of transportation of the Mediterranean theater of operations, the Army chief had an unparalleled opportunity to study and appraise American youth.

His conclusion? "I think that, on an average, the boys of today are the same as the boys I was with in 1917 and 1918."

With this attitude, the General is understandably popular with his subordinates at the Army base.

LOADED ANZIO INVADERS

While in Italy he supervised the loading of forces, both American and British, who made the Anzio landing. In September 1944 he was charged with the responsibility of loading the Seventh Army for the invasion of southern France from Naples. In June 1945 he returned to the United States.

In the field of transportation, the port of embarkation head believes that the LST and LCT may be the greatest contributions made during World War II because "they enable troops with equipment to debark directly from the vessel to the beach."

Prior to World War II, while with the Field Artillery, he served in Kentucky, the Philippines, Virginia, Hawaii, Massachusetts, Florida, Maryland, and Texas.

"I saw so much heat I got used to it," he commented.

In all his Army career he spent only a few months in his native New Jersey while with the Sixth Field Artillery at Camp Dix, from August 1921 to January 1922.

He was born in West Hoboken on October 4, 1897.

TAUGHT ROTC AT CORNELL

From 1925 to 1929 he taught physics and astronomy at West Point and in 1939 and 1940, as a major, was an instructor in ROTC at Cornell.

Of his own career as a student at the Point he is characteristically modest.

Asked whether he had any favorite subjects, he replied, "Like most boys I took the course of study because I had to."

He was not an athlete and did not participate in sports. Among his classmates were Gen. Ewart Gladstone Plank, who commanded the New York port of embarkation from June 1946 to May 1949, and Maj. Gen. Clovis E. Byers, Deputy Assistant Chief of Staff, G–1, who was wounded in New Guinea in 1942 carrying a tommygun in the attack on Buna Village.

General Lastayo has great affection for the Point and plans to attend the one hundred and fiftieth anniversary ceremonies there July 4, 1952.

After his return to this country, the transportation officer was Chief of the Highway Division, Office of Chief of Transportation, in Washington. From February 1946 to June 1949, as deputy port commander and chief of staff of the New York Port of embarkation, he first fell in love with Brooklyn.

PRO-BROOKLYN JERSEY MAN

"I like Brooklyn," he declared. "I was a Jersey boy, and you never heard any good about Brooklyn in Jersey. I disagree with the Jersey view. I like Brooklyn extremely well and think it is a fine place to live."

His younger daughter, Ann, was graduated from Fort Hamilton High School in 1948 while her father was stationed here.

A year intervened between that hitch in Brooklyn and his present assignment here. From June 1949 to August 1950 he was Assistant Chief of Transportation in Washington.

As boss of the largest American installation, he looks out his window from the administration building of the Brooklyn Army Base at a scene of bustling activity, but security prevents his discussing his present task and responsibilities.

However, he will talk about his two granddaughters like any proud grandpa. One was born only a few Sundays ago.

His own father was not in the Army and the family "seems to run to girls," but General Lastayo still has hopes for a future general.

Medical Policies of the Veterans' Administration

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. HERBERT H. LEHMAN
OF NEW YORK
IN THE SENATE OF THE UNITED STATES
Friday, March 30 (legislative day of Monday, March 26), 1951

Mr. LEHMAN. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to have printed in the Appendix of the RECORD an article from the March 25 issue of the New York Times relative to the investigation of medical policies of the Veterans' Administration being conducted under the able chairmanship of the distinguished junior Senator from Minnesota [Mr. HUMPHREY]. This article by Dr. Howard Rusk analyzes the hearings that have been held, and comments upon them.

There being no objection, the article was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

IMPROVED PROSPECTS SEEN FOR VETERANS' ADMINISTRATION MEDICAL SERVICES—LAY ADMINISTRATOR'S PROMISED RELIANCE UPON DOCTOR'S DIRECTION IS HAILED

(By Howard A. Rusk, M. D.)

A special Senate subcommittee, headed by Senator HUBERT H. HUMPHREY, of Minnesota, recently completed hearings on the medical policies of the Veterans' Administration. As the investigations were prompted by the summary dismissal of Dr. Paul Magnuson, former VA medical director, by Veterans' Administrator Carl R. Gray, this investigation, like other current congressional hearings, could have become highly sensational. Fortunately, it did not, and the hearings were confined to the issue of medical versus lay direction of the administration's huge medical service rather than personalities.

Second in size only to that of the Soviet Union, the VA medical service prior to 1945 frequently was termed "the backwash of American medicine." Within a remarkably short time after Gen. Omar N. Bradley became Administrator of Veterans' Affairs, and Dr. Paul R. Hawley his medical director, the situation reversed itself, and the VA medical service became second to none.

This great improvement resulted primarily from the close relationship of veterans' hospitals to civilian teaching hospitals and medical schools, and the utilization of outstanding civilian physicians as consultants, both clinically and in determining VA medical policies and procedures.

Equally important and essential to this tie-in with civilian medicine was the fact that General Bradley, an able administrator, gave the full responsibility for the VA medical program to Dr. Hawley. When General Bradley returned to military service and Dr. Hawley resigned, the outlook for continued high-quality medical care remained high, for Dr. Hawley's successor, Dr. Magnuson, is a capable medical leader. As Dr. Hawley's assistant, he had largely been responsible for the development of the dean's committee system under which the VA program is integrally related to the teaching programs of 71 hospitals and 59 medical schools.

The close relationship based on confidence rather than directive that existed between Bradley and Hawley was lacking, however, between Gray and Magnuson. This resulted in a progressive tightening of the administrative reins on the medical director. Under this restrictive action, he and many physicians associated with him felt that the medical service could not operate adequately. The result was continuing and increasing friction, which culminated with Dr. Magnuson's dismissal.

Although most of the veterans' organizations sided with General Gray in their testimony before Senator HUMPHREY's committee, other witnesses insisted that the determination of medical policies must remain under direct medical supervision.

Both the committee hearings and in later statements to medical advisory groups of the VA and the American Legion, Administrator Gray has said emphatically that he would give full support to Dr. Joel T. Boone, Dr. Magnuson's successor, and has agreed to administrative changes in the VA that would make hospital managers responsible to him through Dr. Boone.

Although influenced by the personalities, the Gray-Magnuson clash was based on a fundamental difference of opinion on where administrative authority for the VA medical services should rest. It was this difference that jeopardized the continued relationship of civilian medical schools, hospitals, and physicians with the VA program.

If the medical services rendered to the individual veteran are to be more than routine and are to include an interest in his emotional and social problems, his rehabilitation and finally his return to the community as a useful, self-respecting citizen, it is imperative that these relationships be kept intact. This cannot be done by administrative fiat alone; they must embody a spirit based on mutual confidence and an encompassing philosophy of medical responsibility.

Senator HUMPHREY and his colleagues are to be commended that their hearings have dealt with issues and policies rather than personalities. Administrator Gray has promised to give Dr. Boone the authority necessary to carry out his mission. It is to be hoped that this basic policy is scrupulously observed, for upon it lies the basis for continued high standards of medical care for our veterans.

Universal Military Training and Freedom

OF
HON. WILLIAM LANGER
OF NORTH DAKOTA

Friday, March 30 (legislative day of Monday, March 26), 1951

Mr. LANGER. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to have printed in the Appendix of the RECORD an address by Fred I. Cairns on the subject UMT and Freedom, broadcast by him from station WIBA in Madison, Wis., on March 18, 1951. A copy of this address was sent to me by the First Unitarian Society, of Madison, Wis.

There being no objection, the address was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

UMT AND FREEDOM

The Unitarian religious philosophy is related to the need for progress, and the techniques through which it may be achieved. We have said frequently that progress cannot come without change. This morning, I want to clarify this idea and point out that progress does not necessarily follow every change. There are two kinds of change possible. One is advance, where the people move toward their goals. This is progress. The other is retreat, where the people move away from their goals. This is not progress.

Freedom has been the goal of our democracy during the entire history of this Nation. We have cherished it, fought for it, tried over and again to arrange our laws consistently with it. We have been happiest when we were surest that we were moving in the direction of freedom; we have been concerned most when it seemed that our trends were away from it. When we fight wars which we say are to secure freedom, we apologize profusely because certain liberties have to be denied our citizens. When we imposed discriminatory restrictions upon American citizens of Japanese origin during the last war, we argued that the imposition to which they submitted was in fact a contribution by them to the larger picture of freedom. But the human mind is more logical than it is honest, and when we say, for selfish reasons, that occasions arise when freedom must be denied for the sake of freedom, our logical thoughts rebel against such an inconsistency.

Today I am worried about freedom in America. It is difficult to reconcile our traditions with loyalty boards and thought control, and un-American activity investigations and turn-coat testimony to convict citizens. These practices strike deep fear in our hearts, for while we want America to move, to change, we want her to change for the better. We are not convinced that the present mood of America is progressive. We are disheartened because those who have been so long reactionary are today in positions of power, and many who, but a short time ago were supporters of the most progressive administration this Nation has ever had, are today being investigated and otherwise suspected of disloyalty.

Beneath all that disquiets us is the constant expansion of military influence over the life of our land. This, I believe, can hardly be defended in terms of progress. Militarism is as old as organized society. The hope of every new social technique for the past millenium has been that somehow the influence and the need for militarism would be reduced. Men have never been quite sure they could dispense entirely with military power, but they have always hoped, and only the worst governments have oppressed those who insistently demanded the implementation of such ideals as disarmament. Pacifism has never been a popular theory, but neither have civilized peoples ever been willing to abandon the idea entirely. And each time war becomes a reality, we face again the question of what we shall do with those who refuse to participate because of their adverse convictions. Never have we answered the question to anyone's satisfaction, for the pacifists frequently prefer jail to the alternative offered, and military minds are sure that pacifists are pampered and should be dealt with more forcefully. Sincere citizens, of neither pacifist nor military persuasion are invariably troubled.

The one fact which all but the blindest military prejudice have observed is that there could be no greater tragedy than the complete elimination of the pacifist hope. Let the time come when every pacifist and every portion of his philosophy shall have been destroyed, and the darkness will be complete. When war clouds are blackest, honest people, knowing they must live in the dark for a season, are still cheered by the single star which breaks the complete night; that star is the hope that one day men will learn to live without violence. The brighter the star, the more hopeful men become, and the surer that they are moving toward their noblest goals.

Universal military training, should it become actually universal as far as this country is concerned, is the final removal of that star from the blackest cloud of our darkest night. Universal military training is the antithesis of all that this Nation has sought throughout its existence. It is the opposite of that which has for so long attracted the best minds of the world to our shores, and many other minds which, if not of the genius variety, were yet clear enough to believe in peace, and a nonmilitary society, and to desire a country where the life and energy of the people are devoted to constructive living instead of military preparation. We need go back but a short distance in our history to observe the determination that this land should never come under military control. Our fathers established a government which provided that the Commander in Chief of all the Armed Forces should be a civilian—the President. This was never intended to make the President a soldier—it was felt that the President's position was large enough to overshadow the false glamor of military authority, and it was made clear that he should be in control of the military as a safeguard for civilian life, and not in order to permit him or any portion of his Cabinet to think of themselves as soldiers. It is hard to believe that these founding fathers could have foreseen the time when the President would himself advocate universal military training.

For some time now efforts have been made to get a bill through Congress that would bring about the domination of all life by military discipline, a bill which decrees that every male citizen of this land, before he shall have reached the voting age, shall be conditioned to the program of the armed services. I wonder if we understand this clearly—all young men, before they are permitted to take any responsibility in our national life, before they cast their first vote, must submit to a training period which will give most of them, forever, a sense of the propriety of violence. A school for death, we might call this program, and with compulsory attendance. Before our children can complete their civil education they will be inducted into army training, and this, we may be sure, will alter the educational emphasis of many of them. It is not a hopeful thought and it is not like Americans to sit by idly while the Government completes this plan under the questionable pronouncement of necessity. But we have been so frightened by war scares, by the fact that good citizens are convicted of treason, by investigations and accusations, that we will now give our sons to march by compulsion in the military parade and not lift a finger to prevent it. And the worst is that those who have most enthusiastically and successfully raised the war cry, and most wantonly hurled the accusations, have slandered decent citizens without regard for truth, defied the rules of honesty in government and have shown themselves over and again to be enemies of progress and untrustworthy in public responsibility. These are not the men who should give leadership to our land.

I want to read a portion of a news report covering the passage of the UMT bill in the Senate. It comes from the New York Times, not a newspaper usually flippant in its attitude, and not one most widely known for its radical or false reporting. The New York Times, whether rightly or not, is considered to be the newspaper of America. It tells us that before the vote on the military bill was taken, Senator LANGER, of North Dakota, proposed an amendment. But let me quote, "By this time it was apparent that the Armed Services Committee had enough voting strength behind it to beat down all amendments, and the members merely laughed when Senator WILLIAM LANGER, Republican, of North Dakota, offered amendments to fix a surtax of 100 percent on all incomes in excess of $25,000 a year, and to impose an excess-profits tax of 100 percent." Do you understand what this means? It is the same story of willingness on the part of comfortable people to remain comfortable at the cost of everything democracy stands for. It is the old story of protecting wealth with human life. How can we keep down indignation when the military purposes are so clearly put, and interest in human life is shown to be secondary to the well-being of particular groups. If a young man must serve in the Armed Forces before he is allowed to vote, why should any man be allowed to profit by it, or any corporation? This proposal was not original with Senator LANGER—it was offered by President Roosevelt when he began to prepare for the last war, but it was turned down as contemptuously then as now.

I'm afraid I take life too seriously. I can see little reason to laugh at such a proposal, and I can find little comfort when it is reported that Senators laughed because they were so sure it would have no chance of acceptance. I have little hope for a society that consents to military planning simply because those who plan insist that there is something worse in store if we do not accept what they propose. I don't see how anything can be worse than the total loss of freedom, and if I must lose mine, I'd prefer that it be taken from me by an enemy than that I should release it willingly to those who are supposed to help me keep it. Universal military training is as near as anything I can imagine to the total loss of freedom for the average citizen.

Let me tell you of what is happening in Madison. On the university campus here, there is a group known as the Student Committee for Conscientious Objectors to War. This committee has posted notices on campus bulletin boards to inform others of their existence and purpose. Their notice reads, "A group of persons having deep convictions against participation in war have formed a committee for the purpose of giving information, legal assistance, and opportunities for sympathetic discussion and fellowship to students who are weighing the problems of personal participation in war. The committee can be contacted through F. D. Hole, J. E. Olsen, or A. L. Christensen." Telephone numbers are given with the names. The notices are legal within the life of the campus. The committee is a registered student organization, recognized by the student life and interests committee and the student board.

Of the three whose names appear on the notices, one is a professor and a Quaker, another a Methodist minister, and the third, a student, is a Unitarian. This diversity of faith suggests at least a sincerity of purpose. A significant fact about the notices is that while ordinarily about 30 or 40 posters will cover the campus, for this particular notice some six hundred have been needed. This is not because the student committee has been careless, but because, as fast as they put up their notices, someone tears them off the boards.

In addition to tearing down the notices, they who would destroy the efforts of the Committee for Conscientious Objectors have made anonymous telephone calls to those whose names appear on the notices. Not just ordinary phone calls, but calls at 1 and 2 o'clock in the morning. Those who make the calls, in spite of their determination to support the military program against any pacifist intrusion, have not yet found sufficient courage to identify themselves. Perhaps they imagine that their acts must conform to standards of military secrecy, but what is more likely is that they are victims of the mood of America today, victims of a psychosis that is eating away our freedom. Perhaps they believe that what they are doing is courageous, and what the objectors to war are doing is contemptuous. They may honestly hope that a universal military program will provide the freedoms that America has sought so long. Or perhaps they are just confused, as most of America is confused about this whole subject, and lacking understanding because of the hysterical mood which has come over us all, they are not aware of their inconsistency, just as most of us are not aware of ours.

The supposition that peace can be won through violence is a false one. Religion is not alone in declaring this; every reasonable psychological premise asserts its falsity, and every observation of both individual and international life proclaims its folly. The hope of democracy rests with the alertness of its citizens, and their refusal to permit any group of leaders, regardless of party or purpose, to impose upon our free land a military code that is a compulsory conditioning for coming generations.

Relations Between the United States and India

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. HUBERT H. HUMPHREY

OF MINNESOTA

IN THE SENATE OF THE UNITED STATES

Friday, March 30 (legislative day of Monday, March 26), 1951

Mr. HUMPHREY. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to have printed in the Appendix of the RECORD a statement I had prepared for delivery today regarding an article by Robert Trumbull entitled "India Parley Links Food and Freedom," published in the New York Times on March 29, 1951, together with a dispatch from Calcutta relating to the same subject.

There being no objection, the statement was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

STATEMENT BY SENATOR HUBERT H. HUMPHREY

Yesterday's newspapers printed some very disturbing reports with regard to our Nation's reception in India and our country's reputation with the people of India. I refer to an article by Mr. Robert Trumbull in the New York Times of March 29 reporting on the Indian Congress for Cultural Freedom, a meeting representing anti-Communist cultural leaders from all over the world. The proof is again clear, Mr. President, that all of our statements for democracy and liberty will fall on closed ears in Asia unless we act in accordance with the principles of human dignity and brotherhood. It is indeed true that the world cannot hear what we say because what we do keeps dinning in their ears.

The people of Asia face starvation. Freedom loses its meaning if it is without bread. Our Nation, if it is to be effective in the struggle against communism, must respond to the appeal for food from the underprivileged masses of Asia, Africa, and other undeveloped areas. The most effective way to oppose communism and fascism is to eliminate the causes of those malignant diseases. We must attack poverty in the world.

I bring attention to Mr. Trumbull's article. I ask unanimous consent that it be printed in the body of the RECORD following these remarks. I also bring attention to a telegram which was sent to the American Congress by the American delegation to the Indian Congress for Cultural Freedom. The telegram reads:

"While American Congress delays legislation famine threatens millions in Bihar. Prompt dispatch of wheat imperative for America's good name in Asia."

That telegram is signed by Mr. James Burnham, Mr. Harry Goldberg, Mr. W. H. Auden, Mr. J. J. Miller (the Nobel-prize-winning American geneticist), Mr. Max Yergen, and Mr. Norman Thomas.

An ominous note to me is another dispatch in the same day's issue of the New York Times headed "Left gains in Calcutta," indicating the Communist movement is gaining in strength at the expense of the Congress Party. The time for us to assist the democratic forces in India is now. Every humanitarian consideration, every political consideration, every religious consideration, and every consideration of our national self-interest calls for the Congress to act immediately in support of legislation for an immediate grant of 2,000,000 tons of food grain for the people of India.

[From the New York Times of March 29, 1951]

INDIA PARLEY LINKS FOOD AND FREEDOM—CULTURAL CONGRESS SPEAKERS SAY DEMOCRACIES LAG IN FIGHT ON COMMUNISM IN ASIA

(By Robert Trumbull)

BOMBAY, INDIA, March 28.—The Indian Congress for Cultural Freedom opened here today on an unexpected undertone of dissatisfaction with the practical job that the free democracies are doing to combat communism where it has its most potent appeal, that is, among the underprivileged masses of Asia, Africa, and other underdeveloped areas.

About 30 Indian intellectuals, political leaders and business men, and 9 foreign delegates are attending the 4-day session. After several eloquent and loudly applauded attacks upon the Stalinist iron curtain, two delegates of notable standing wanted to know what meaning "cultural freedom" had to men without bread.

Stephen Spender, British poet, summed up this divergent train of thought with his remark that the intellectuals congregated here "should not study so much why we are opposed to communism as the just reasons that make those people Communists who should be on our side."

Jai Prakash Narain, Wisconsin-educated leader of the Indian Socialist Party, who acted as chairman, said that to talk of cultural freedom among India's hungry villagers "seems" comic. He suggested that if the anti-Communist crusade was to succeed with the masses of Asia it must be accompanied by an effective attack upon poverty.

The delegates here made it clear that they were unanimously opposed to communism or totalitarianism in any form and it seemed safe to assume that the audience was mainly of the same mind.

Among other speakers Denis de Rougemont, Swiss writer, characterized the Communist suppression of culture as the avenue to human slavery.

Dr. Max Yergan, an American Negro educator, spoke of the advance of the Negro's status in the United States as evidence of that country's depth of soul and innate spirituality.

Salvador de Madariaga, exiled Spanish writer, delivered a subtle and witty attack upon another Indian tendency, which is to equate the political freedom that the Indians have with the economic independence that they do not have.

The Indian Government caused the Congress of Cultural Freedom to be shifted from New Delhi to Bombay, apparently through some sort of idea of neutrality. Nevertheless India's Food and Agricultural Minister, K. M. Munshi, delivered the inaugural address and gave at least a semiofficial tone to the opening meeting.

Mr. Munshi remarked upon the appropriateness of holding this congress in Bombay where Indian communism was born. He spoke of the devious record of the Indian Communist Party from personal experience as one-time Home Minister of the Bombay Presidency.

M. de Rougemont, in an apparent oblique attack upon India's neutral foreign policy, contrasted neutrality, which he said, might be defensible, with the neutralism, which he declared was not. He told a fable that by implication compared the present Indian neutrality with that of the lamb that is neutral between the wolf and the shepherd.

Mr. Narain, in his later speech, took the same fable and turned it to account in his argument that the democracies had been lacking in their consideration for underprivileged peoples. He pointed out that the shepherd, having saved the lamb from the wolf, then shears the lamb and possibly eats it.

LEFT GAINS IN CALCUTTA—CONGRESS PARTY SUFFERS FIRST MAJOR LOCAL DEFEAT

CALCUTTA, INDIA, March 28.—The governing Congress Party, which had hitherto dominated the municipal administration in Calcutta, suffered its first major defeat in the municipal elections that concluded yesterday.

Formerly the Congress Party held all 30 seats in the local administration. Only 14 Congress Party candidates were returned. Fifteen seats went to a new leftist combination called the United Progressive Bloc, which is a loose coalition of the Revolutionary Communist Party, the Revolutionary Socialist Party, the Forward Bloc, and the Communist Party.

This is the first time that the leftists, including the Communists, have combined against the Congress Party in West Bengal and have entered the municipal administration in large numbers through constitutional means.

A Report From Europe

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF

HON. HUBERT H. HUMPHREY

OF MINNESOTA

IN THE SENATE OF THE UNITED STATES

Friday, March 30 (legislative day of Monday, March 26), 1951

Mr. HUMPHREY. Mr. President, in recent issues of the Minneapolis Star, there appeared a series of articles entitled "A Report From Europe," which were prepared by Mr. John Cowles, publisher of the Minneapolis Star and Tribune. Mr. Cowles is intimately acquainted with the economic and political problems of Europe, having visited the European countries on many occasions and for extended periods of time. His observations are particularly pertinent at this period in our history. It is interesting to observe that Mr. Cowles agrees with the position recently taken by our Secretary of Defense, the Honorable George Marshall. He, too, advises after touring Europe that the year 1951 is still a year of danger.

Mr. Cowles also seems to be in agreement with the attitude expressed by General Eisenhower as to the West European will to resist a Russian attack.

I think it is particularly important to note the observations of Mr. Cowles on the spirit and morale to be found in western Berlin, a fortress of freedom behind the iron curtain.

Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that there be printed in the Appendix of the RECORD three articles entitled "War Peril Fades, But 1951 Still Is Year of Danger," "Will To Resist a Russ Attack Found Mounting," and "Morale Higher in West Berlin Than in Paris."

There being no objection, the three articles were ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

WAR PERIL FADES, BUT 1951 STILL IS YEAR OF DANGER

War with Russia in the near future now seems less likely than it appeared a few months ago.

Nineteen hundred and fifty-one is, however, still a year of danger.

Despite our present enormous superiority in atomic bombs and our ability to deliver them with devastating effects upon Russia, Stalin may decide to attack this year for four reasons:

1. Stalin may conclude that he can no longer continue to tolerate Tito's open defiance of the Kremlin. The Yugoslav dictator's independence is stimulating the idea of "nationalist deviation" among Communist Party members in Italy, France, and Germany, as well as in the satellite states.

2. Stalin may conclude that the likelihood of our bringing the western Germans into the North Atlantic Pact organization and of effectively rearming them during the coming year is a risk he cannot afford to run. The Russians' fear of the Germans as fighters is deep.

3. Stalin may conclude that in another 18 months the forces which General Eisenhower is putting together may be sufficient to prevent any quick and easy Russian occupation of Western Europe and seizure of the Ruhr. The huge war-making potential of the Ruhr industries is, of course, the top military prize in Europe.

4. Stalin, who is approaching 72, may feel that his time is running short. Like other dictators, he may have an irresistible ambition to try to add more laurels to his fame as a conqueror before history turns his page.

If Stalin should conclude to attack Western Europe in 1951 it would probably come in late August or September, after most of the crops are in. Those months are certain, in any event, to be full of tension.

The Russians are planning to bring a total of 2,000,000 German Communist youths to East Berlin during the first week of August—a maximum of 800,000 a day—for demonstrations. Things then might get out of hand.

Of course, Stalin may calculate that he can attack Tito, destroy his regime, and occupy most of Yugoslavia this spring without precipitating a general world war. The Kremlin recently instructed the Bulgarian Government to promulgate a new law under which Russians could acquire Bulgarian citizenship after only 24 hours' residence. Stalin could thus claim to the United Nations that the Russian divisions invading Yugoslavia were simply "Bulgarian volunteers."

The Yugoslavs are desperately short of food and supplies. They lack almost everything except an indomitable will to resist invasion and maintain their country's independence. Although some United States aid has been promised them, only a trickle has yet arrived.

No observer thinks that satellite armies, without Russian support, could conquer Yugoslavia. Many of the Rumanian troops, and possibly some of the Hungarians, would presumably desert if they were ordered to attack.

If the Russians strike at Yugoslavia, Tito's forces, tough but badly equipped, will probably be compelled to retreat to the mountains for semiguerrilla fighting. If the Russians are able to occupy most of Yugoslavia they will be on the shores of the Mediterranean, and both Italy and Greece will be outflanked.

The most effective way of deterring the Russians from attacking Yugoslavia would be for the United States and Great Britain to make it crystal clear that we would immediately go to Tito's aid. The sooner we get food, gasoline, and explosives, as well as aircraft and weapons, to Yugoslavia, the better. Every week counts.

Probably Stalin will conclude (or he may have already concluded) not to make all-out war in Europe in 1951. Diplomats report that in those areas adjacent to Moscow which they are permitted to visit there are no outward signs that war in the near future is expected. There is no visible evidence that the Russians are building underground shelters, radar warning nets, antiaircraft emplacements, etc., which presumably they would be doing in Moscow if war were imminent.

Unless Stalin is more badly informed than most experts believe, he must realize that any Soviet aggression in Europe will result in prompt retaliatory atomic bomb attacks on Moscow along with a dozen other Russian targets.

Perhaps Stalin will move in Europe this year, but the preponderance of competent opinion abroad is that he won't. A basic tenet of the Lenin-Communist creed is to do nothing that might jeopardize the party's continuance as the ruling regime in Russia. Even though the Soviet armies could occupy Western Europe relatively easily this year, our present enormous superiority in atomic bombs will probably continue to deter them.

Perhaps a temporary new Russian "peace" offensive is more likely in 1951 than war, even though Russia's ultimate ambitions for world domination remain unchanged.

WILL TO RESIST A RUSS ATTACK FOUND MOUNTING

If the Russians, because of our great superiority in A-bombs and the planes to deliver them, do not start armed aggression in Europe this year, what will be the west's chance of stopping them if they do try it in 1952 or 1953?

First of all, many qualified observers in Europe believe that the American public has an exaggerated idea of Russia's military power.

Soviet divisions are much smaller numerically than full strength American divisions and have only 50 to 60 percent of their fire power. The Russians also have far less mobility.

American and British military experts, moreover, heavily discount the value to Russia of the Soviet satellite forces. They say that the Rumanians, for example, are of negligible worth.

In the event of war between Russia and the west, many of our top officers question both the effectiveness and the reliability of the Soviet satellite forces.

One high-ranking military man expressed the view that of the 80 divisions (excluding satellites) that he said Russia now has in the west, 20 would be required for occupation purposes in her own and satellite areas, leaving 60 available for a possible attack on Western Europe.

Of these, 27 Russian divisions now are in Germany and 8 more just over the Polish border adjacent to Germany. The Russians have stored gasoline and munitions throughout the Soviet zone of Germany. Once they start on spring field maneuvers, they could invade Western Germany with no advance notice.

If Stalin decides to move this year, no one contends that the Russians could be stopped before they had occupied all of Germany, France, Belgium, Holland, and Denmark.

But if Stalin, because of fear that if he moves this year we can and will obliterate

Russian cities with A-bombs, postpones any move in Western Europe until late 1952 or 1953, the story may be quite different. Some American observers feel sure that the Russians won't go to war until they are much further along with atomic development than they are believed to be now, and until they have installed many more radar defenses against raids by our Air Force.

Western Europe's morale and will to resist are higher than they were even a few months ago and appear to be growing.

General Eisenhower's appointment as commander of the international army, and the way he has started out on his enormously difficult military and political and diplomatic task, have had a profound effect throughout Europe.

Even in France, much the weakest and most defeatist of the important western nations, public sentiment seems to be changing. A year ago many influential Frenchmen held the view that occupation, while terribly bad, would be at least bearable while war would be intolerable. Many of them have lost that defeatism. The chances now appear at least even that France will have a reasonable number of effective divisions in Eisenhower's army within 18 months.

If Russia moves in Western Europe, there is not the slightest doubt that Great Britain would instantly join the United States in going to war. There would be no enthusiasm for it in Britain, just quiet resignation, but an almost unanimous determination.

Holland and Belgium will provide relatively little in the way of armed forces for Western Europe's defense until they are convinced that Germany also is to be rearmed.

Both Norway and Denmark are cooperating with General Eisenhower within the limits of their capacity.

Dr. Adenauer, the Chancelor of Western Germany, last month declared that the neutralization of Germany would be a disaster for Europe and a disaster for the German people. There is no doubt that the sympathies of the overwhelming majority of the German people lie with the west. The Germans are, however, tired of war, just as are the British and French.

The Communist propaganda for German peace, unity, and neutrality has had and is having considerable success in Germany. The persuasiveness of that appeal should not be underestimated.

Probably it was a mistake for the United States to announce when it did that Germany was to be rearmed. Probably it would have been wiser to wait until after Western Germany had been given a wider measure of self-government. Perhaps it would have been better to have postponed any discussion of arming the Germans until a relatively sovereign Western German Government applied for admission into the North Atlantic Treaty Organization and requested that military equipment be provided so that Western Germany could play its part in defending itself against a possible Russian attack.

Americans sometimes forget how terrifically beaten the Germans were in the last war. To see the ruins even now in any German industrial city is to understand why pacifism is widespread.

Even though most Germans hate the Russians and look forward to economic and political integration with Western Europe, they naturally have no desire to rearm and then be slaughtered by the Russians if the western powers are going to "retreat behind the Pyrenees" if war comes.

Western Europe is, I am increasingly convinced, a cornerstone of America's own freedom. Were we voluntarily to abandon it to the Russians it would be a momentous military, political, and economic disaster. It might, I fear, be the beginning of the end for the American Republic.

If we handle the problem firmly but diplomatically, I believe that the majority of the western Germans, after they have been given a larger measure of self-government and sovereignty a few months from now, will come to agree with the statement by Chancellor Adenauer quoted above.

That would mean there would be a good chance that Western Europe would build fairly quickly its own defenses to a point where Stalin, unless he attacks within the next year, would not think it profitable to launch war.

No one, either American or European, with whom I talked expressed the view that it would require more than the four additional American divisions which General Marshall has announced will be sent to supplement the two United States divisions now in Germany, provided European morale continues to improve the way it has in recent months.

If the western Europeans organize the forces which most American observers abroad now think that there is a better than 50–50 chance that they will, we might then even be able safely to reduce the number of United States divisions in Europe.

And if our development of atomic artillery shells as a tactical weapon progresses rapidly, that might prove decisive, and enable even a relatively small defense force to hold Western Europe against an attempted Russian invasion.

Morale Higher in West Berlin Than in Paris

Berlin today is one of the most inspiring and at the same time depressing cities in the world.

Square miles of rubble. Ghost buildings whose walls look as if they would collapse under a high wind. Although it is nearly 6 years since the fighting stopped, the human and material wreckage of war is visible everywhere.

In the western sectors of Berlin, under American, British, and French control, live nearly 2,250,000 Germans, many of them existing with five or six persons to a room.

Although the Russians occupy not only the eastern sector of Berlin but all the surrounding area of East Germany, there is higher morale and less defeatism in West Berlin than there is in Paris.

The Berliners have seen Russian occupation at close range. Most of them are determined to fight to the death, if necessary, against being engulfed by the Soviet terrorism.

No visible iron curtain separates East, or Soviet Berlin from the western sectors—simply a city street. People can pass from one sector to the other at will. Some prominent West Germans and most foreigners go into the Russian sector only warily, and rarely after dark.

A number have disappeared there, perhaps to become the recipients of a one-way ticket to the uranium mines.

As one drives through the Russian sector, which has a population of 1,200,000, many differences from West Berlin are apparent. There's much less rebuilding. The shops are drab, the people poorly dressed. Except for essential food, which is rationed in the Russian sector, the East German (Soviet) mark will buy only about one-fifth as much as a Western German mark. An East Berlin worker has about the same standard of living as an unemployed person on relief in West Berlin.

Communist propaganda is evident everywhere in the Soviet sector of Berlin and in the Soviet zone outside.

Russian war memorials express "sympathy" for the German people who, they say, had been enslaved by the Nazi. The Russians "liberated" them.

Fresh flowers are placed by the Russians on ruined buildings with sympathetic signs saying that here on some specific date in 1944 or 1945 the American fascist air force dropped bombs that murdered so many hundred peace-loving Germans.

Signs everywhere promote "Communist democracy and peace."

While Communist propaganda is making almost no progress in Berlin, where the contrast between the Russian occupation and that of the western powers is apparent to everyone, the Russians are making headway in Eastern Germany.

Boys are required to attend school for 6 days a week, instead of 5, unless they join the Communist youth organization. Boys cannot get fishing licenses unless they are members.

Consequently a substantial portion of the East German youths has enrolled, and participate in frequent Communist parades and athletic spectacles as they did under Hitler's national socialism.

Partially offsetting the Russian Communist propaganda in East Germany is an extraordinary effective Berlin radio station RIAS, controlled by the United States but using Germans exclusively as announcers, commentators and actors.

That RIAS is influencing a big listening audience is proved by the violent and constant vituperation which is heaped on it by the Soviet German newspapers and Soviet radio stations.

With 100,000 watts of power, RIAS is on the air 20 hours a day, warning its listeners that Herr Schmidt, a butcher in a certain German town, or Herr Wagner, a baker in another, is now a secret Soviet agent and to be wary of him.

RIAS won a great following by tipping off the Germans that the Russians intended to confiscate all the wheat above a small minimum amount in a certain area the following day, so that the listeners were able to hide their supplies.

Polls show that 95 percent of the West Berlin radio audience tunes to RIAS, and there is widespread evidence that RIAS, despite constant efforts by the Russians to prevent listening, has an enormous following throughout the entire Russian zone.

Some of the most popular RIAS programs are those kidding the Russians, with a moronic comedian spouting the Soviet propaganda line.

RIAS deliberately avoids using any unusual sound effects or loud broadcasts which could enable an eavesdropper to identify the station to which his neighbor was listening as the forbidden RIAS.

In Berlin the central telephone exchange is in the western sector. Any Berliner can dial the RIAS telephone number at any hour and hear 3 minutes of late news over the phone. The Russians have no way of stopping this or of ascertaining who may be phoning RIAS to get the news. As many as 18,000 phone calls have been received in a day, half from the Russian sector.

Both in Berlin and throughout our zone in Germany there are, in addition to our Armed Forces, hundreds of American civilians working in all phases of military government and economic rehabilitation. Many are doing excellent jobs.

Few persons in the United States appreciate the enormous complexities and difficulties of the task which our American High Commissioner, John J. McCloy, has faced for nearly 2 years. Probably the High Commission set-up will be terminated this fall and Western Germany be given pretty complete self-government powers, except as to Allied military occupation and security.

That will be a welcome day for Commissioner McCloy and his wife, who, by visiting hospitals and schools and explaining to German women how American democracy actually functions, is working as hard as her husband.

It will mean an end to the constant stream of abuse, from both Americans and Germans, which comes in a torrent whenever the High Commissioner, after reviewing all the evidence, pardons or commutes the sentence of some German war criminal or, equally, refuses to do so.

And it also will mean an end to living in a home whose grounds must constantly be patrolled by soldiers, all floodlighted at night, because of threats against the High Commissioner, his wife, and their children.

Veterans' Insurance Bill

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. JOHN E. RANKIN
OF MISSISSIPPI

Monday, April 2, 1951

Mr. RANKIN. Mr. Speaker, much has been written about the provisions and effects of the gratuitous indemnity bill, H. R. 1, which I introduced and which passed the House in early January by a roll call vote of 390 to 0, and has been sent to conference, drastically amended, in the Senate.

Perhaps it is well to point out here, in regard to the present insurance program, that the Veterans' Administration has presented to the Bureau of the Budget a claim for $117,000,000 to pay for approximately 13,600 deaths resulting from the fighting in Korea—claims which are being paid entirely by the Government, regardless of the amount of premiums paid by the policyholder, or the length of time which the policy was held. It can readily be seen from this that H. R. 1 would constitute no new departure from the present program, as far as payment for service-connected deaths are concerned. The financial savings resulting from the elimination of administrative expenses would be great, and most desirable.

Under leave to extend my remarks, I am inserting a very excellent article written on the subject of H. R. 1 which appeared in the April 1951 issue of the Veterans of Foreign Wars magazine, and which was prepared by Hon. Omar B. Ketchum, the national legislative director of the Veterans of Foreign Wars. This article states the issue very clearly, and I am sure the Members will find it most informative.

The article referred to follows:

THE INSURANCE ISSUE—HOUSE AND SENATE DIVIDED ON TWO BILLS DEALING WITH INSURANCE BENEFITS FOR VETERANS IN THE FUTURE

(By Omar B. Ketchum, national legislative director, VFW)

Shall national service life insurance for members of the Armed Forces, with its inequities, excessive costs, and administrative red tape be continued or shall the Congress adopt a new insurance approach through a gratuitous indemnity of $10,000 which would automatically cover all active service personnel with a minimum of red tape and no premium payments?

This question has developed into a major controversy between the United States Senate and House of Representatives with a division of opinion between veteran organizations and some outsiders taking out a stack of chips one way or another.

In the closing days of the Eighty-first Congress the House of Representatives, after months of study and investigation, approved a bill identified as H. R. 9911 which would set up a gratuitous indemnity insurance program as a future substitute for national service life insurance. The Senate failed to take action and the House bill died with the close of the Eighty-first Congress.

When the Eighty-second Congress convened the House Committee on Veterans' Affairs immediately took up reconsideration of the gratuitous indemnity insurance in a bill identified as H. R. 1. After making some changes the new bill was reported unanimously by the Veterans' Committee. On January 24 the House of Representatives, by a unanimous vote of 390 to 0, approved H. R. 1. The following day the Senate Committee on Finance under the leadership of Senator WALTER GEORGE, Georgia, opened hearings on several insurance bills, including H. R. 1, which had just come over with the approval of the House.

Among the insurance bills considered by the Senate Finance Committee was a bill by Senator GEORGE identified as Senate bill 84. This bill is an amendment to the National Service Life Insurance Act to provide a gratuitous insurance payment of $10,000 to the immediate families or estates of those servicemen who had been killed or who had died, without insurance coverage, subsequent to June 27, 1950, and would provide gratuitous insurance protection for all active service personnel, not covered by insurance, up to 120 days after final passage of the bill. H. R. 1, approved by the House, also provided gratuitous payments of $10,000 for servicemen who had died, without insurance protection, subsequent to June 27, 1950.

After 2 days of open hearings and a few executive committee sessions, the Senate Finance Committee on February 14 reported H. R. 1 favorably with some amendments. The first paragraph of the report of the Senate Finance Committee on February 14, 1951, reads as follows:

"The Committee on Finance, to whom was referred the bill (H. R. 1) to authorize the payment by the Administrator of Veterans' Affairs of a gratuitous indemnity to survivors of members of the Armed Forces who die in active service, and for other purposes, having considered the same, report favorably thereon with amendments, and recommend that the bill as amended do pass."

On Monday, February 26, H. R. 1, as reported by the Senate Finance Committee, came up for consideration on the floor of the Senate. Senator GEORGE, chairman of the Finance Committee, which reported H. R. 1 and recommended its passage, moved to substitute S. 84 in lieu of H. R. 1. Only a handful of Senators were present on the Senate floor and after a limited discussion an aye-and-nay vote was taken. Witnesses in the Senate gallery reported there were three ayes and two nays and Senator GEORGE's motion was declared adopted. The Senate was officially on record as bypassing H. R. 1 and adopting instead, as a substitute, S. 84.

Senator BYRD, Virginia, and Senator JOHNSON, Colorado, both members of the Senate Finance Committee, were the two Senators who voted in the negative against Senator GEORGE's motion. Senator BYRD submitted a spirited but brief argument in support of H. R. 1 and pointed out that the Senate Finance Committee had favorably reported H. R. 1 and recommended its passage on February 14. BYRD also read into the RECORD the history of the lengthy hearings held by the House on the gratuitous indemnity proposal and many of the reasons why H. R. 1 was a sound approach to insurance coverage for members of the Armed Forces. Senator GEORGE was supported by Senator TAFT, Ohio, who said he favored GEORGE's motion because the American Legion was opposed to H. R. 1.

As this article is written the two insurance bills, one by the House and one by the Senate, have been sent to conference. Seven Members of the Senate, headed by Senator GEORGE, and seven Members of the House, headed by Representative JOHN E. RANKIN, will attempt to resolve the differences between the House and Senate. A long and bitter struggle between the conferees is predicted, and unless two or more of the House conferees surrender it is not likely the House will accept the Senate version. It is predicted that Senators BYRD and JOHNSON, of the Senate conferees, will support the House bill, H. R. 1, while opponents of the House bill will endeavor to win over two or three of the House conferees in support of the Senate bill.

H. R. 1, as approved by the House of Representatives and reported by the Senate Finance Committee, had the support of the Veterans of Foreign Wars, the Disabled American Veterans, the AMVETS, the General Accounting Office, the Bureau of the Budget, and the President. It is opposed by the American Legion and a radio commentator, Frank Edwards. Edwards, although not a veteran, has been vigorously denouncing H. R. 1 in his broadcasts.

What is the real issue before the Congress on insurance coverage for members of the Armed Forces? Why has a new approach to insurance coverage been proposed, and is it designed to take something away from our veterans? Here are the facts as viewed by the VFW and based on a long and exhaustive investigation of the entire insurance problem:

In December 1948 an Advisory Commission on Service Pay, commonly referred to as the Hook Commission, after a long and exhaustive study, filed a report on career compensation for uniformed forces with the Secretary of Defense. Included in that report was a recommendation, with justification, to discontinue national service life insurance and substitute an automatic gratuitous indemnity coverage of $10,000 for all members of the Armed Forces.

The Hook Commission report went into detail, pointing out that national service life insurance was inequitable, excessive in costs, and a "white elephant" in administration. The report further pointed out that gratuitous indemnity coverage would be equitable in its coverage and effect savings in paper work, manpower, and costs.

In May 1950 a subcommittee of the House Committee on Executive Expenditures, headed by Representative PORTER HARDY, of Virginia, conducted a long and intensive study and hearings on the question of life-insurance coverage for members of the Armed Forces. Government officials, insurance experts, representatives of veteran organizations, and representatives of the Armed Forces were invited to express their views on insurance before this committee. Following the study and hearings, the committee submitted a lengthy report, commonly referred to as the Hardy committee report, in which it pointed out the inequities, excessive costs, and administrative red tape of the national service life insurance program and proposed as a substitute a gratuitous indemnity insurance coverage for all members of the Armed Forces. Insurance representatives of the VFW sat in and followed closely the study and hearings by the Hardy committee.

Following the Hardy committee report the staff of the House Committee on Veterans' Affairs was directed to continue the insurance study and several bills incorporating suggestions of the Hook Commission and the Hardy committee were introduced. The Veterans' Committee staff invited persons interested in service insurance to consult with it in relation to the various bills which had been introduced. At the conclusion of the staff study a subcommittee of the House Committee on Veterans' Affairs opened hearings on a series of insurance bills, including national service life insurance, a mutual insurance program, a group insurance program and a gratuitous indemnity program. When the hearing was completed the subcommittee recommended to the full committee a bill which would establish a uniform gratuitous indemnity coverage of $10,000 for each person on active duty in the Armed Forces.

The full House committee adopted the recommendation of the subcommittee and a bill identified as H. R. 9911 was reported favorably to the House with a recommendation that it be passed. The bill had the support of the VFW, the DAV, and the AMVETS. It was later approved by the House and sent to the Senate where no action was taken and the bill died. When the Eighty-second Congress convened, Chairman JOHN E. RANKIN reintroduced the insurance bill as H. R. 1 with a few improving changes. The bill, again with the support of the VFW, the DAV, and the AMVETS, was unanimously approved by the House on January 24, 1951. That is the history of the gratuitous indemnity proposal up to the time it ran into trouble in the United States Senate.

H. R. 1 would:

1. Provide automatic, uniform coverage of $10,000 gratuitous indemnity on the lives of all active service personnel, with no solicitation, no premium payment, and a minimum of administration, retroactive to June 27, 1950.

2. Provide the free insurance coverage for 120 days after discharge or release from active duty.

3. Provide continuing free insurance coverage for those who become totally and permanently disabled during service.

4. Provide privilege of purchasing Government insurance after release from active duty for those who become uninsurable by reason of their service.

5. Preserves the World Wars I and II insurance rights of those who had insurance contracts or previously eligible for said insurance.

6. End sale of subsidized Government insurance in the future, except to those mentioned in items 4 and 5, and would eventually get the Government out of the insurance business.

7. Save millions of man-hours in administrative work and millions of dollars in cost to Federal taxpayers. The United States General Accounting Office estimates that a savings of approximately $600,000,000 would have been made had this program been in effect during World War II.

Senate 84, which was substituted for House Resolution 1 in the Senate, would:

1. Provide free insurance protection from June 27, 1950, up until 120 days from the passage of the act to all service men who are not covered by national life insurance.

2. Require all servicemen to buy national service life insurance after the 120 days' grace period or have no insurance protection for their families.

3. Give no consideration to the serviceman who becomes disabled by reason of service.

4. Discriminate between servicemen who are paying premiums on policies and those who are not paying premiums on policies.

5. Perpetuate national service life insurance with its inequities, excessive costs and administrative red tape.

The principal arguments advanced against House Resolution 1 are (a) would deny Korean veterans the privilege of carrying subsidized Government insurance after discharge, and (b) would take from future veterans the privilege of carrying low-cost Government insurance after discharge.

The answer to those arguments are (a) approximately 84 percent of all servicemen involved in the Korean campaign and elsewhere are already covered with national service life insurance contracts and would be privileged under House Resolution 1 to continue their insurance after discharge if desired; and (b) out of the millions of policies issued during World Wars I and II approximately 75 percent have dropped their policies.

The benefits under House Resolution 1 far outweigh any theoretical loss of the privilege of carrying subsidized Government insurance after discharge or release from active service. It's up to Congress to make the decision.

Inciting Racial Hatred

OF

HON. JOHN J. ROONEY

OF NEW YORK

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Monday, April 2, 1951

Mr. ROONEY. Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my remarks in the RECORD, I include the following editorial appearing in Il Progresso Italo-Americano on March 28, 1951:

INCITING RACIAL HATRED

Last Saturday, at the Kefauver committee hearing held in Washington, Senator CHARLES W. TOBEY, with a touch of cutting satisfaction, read a telegram from an aged self-styled Italian who had long ago become an American citizen, in which he insinuated that Americans of Italian origin are more inclined to be criminals and crooks than those of any other racial segment of the United States population.

The gratuitous self-defamation is completely extraneous to the investigation which the Senate committee is conducting. This was not a specific accusation against particular individuals who might have violated the law or participated in the spreading corruption or promoted alliances of crime and politics. It was a ridiculous statement designed to inflict the stigma of an imaginary criminality on an ethnic segment of our population whose worthiness is beyond reproach.

It should not be necessary to dwell in detail on this subject to prove how much iniquity and slander there is in this vulgar message. All right thinking people are convinced, as we are, that this is a deliberate lie and an arbitrary falsification of the truth which should never have been brought up in an official inquiry. After all, the purpose of the investigation is to ascertain facts and fix specific responsibilities and not to go afield in absurd generalities which contribute solely to accentuate prejudices and foment discrimination and race hatred.

By reading the message Senator TOBEY voluntarily made himself a party to an unworthy action which was all the more deplorable because the unjust accusation was made by an alleged member of the racial group against which an attempt is being made to hold it up to public scorn.

Senator TOBEY well knows that the millions of Italo-Americans, naturalized or not, who live in the United States, have no reason to envy the other ethnic elements of our population for honesty, loyalty, and respect for our laws.

If the Senator, with ill-advised haste, seized upon the sadistic self-defamation of a despicable slanderer of his own blood, he did so with the malicious intention of giving a greater semblance of reliability to the insult.

THE INEXISTENCE OF AN INFAMOUS LEGEND

Criminal statistics fortunately belie the libelous statement. The presumed criminal inclination of the Italian element in our society is an infamous legend. Instincts of degeneracy are not in the nature of the race, which for thousands of years has been in the forefront in its contributions to civilization and progress.

Wherever Italians have migrated they have brought the fruitfulness of their genius and their labor. No people, as much as the Italian, has furnished greater numbers to the army of immigrants and no immigrant has contributed more than the Italian of his blood and sweat to the welfare of the countries in which he settled.

The history of Italian immigration to the United States is replete with glorious pages which sing the praises of its achievements. There is not an industry, a field of endeavor, private or public, in which Italians have not distinguished themselves for loyalty, tirelessness, and spirit of initiative. Their names are closely linked with all the great accomplishments which have made our great Republic the foremost nation in the world. Their honor roll cannot be contaminated by the defamatory drivel of scoundrels who resort to self-degradation in order to stir up nonexistent prejudices. Unfortunately there are among Italian immigrants and their children some degenerate elements who have sunk into the dregs of vice. Their misdeeds, however, should not in any way cast a sinister light on the entire group of upright people. Crime has no nationality or country of origin. It is an evil plant which grows in every clime. It is a social disease which afflicts all countries. Any attempt to attribute the instinct of degeneracy to a particular nationality is a deplorable evasion of the responsibility to suppress crime which is incumbent on legislators and law enforcement agencies.

AN EXAMPLE WHICH HAS NOT BEEN FOLLOWED

Il Progresso Italo-Americano has repeatedly launched courageous campaigns to combat discrimination and racial prejudice in the interest of all the racial groups which comprise the American people. We have frequently appealed to legislators and public officials to promote social rehabilitation with wise legislation aimed at removing the causes which encourage delinquency. We have no knowledge that Senator TOBEY—who seems so eager to popularize insults against Americans of Italian origin—has ever harkened to our appeals. He evidently seems more interested in persecution rather than in the prevention of crime. The fact that he played on sensationalism publicized by television and radio is a clear indication that there is something mysterious and personal which guides his actions in the committee of which he is a member.

The public assiduously follows the investigation conducted by the committee in the hope that the inquiry will bring about the desired results. Unfortunately, if the fatal germ of prejudice and personal rancor is injected in the investigation—as Senator TOBEY is doing—the objective will never be reached. Only a disastrous disintegration of national unity will result, a unity which America needs more urgently and imperatively today.

Representative Believes RFC Should Be Abolished

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. CLARE MAGEE
OF MISSOURI
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES
Monday, April 2, 1951

Mr. MAGEE. Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my remarks in the RECORD, I include the following interview given by Representative PHIL J. WELCH to the St. Joseph (Mo.) News-Press under date of March 23, 1951:

WELCH FEELS RFC SHOULD BE ABOLISHED—DIVERTED FROM ORIGINAL PURPOSE, HE SAYS

Congressman PHIL J. WELCH said today he would vote to abolish the Reconstruction Finance Corporation, an agency in which he once served as an assistant area manager.

"The RFC was a good thing when organized," the Third District Congressman said. "Its purpose was to help the small-business man. But somewhere along the line it was diverted into a set-up that gave its aid to big business."

The Democratic Congressman, home for the Easter vacation, served the RFC for about a year and a half as assistant manager for the area that included western Missouri and all of Kansas. He resigned when he became a candidate for Congress in 1948.

FAVORS DISASTER RELIEF

He emphatically declared himself as favoring the retaining of one section of the RFC under some other administrative set-up, however.

That is the disaster-relief loan section with which Mr. WELCH was closely associated during his tenure with the RFC.

"Many persons hard hit by flood and other disaster were aided by that section of the RFC," he said. "I recall particularly the victims of the Worth, Mo., tornado and many who suffered heavy losses when the Missouri River overflowed. These loans, the RFC figures will show, are repaid almost 100 percent.

"By all means a disaster relief set-up should be retained under some other agency if the RFC is abolished."

TO SPEAK AT ST. LOUIS

Mr. WELCH, who was accompanied home by his wife, will remain here about 2 weeks. On his way back to Washington he will stop at St. Louis, where on April 7 he will give the keynote address at the State convention of Young Democrats.

He said that as far as he knows the Office of Price Stabilization does not intend to have an office in St. Joseph; that it will operate for the entire territory out of its Kansas City office. James P. Hull, St. Joseph lawyer named as OPS enforcement attorney yesterday, will work out of the Kansas City office, the Congressman said.

Congressman WELCH said he did not believe President Harry S. Truman is "being given a fair break by some people."

SAW VIVIAN TRUMAN

"Much of the criticism he has received is unjustified," Mr. WELCH said. "Some of it is far more bitter and derisive than should ever be directed at the Chief Executive of our Nation.

"Remember this: Harry Truman has the toughest job in the world. The man would be superhuman if he didn't make mistakes. He is doing his best and will accomplish the objective sought, although, like everyone else, he may make some errors while proceeding."

The Congressman was at Kansas City yesterday. Among those with whom he conferred there was Vivian Truman, brother of the President.

Student Impressions of Congress of Industry—Bucknell Student Cites Educational Value of Sessions

OF
HON. LOUIS E. GRAHAM
OF PENNSYLVANIA
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES
Monday, April 2, 1951

Mr. GRAHAM. Mr. Speaker, in the January edition of the monthly bulletin of the Pennsylvania Manufacturers Association there appeared the following article written by Harvey H. Bush, a resident of New Castle, Pa., and a member of the senior class of Bucknell University, at Lewisburg, Pa.

College students from every State in the Union attended the fifty-fifth annual congress of American industry at the Waldorf-Astoria Hotel in New York.

Pennsylvania had three representatives. Mr. Bush was sponsored by the Pennsylvania Manufacturers Association and gives his impressions of his visit to New York in this article.

STUDENT IMPRESSIONS OF CONGRESS OF INDUSTRY—BUCKNELL STUDENT CITES EDUCATIONAL VALUE OF SESSIONS

(By Harvey Bush)

Our American way of life—the free-enterprise system—industrial mobilization—national emergency—these were the phrases that dominated sessions of the fifty-fifth annual congress of American industry. It was my privilege to be a guest of Pennsylvania Manufacturers Association at the congress and thus take part in the program established by the education department of NAM. As a student delegate it is difficult for me to convey with precise enthusiasm how valuable this experience was to me. It would not be an exaggeration to say that I learned more about the field of industry and its relations to management, labor, and government in that 1 week than I could have learned in one semester of economics, history, or political science.

WARM-UP SESSION HELD

Prior to the opening of the congress the education department of NAM put its guests through a program of orientation. Organization of NAM was explained. Representatives from various departments outlined the functions of their group. We were given the opportunity to ask questions. Soon we had an excellent picture of the structure of NAM. Those of us who had known very little about NAM were ready to sit in on the sessions of the congress with clearer understanding of the organization.

Sessions began Wednesday morning and continued until Friday evening. There were four sessions each day—morning, luncheon, afternoon and evening. Our hosts had not required us to attend every session, but they had hoped that we would attend as many as possible. However, no urging was necessary. From the inspiring opening session to the banquet Friday night, interest in the congress seemed to increase. We heard discussions of such topics as America and World Crisis, Production for Freedom, Conservation of Our Resources, Inflation and Security, and America Tomorrow. We were privileged to hear such excellent speakers as Gen. George Marshall, Senator Wallace Bennett, Cyrus Ching, Claude Putnam, Earl Bunting, and Robert Montgomery, just to name a few. It was from such men that we received the picture of American industry today and the problems it faces.

When I first heard that NAM was going to bring college students to their Congress of American Industry as guest delegates, I was a bit skeptical. It looked like a free week at the Waldorf for some lucky group of students. At the very beginning of the week, however, we realized we had been invited to see this typically American voluntary association in action and to observe at first hand industry's thinking and philosophy. It was a week of education in which I learned what the NAM is doing now and hopes to do in the future.

The week, however, was not only informative and educational, but enjoyable also. It was not a week devoted entirely to speeches. We saw dramatic skits, heard excellent musical programs of soloists and choral groups, and saw interesting films. We also had the opportunity to meet and talk with some of the speakers and other men and women who were attending the congress. The students were assigned different tables at the luncheons, thus making it possible for us to meet many of the delegates. I was amazed at the genuine hospitality extended. We learned that NAM is definitely not composed of stuffed-shirted industrialists. It was a wonderful experience to be able to sit down and talk informally with these men and women. The student delegates also had opportunity to visit the United Nations. This was the first trip to Flushing for many of us who will always remember it.

As the convention adjourned Friday night it was hard to believe that the week was over. As we left New York Saturday for our college campuses throughout the Nation, we each knew that we had experienced a most enjoyable week. I think that the education department of NAM has a wonderful program which brings to the congress students, educators, and apprentices. As was stated at the convention, it would be nice to take a postgraduate course in their program. It was a week I shall never forget.

Issues Involved in Assignment of Troops to an International Army

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. FRANCIS CASE
Friday, March 30 (legislative day of Monday, March 26), 1951

Mr. CASE. Mr. President, with the permission of the Senate, I desire to place in the RECORD certain statements which I have prepared this afternoon, in preparation for a pro and con program for the National Broadcasting Co. tonight, on the issues involved in the pending resolutions.

The statements are in the form of answers to questions to be asked by Mr. Frank Burkholser, of the National Broadcasting Co.

So Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that I may extend my remarks in the Appendix of the RECORD, so as to include the statements I shall make tonight over the facilities of the National Broadcasting Co.

Mr. CONNALLY. Mr. President, reserving the right to object, is the Senator's request that the statements shall appear in the RECORD as a speech or simply as a statement by the Senator from South Dakota?

Mr. CASE. Whichever way is more agreeable to the Senator and the Senate.

Mr. CONNALLY. If it is to appear as a statement, I have no objection; but I shall object to having speeches placed in the RECORD under such circumstances, because we have never done so.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Let the Chair suggest to the Senator from South Dakota that if his request is to have his own speech printed in the Appendix, he should ask consent that it be printed as a statement by him.

Mr. CASE. That is entirely agreeable to me. I asked that it be printed in the Appendix of the RECORD.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Is the Senator requesting to have his own remarks or a separate matter printed?

Mr. CASE. They are my own remarks. I have no objection to having them appear in the RECORD as a statement. I asked that they appear in the Appendix of the RECORD, and that in the Appendix of the RECORD they may appear as my own words.

Mr. CONNALLY. Mr. President, I shall have no objection to having that done, if the statement bears a heading which shows that it is a statement by the Senator.

Mr. CASE. I shall present it in that form.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Is there objection?

There being no objection, the statements were ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

OUTLINE FOR QUESTIONS AND ANSWERS ON THE GREAT DEBATE RE TROOPS ABROAD BY FRANK BURKHOLSER, OF NATIONAL BROADCASTING COMPANY, AND FRANCIS CASE, UNITED STATES SENATOR, SOUTH DAKOTA, MARCH 30, 1951

Mr. BURKHOLSER. Senator CASE, what exactly is the question involved in the foreign-policy matter now before the Senate?

Senator CASE. Mr. Burkholser, the question is whether the Senate, and possibly the Congress, shall approve President Truman's announced plan to send four additional divisions of ground troops to Europe to be part of an international army but say that we want a voice in deciding whether any additional troops shall be sent.

Mr. BURKHOLSER. How did the matter come up?

Senator CASE. The question arises out of our membership in the North Atlantic Treaty organization under a treaty ratified by the Senate in the Eighty-first Congress. Article 3 of that treaty provided for mutual aid in maintaining the security of the North Atlantic area.

At the time the treaty was considered in the Senate, assurances were given that Congress would be consulted and have a voice in determining how the treaty would be carried out. That is, that Congress would have a right to say in what way and to what extent the United States would contribute to implementing the pact.

Shortly afterward, Congress considered and passed a bill to provide military equipment to other countries in the North Atlantic Treaty organization. At the time, no provision was made for creating an international army. Each member nation was setting up its own army or its own navy if it had one. The United States, by the military aid law, authorized help to these other countries in arming and equipping their forces.

Now, however, the President has said that he intended to send some United States troops to Europe to be part of an international army under an international command.

In January, Senator WHERRY, of Nebraska, made a motion that the Senate express itself as opposed to such action until the Congress had considered and formulated a policy with respect to sending troops into an international army. That motion was referred to a joint committee of the Committees on Foreign Relations and Armed Services. After hearings, they reported the resolutions now before the Senate.

In brief, these resolutions say that the Senate or Congress, as the case may be, approves the President's plan to send four divisions of ground troops to the international army but that we think we, or at least certain committees, should be consulted before any more troops are sent, beyond these four divisions and their supporting troops.

Mr. BURKHOLSER. By the way, Senator CASE, you were not a Member of the Senate when the North Atlantic Treaty was ratified but you were a Member of the House of Representatives when the military-aid law was passed, under which, as you say, military equipment for these other member nations was provided. What was your position on that bill?

Senator CASE. I am glad you asked that question, Mr. Burkholser, for it will help to clarify the issues in this matter as I see them.

I voted for that military aid bill.

I did it on this ground: the Senate had already ratified the North Atlantic Treaty. Rightly or wrongly, we were committed to a pledge of assistance by that body of the Congress which, under the Constitution ratifies treaties. If it meant anything, it meant that we would help them to arm so as to restore a balance of power in Europe and the North Atlantic area. We had persuaded these nations to say they would oppose aggression in that area; we had said we would help them in some way; we could hardly expect them to stand against aggression with their naked fists.

That was the phrase I used in the debate in the House. We could not expect them to stand up against an aggressor with their naked fists.

So, I voted for the measure to provide them with some arms for their own troops. Now, however, the question is whether we shall say it is all right with us that the President has promised land troops of the United States to an international army under an international command, but that hereafter we would please like to have him ask us about it.

Mr. BURKHOLSER. Will the resolution now pending require the President to consult Congress hereafter?

Senator CASE. No; it says in effect that we hope he will. That is one of the questions to be decided.

The pending resolutions are simple expressions of the Senate or of the Congress if the concurrent resolution is adopted.

Senator BRICKER, of Ohio, however proposes to make a motion that the matter be sent back to the committees with an instruction to report the subject matter back in the form of a regular bill which would have to be passed by both House and Senate and either signed or vetoed by the President. If signed, of course, it would have the effect of law.

Many Senators—Senator CAIN, of Washington, and Senator DIRKSEN, of Illinois, for example—oppose the pending resolutions principally because they are only resolutions and they think would only hoodwink the people since they would be merely a pious hope and not have the force of law.

Mr. BURKHOLSER. Well, Senator CASE, do you think Congress should have a voice in sending troops to be part of an international army under an international command?

Senator CASE. Indeed, I do, Mr. Burkholser. The Constitution gave Congress the power to declare war.

The Constitution also says that Congress "shall have the power to make rules for the government and regulation of the land and naval forces, to raise and support armies and to provide for the organizing of the Militia—which is the National Guard—and for governing them when employed in the service of the United States."

So, I certainly think Congress should say whether it is raising armies for an international command and whether the National Guard when called into Federal service shall be made part of an international army in peacetime, and without either a declaration of war or an attack upon territory of the United States.

Mr. BURKHOLSER. But Senator CASE, does not the Constitution also say that the President is Commander in Chief of the Army and Navy and of the Militia when it is called into service of the United States?

Senator CASE. That is true, Mr. Burkholser. He is Commander in Chief of the Armed Forces. It may be questioned, however, whether the fathers of the country and the Constitution ever contemplated that any President would delegate that power to an international commander in time of peace.

Certainly George Washington never expected any successor to do so. But, regardless of whether the President technically can order our troops into an international army in time of peace, without getting prior approval of the Congress, certainly it is poor policy for him to do so.

A lot of precedents have been cited where Presidents have sent troops into foreign countries to protect American lives or property without first getting approval of Congress, and generally with the consent or by the invitation of the host country—but never before in time of peace have they been put under an international command. I have not heard of one such instance.

I strongly question whether the laws under which the National Guard of the several States can be called into the Federal service authorize the President to send them out of this country in time of peace and to place them under the command of officers who are not officers of the United States.

If they permit it technically, at least I can say that I believe such an act was far beyond the intent of any Congress that ever authorized federalizing the militias of the several States.

Mr. BURKHOLSER. Senator CASE, have you considered offering an amendment to prevent the militia units from being sent into an international army?

Senator CASE. Not exactly, Mr. Burkholser, because I do not think such an amendment should be needed.

I doubt if there is authority in law for the State militias to be made part of an international army simply by an order of the President.

And I have been amazed that Senators from certain States who say they are strong for States' rights should claim that the President, as Commander in Chief, can take the State militias out of the country in time of peace and turn them over to an international army and place them under the command of officers who are not even officers of the United States.

Mr. BURKHOLSER. But you have proposed an amendment to the pending resolutions, two of them in fact, I understand.

Senator CASE. That is correct, Mr. Burkholser.

The first amendment I have proposed would say that soldiers sent to this international army should be at least 20 years of age. This would prevent sending 18- and 19-year-olds into the international army.

We had a children's crusade back in the thirteenth century. It was one of the last of the crusades for the rescue of the Holy Land. The graves and the bones of the children were scattered all the way from France to Jerusalem.

General Eisenhower, you will recall, has written his memoirs of World War II under the title "Crusade in Europe"; well, I don't want this new crusade to be a "children's crusade."

Boys of 18 and 19 are not used for policemen even at home—they should not be used for an international police under the command of officers we do not and cannot control and under environments and conditions we cannot influence.

If any one thing was learned in our occupation of Germany and Japan, it was, I thought, that young boys should not be used for occupation troops, even when under the command of our own officers and under camp conditions and leave regulations that we could determine. But now, unless a restriction such as I have proposed is adopted, 18- and 19-year-old boys can be drafted and sent into an international army where the duties, conditions, and influences will be those of foreign officers whose ideals and standards, whether better or worse, will be beyond our control.

I simply do not think this new crusade should be a children's crusade.

Therefore, I have offered my amendment, and unless it is adopted, on that score alone, I would vote against endorsing the President's plan.

Mr. BURKHOLSER. Well, Senator CASE, I see you feel very strongly on that point.

Senator CASE. I do.

Mr. BURKHOLSER. And I was wanting to ask you about your other proposed amendment, the one on enlisting volunteers in Germany. I understand that has attracted considerable interest in England and in Europe generally.

Senator CASE. It has attracted considerable interest over there. Several foreign newspapers have sent queries about it. I think the people of England and Europe, generally, have a better realization than we do of the tremendous capacity for production that exists in Germany. They also know by experience that the Germans are good fighters.

And, instinctively, the people of the North Atlantic area, on that side of the Atlantic, would like to have the production of German industry and the manpower of Germany on our side if war should come. And they know, too, that the German people are naturally on the side of religion and of private property against the tenets of communism.

My amendment seeks to make possible the recruitment of matériel and manpower from the capacity that is Germany's. I have tried to draw the amendment in such a way as to open the door to the Germans without compelling them and, at the same time, to avoid the fears that a remilitarized Germany might create in France, or in Russia, too, for that matter. It reads:

"It is the sense of the Senate that the people of Germany should be permitted to share in their own defense and the collective security of the North Atlantic area by contributing such supplies and equipment as the several states of Germany may agree to furnish; and that a special corps shall be created for the voluntary enlistment of German nationals: Provided, that the training and command of such soldiers shall be under the direction of the Commander in Chief, NATO."

As you will see, that opens the door to voluntary contributions of supplies and equipment by the German states; it opens the door for the voluntary enlistment of German soldiers in the international army to be under the NATO commander in chief and does not create a German army as such.

It is designed to permit the people with the largest industrial capacity of Europe, which we once destroyed and have now largely built back, to help in its own defense. It lets German youth and trained veterans enlist in the defense of their own homes.

Unless we are willing to let these people help defend themselves, why should we put up the money and men to do it? That is my position.

Mr. BURKHOLSER. Thank you, Senator CASE.

Idaho Adopts a Webfoot

OF

HON. HOMER D. ANGELL

OF OREGON

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Monday, April 2, 1951

Mr. ANGELL. Mr. Speaker, one of our outstanding citizens who has made a name for himself in our State of Oregon has moved on to fields in our neighboring State of Idaho and has recently been elected to the highest office of that State.

I am including as part of these remarks an article which appeared in the Old Oregon magazine for February 1951 by Anita Holmes, entitled "Idaho Adopts a Webfoot," which tells of the rise of Oregon-born Len Jordan to the governorship of Idaho. The article follows:

IDAHO ADOPTS A WEBFOOT—LEN JORDAN, UNIVERSITY GRADUATE OF 1923 AND GRANGEVILLE COUNTY RANCHER, BECOMES THE NEW GOVERNOR OF IDAHO

(By Anita Holmes)

When an Idahoan talks of his State's new Governor, he may say something like, "Len Jordan—auto dealer and rancher from the Grangeville country—never heard much of him in politics before—Republican."

But an Oregonian identifies Governor Jordan as "University of Oregon graduate in the class of '23—played varsity football and made Phi Beta at the same time—married Grace Edgington, class of '16."

The economics and business studied by Jordan at Oregon will be indispensable during his 4 years in the Idaho statehouse. His first legislature is now underway. It should be a productive one with the governor and the majorities in the two houses of the same party.

A soon as the ballot boxes were put away in November, Jordan announced some of his plans for this and the next three legislatures:

"Action toward a long-range highway program in the State, personal supervision over the purse strings of the State to cut down unnecessary expenses.

"Something's got to be done about the driver's license law, and we need a motor pool to cut down duplication of traveling in State vehicles.

"We'll follow the same principles we use in business to conduct State affairs."

And if Jordan can pin his business principles to State government, Idaho should become a national leader. Every business he has touched has succeeded. All, that is, but one.

This single failure came in the early days of the depression, when countless good managers saw their profits eclipsed by a broken bank.

After Jordan had been graduated from Oregon he headed back to the sheep country in central Oregon. As the son of county judge in Enterprise he had grown up with the currents of the Snake River and had no desire for a desk job in the city.

Only Grace Edgington could bring him to the city of Portland, and she did. But after a few years of marriage and two children, the Jordans turned to new horizons in Wallowa County. To go in this direction the young accountant had to make a bank loan, lease a farm, and buy a band of sheep.

They lost all but $990 in the depression.

However, this loss didn't send Jordan to the Government for security. He believes today that the only place where there is security is in a Federal penitentiary where you have lost all your freedoms.

Idahoans who elected Governor Jordan have often heard him say, "I cannot see why the Government owes anybody a living except in rare instances, such as the destitute, the blind, the crippled, the child of the broken home.

"No one would deny that modern society must consider such obligations. But under the New Deal, the Fair Deal, the welfare state, thrift on a national scale and at the family level has been made to seem stupid, old-fashioned.

"We must go back to the day when people could save for their old age and know their savings would still buy what they would need; to the day when young people felt a responsibility to the parents who bore them."

There was never a chance in the Jordan background for him or his family to become soft. After losing everything in the depression he rode into the sheep country looking for a job. It was then that he entered Idaho, where he eventually became owner of a sheep ranch in Hells Canyon, about 85 miles from Lewiston.

Life in Hells Canyon was rugged, especially for a woman, but Grace Jordan was equal to it. At one stretch she didn't see another woman for 4 months. She became the "best barber along the Snake," and during 1 month entertained some 78 wayfarers. She also gave the younger Jordan generation their basic education.

In the early 1940's the family moved from the canyon ranch to Grangeville; in 1944 they sold the ranch and put the money into a 320-acre farm and an insurance and real-estate business.

The business subsequently was sold and the Oregon graduate began operating a farmer-owned string of warehouses and a pea-processing plant besides running his own farm. Success with this led to an additional 400 acres of farm land, a farm-implement business, and the Ford-Mercury dealership in Grangeville.

When Len Jordan first announced that he was running for the nomination, at least one would-be political expert in Idaho just smiled and remarked that "some car dealer in Grangeville is running on a ticket of highway improvement."

At that, probably no man in the State was more qualified to run on a platform including such a plank. Jordan had been more than auto dealer and rancher for the 2 years before his election as Governor. He had been representative from Idaho County to the State legislature and in turn had been chairman of the committee appointed to study highway-user taxation.

As chairman of this committee, he helped Idaho move into its present sound financial status. The inland State is high among the few solvent States in the Nation.

The governor at that time, who also helped bring that solvency, didn't face a full Republican legislature as Jordan is doing. Last session C. A. Robins worked with both houses under Democratic control.

Robins was Idaho's twelfth, and Jordan the thirteenth Republican governor. All but one man, the secretary of state, in the statehouse with Jordan is a Republican.

One Idahoan who was a State official but won't be returning this session is Cal Wright—Democratic candidate who was defeated by Jordan. A popular man throughout Idaho, Wright was justly feared by Republican Party leaders, but he early conceded the election to the man from Grangeville.

After the election was over and the governorship won, Jordan was uneasy over the difficult job of pulling together Idaho's divergent interests. He feared that 50 percent of the people would hate him at the end of 4 years—and he might be correct. It's not easy to win strong support from both the leading religious factions and the gambling interests in a State like Idaho.

But if Jordan history repeats—his years at Oregon, then ranching and other business ventures—this political newcomer from the Oregon side of the Snake will soon be a success as Governor of Idaho.

A New Birth of Freedom

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. HUBERT H. HUMPHREY
OF MINNESOTA
IN THE SENATE OF THE UNITED STATES
Friday, March 30 (legislative day of Monday, March 26), 1951

Mr. HUMPHREY. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to have printed in the Appendix of the RECORD an address entitled "A New Birth of Freedom." This address was delivered by Mr. Harry A. Bullis, chairman of the board of General Mills, Inc., Minneapolis, Minn., on Friday, July 28, 1950, at Lake Success, N. Y.

There being no objection, the address was ordered to be printed in the RECORD as follows:

A NEW BIRTH OF FREEDOM

All progress in the world comes slowly, and at a price. It is well to keep this in mind when the turn of events seems to make us unhappy with the United Nations. We would be realists if we think of the United Nations today as a gawky boy in the most awkward, most difficult period of life.

You and I have seen plenty of such boys. Looking at one of them, in his years of frustration and self doubt, even his parents are sometimes worried about his future. No relative or friend is wise enough to predict how that lad will turn out.

He may turn out to be a total failure. All of us have seen boys who did fail in spite of all that well wishers could offer in the way of counsel and support.

On the other hand, he may develop talents and power so vast, and aptitudes which have been unknown as to make him an influence for good not merely in his own community but in the whole country and even the whole world.

One such unpromising youngster was born in the humblest sort of home in Kentucky 141 years ago. His father was a failure, judged by the world's standards; his mother had been a servant. Neither they nor he had more than a few months' formal schooling.

The boy was tall, homely, and most unimpressive. He showed no special talent. He had few successes. He served for a few weeks as a volunteer in the Black Hawk War, but without distinction. He worked for farmers in Indiana and Illinois. He split rails for a few cents an hour. He was for a little while a partner in a crossroads grocery store which went bankrupt. He got himself admitted to the bar and elected to the Illinois Legislature. His youthful speeches did not attract much attention. Nobody—not even his best friends and well wishers—could think of him as anything more than just another small-town lawyer-politician.

Yet, all the time something deep and strong and powerful was going on inside him. Something that was one day to make his name known in the farthest corners of the world; something that still lives in the heart of every man and woman who seeks—as he did—to make sure that "Government of the people, by the people, for the people, shall not perish from the earth." The United Nations may be as futile and as little known in the years to come as some of the boys who grew up with Abraham Lincoln. That is a possibility, though I do not believe a likely one. Or the United Nations may go on to write in even broader terms the goal proclaimed almost a century ago by the backwoods lawyer who became our President when he said: "* * * that this Nation, under God, shall have a new birth of freedom." It can well be, through the United Nations organization, that this world under God shall have a new birth of freedom.

Yes, the United Nations can be, with God's help and our own faith and devotion, the greatest agency for good that has come into the world in 1900 years.

Toward that goal of international good, and peace and well-being, let us work, and believe, and hope.

We—the people of America—have been elected by fate to occupy an important position in the United Nations. For the moment we have to carry more than our share. We may not like it. We cannot expect to be thanked. We will often be criticized. But we are elected. We cannot resign. We cannot duck. We cannot run. It is a great chance for the people if their strength of purpose, their tolerance, and their bigness hold out. I am one of those who believe we will hold out and win.

Increased Postal Rates

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. WILLIAM K. VAN PELT
OF WISCONSIN
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES
Monday, April 2, 1951

Mr. VAN PELT. Mr. Speaker, the following editorial carries some very constructive views regarding increased postal rates. While I have always felt that this great Government service should in a large way be self-sustaining, we must not overlook the fact that the service serves all of the people and therefore the Hoover Commission reports should be studied extensively and their recommendations put into effect at once before any large increases are made in these rates at this time. The following editorial appeared in the West Bend News, of West Bend, Wis.:

INCREASED POSTAL RATES

Strenuous effort is now being made by the Post Office Department of the Federal Government and by President Truman to rush legislation through Congress that will double second-class postal rates. Companion bills have been introduced in both Houses of Congress, and both bills call for a 100-percent increase in second-class rates in 3 years—50 percent the first year, 25 the second, and 25 the third year.

In urging an increase in his message to Congress in February, President Truman made certain statements which we believe do not present the situation fairly to either the Congress or the public. The figures used by the President are based upon post office cost-accounting figures. We believe those figures to be erroneous because the fundamental realities of proper cost accounting methods are ignored.

Post-office cost accounting is determined on a weight and per-piece basis, without consideration of public-service factors or priorities. However, these factors are basic and paramount in the operation of the post office, because the post office is not a business, but is a service to all the American people, and hence cost figures determined as they would be in competitive business are of little value for setting rates.

For example, according to the post office's own records, there are some 39,000 of the present 41,000 post offices in this country which do not take in sufficient money to pay their own expenses. Some 94 percent of all post offices are in this category. We believe that this only serves to prove that the Post Office Department is created primarily for service to American citizens and not as a business proposition. How many chain stores, we ask, could continue to exist if 94 percent of their stores did not take in sufficient funds to pay their expenses?

The idea that the post office should serve all the American public on a business basis is not in agreement with the handling of other governmental departments. For in 1950, there were differences between income and outgo in the Interior Department, which operated with a deficit of about $460,000,000; in the Commerce Department, with a deficit of about $668,000,000, and in the Department of Agriculture, which showed a deficit of about $475,000,000. Each of these serves mere segments of the population. The post office serves everyone. The President, in his message of February, gives the estimated net postal deficit for 1952 as $361,000,000, which is less than any of those just mentioned.

The President mentions that publications made a contribution to the spread of information and education among all citizens. He does not mention, however, the very valuable effect of these publications, particularly in times like this, in carrying information concerning the national defense effort both to the people of this country and also to the millions of readers throughout the world. Nor does he mention the great contribution of advertising to defense bond sales, to the maintenance of steady employment, to Red Cross recruiting, and a host of other services.

The President points out that the matter of postal rates should be subject to very thorough study. We can agree with him wholeheartedly. We believe that such a study will prove conclusively that the post office is a service agency of the Government; that cost accounting charges should fundamentally be divided into two groups, "Government service" and "business handling"; that the first class should be paid for wholly by the Government, as are the deficits in the Interior, Commerce, and Agriculture Departments, and that the costs in the second group should be reflected in the rate structure of the postal service.

For the reasons indicated, it is urged that the enactment of the rate increases at this time either be deferred, or kept at a very low level, and that the survey which the President suggests should be completed before any substantial rate increases are attempted. It is urged very strongly that this thorough survey of the whole subject of postal rates be undertaken by an independent body similar in type to the Hoover Commission or the committees who in the past have made studies and recommendations in connection with social security.

Postal Rate Problem Needs Study

OF
HON. WAYNE L. HAYS
OF OHIO
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES
Monday, April 2, 1951

Mr. HAYS of Ohio. Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my remarks in the RECORD, I include the following editorial which appeared in the Cadiz Republican, Cadiz, Ohio. The thinking of Mr. Milton Ronsheim, the editor of this outstanding eastern Ohio weekly, closely coincides with my own on the matter of postal rates:

POSTAL RATE PROBLEM NEEDS STUDY

Once again the Post Office Department, with the backing of President Truman, is making its bid in Congress to substantially increase rates on various classes of postage. We believe the post-office deficit has not been properly presented and that the proposed rate increase would be another unnecessary expense upon a harassed public.

In the first place, the Post Office Department, in spite of its reluctance to adopt any economy measures except to give poorer mail delivery to its patrons, comes nearer to making itself pay than any other governmental agency.

It is not a business but a service to the public. Rural routes were never expected to pay their own way; they were instituted as a "free delivery" to persons unable to go to a post office daily. The service is one of "delivery" and not of "sending" mail and should be so considered in counting its cost.

The post office is likewise one of the Government's own service organization. A huge quantity of mail sent by Government agents and agencies is handled free and given no place on the credit side of the ledger. Here, for example, the mail of such agencies as the county extension agents, Production and Marketing Administration, draft board, conservation office, Weather Bureau, FBI, health department, the post office, and others pay no postage. Incoming free mail is also very heavy. It is estimated that half of the post-office deficit comes from franked mail.

Additional postage on newspapers would be another added cost of production to a large number of increased expenses. By their very nature, newspapers give a constant, free public service, both to government and community. The current issue of the Republican, for example, carries the following: A long explanation of new social-security benefits and what applicants should do; the weekly news of extension agents; draft board news; civilian defense news and a plea for first-aid instructors; about a church fund drive and efforts to secure a doctor for Cadiz; an editorial on fire safety; announcement of a civil-service examination for the post office itself for a rural route carrier, and so on. These services are of considerable value to good government—and are given free as a routine job.

We believe Congress should go into the entire post-office problem before changing its postal rates. The issue is broader than just raising rates to meet a deficit. Certainly an over-all survey will show where many economies may be effected, that millions of dollars listed as deficits should be listed as free services and that the post office is a service organization, after all.

Grain for India

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. CARL D. PERKINS
OF KENTUCKY
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES
Monday, April 2, 1951

Mr. PERKINS. Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my remarks in the RECORD, I include the following editorial from the Louisville Courier Journal:

GRAIN FOR INDIA HAS NOW BECOME AN UGLY BARTER

If your neighbor was hungry, would you give him a piece of bread? Of course you would, and whatever else your refrigerator could afford. India is our neighbor in this world grown strangely small. And if for no other reason than that of human compassion we should be touched by India's plight. Droughts, floods, and earthquakes have ravaged that teeming land. It faces a famine catastrophic even in a country where pain and privation are familiar visitors. For grain is the factor between life and death for India, and the season's crops are ruined.

India asked the United States to sell 2,000,000 tons of wheat on long-term credit. After talks in which Herbert Hoover, Senator TAFT, and other Republicans agreed with President Truman, the President asked Congress in February to give the grain to India. Congress has not yet acted, and what should have been a simple act of decency has become a haggle over human lives and souls.

Why this delay? The Indian Government refused to join the United Nations' condemnation of Red China as the aggressor in Korea. India has tried, even though with ineffectual good will, to find some means to end the conflict in Korea. And there are still men in Congress who cannot see that in this fateful time free men must keep their brothers if they themselves stay free.

Instead of a plain act of kindness, the wheat transaction has become a cynical contest between Soviet Communist and western freedom. Red China has offered India 1,000,000 tons of rice and corn in barter, and the Soviet Union is ready to supply 50,000 more tons. This, you may say, should not influence us in a matter which morality should decide alone. Just the same, it must. The United States cannot buy Indian understanding of our loyalties and our independence with 2,000,000 tons of grain. But here is a nation just emerging from colonialism. If, faced with disaster, it finds strength in the blandishments of communism and deadly inaction in us who boast of the world's most vital resources, then what may we expect? Millions more Indians will hurry toward the mirage of Soviet totalitarianism. We will have failed to lead them to the journey's end of freedom and self-respect. And this wide domain of all we cherish will one day become a refuge and a lonely land.

Taxes on Taxes

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. WILLIAM K. VAN PELT
OF WISCONSIN
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES
Monday, April 2, 1951

Mr. VAN PELT. Mr. Speaker, all Americans realize that it takes taxes to support Government and to supply necessary Government services. They also know that taxes assessed at the local level return more in Government services than Federal assessments. That is why I am opposed to the taxing of municipal securities. The following editorial in the Fond du Lac Commonwealth Reporter expresses the sincere opinions of taxpayers in my district:

TAXES ON TAXES

The Federal Government, at the suggestion of Secretary of the Treasury Snyder, proposes to tax the interest which municipalities pay on the general obligation bonds which they issue.

Municipalities the Nation over are having a tough time finding sources of taxation through which to raise funds to meet general service obligations which have been saddled on them by law. Larger and larger portions of the taxes to which the local communities rightfully should be entitled are now going into State and national treasuries.

The irony of the whole thing is that at the same time State and National governments continue to boast about the huge sums they are returning to the local communities as aids.

Aids? That's just another word to confuse and make the local taxpayer feel good and to give the politicians an opportunity to brag about all the money they are getting out of Washington and Madison for their constituents. Actually it's much like someone blackjacking an individual, taking $50 out of his wallet, giving him $5 back and pretending to be a good fellow.

The bill to tax interest on municipal indebtedness, the bright idea of Secretary Snyder, is now pending in the House Ways and Means Committee. It is hoped that the members will have enough sense either to recommend its rejection or forget all about reporting it out.

If the Snyder proposal is enacted into law it will be a tough blow for Fond du Lac and all other cities who in the future try to float bond issues to finance necessary municipal improvement. If the interest rates on municipal bonds are taxed by the Federal Government, it is certain that prospective buyers will be reluctant to purchase them without a compensatory increase in the rate of interest. Increase the interest rate and the cost of municipal government will increase substantially.

Let's take Berlin in a neighboring county because most everyone is acquainted with this up and coming community. If Berlin wanted to build a new sewage plant the cost probably would be increased by more than $200,000 because the tax would probably double the interest rate paid on the bonds. And who would pay that extra $200,000 in interest charges over the years? Certainly not the people who buy them. Certainly not the Federal Government. Well, there's always the poor taxpayer.

But let's bring it closer to home. In the Fond du Lac budget for this year there are $18,368 set aside for bond interest. If the tax were enacted by the Federal Government actually that interest would mount to nearly $37,000. The interest, without the tax, is going to be more in future years. Over a period of years the increase by reason of a Federal tax would mount into the hundreds of thousands of dollars.

It is quite evident that Fond du Lac, as well as many other communities, could not absorb that additional burden and many municipal improvements, necessary as they might be, would have to left undone.

If you are opposed to unwarranted increases in local taxes write or wire your Representatives in Congress—Representative WILLIAM K. VAN PELT and Senators ALEXANDER WILEY and JOSEPH MCCARTHY.

Rustle of Spring

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. ALBERT P. MORANO
OF CONNECTICUT
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES
Monday, April 2, 1951

Mr. MORANO. Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my remarks in the RECORD, I include the following article by Bernie Yudain from the Greenwich Time, of Greenwich, Conn.:

THE RAMBLER

(By Bernie Yudain)

RUSTLE OF SPRING

As long as I've lived in the country, I can't tell you what kind of bird I heard whistling a sweet madrigal the other morning as I left for work. It was a strong voice, and a melodic one. My unseen diva seemed happy.

Nights now, you hear the peepers, too. Their incessant sing-song cheeping is the familiar pizzicato in the Spring Song. The squirrels are darting to and fro and up and down the elms and poplars and I suppose out in the fields where, alas, I am not wont to trod these busy days, there is considerable bustling.

The first red flush of budlets can be seen on the branches and some proud golden splashes of the hearty forsythia brighten the suburban streets.

The winter-jaded observer, submerged in routine, occupied with the headlines, concerned over the future, pauses and realizes that spring is here. Soon the pale green puffs will adorn the trees, and winter-weary lawns will take on a green freshness—a new lease on life.

This, then, is the season of hope, and these natural stirrings are its myriad heralds.

Whether Easter comes early or late, the spring is God's promise to His children—to all the harried, disillusioned people who have lost their shiny dreams in a miasma of war, threats of war, scandal, violence, corruption, deceit, chicanery, and nearly universal callousness.

Now comes the reminder—right outside our window, along the neighborhood streets, in the meadows and woods—that nothing really has changed, except us.

There's a sweetness and a soothing balm in the air and the bright sun lights up the darkened corners of our lives, its warm rays melting some of the tenseness and rudeness of our ways.

Here nature seems to be offering us the Grail—not even demanding we go forth and find it. But we're a busy people in this frenetic age of speed and atoms and electronics. Perhaps one day or another during the vernal season we'll stop to take a deep breath of the clear air and observe that spring is wonderful, but then we'll get right back on the treadmill for another interminable race with whatever it is we're racing.

The chipmunks and the larks, alas, seem to give forth better music when "heaven tries the earth if it be in tune."

Living a Religion

OF
HON. WAYNE L. HAYS
OF OHIO
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES
Monday, April 2, 1951

Mr. HAYS of Ohio. Mr. Speaker, many people talk about religion and what to do about it, but not enough of us really live it. Under leave to extend my remarks, I am including a column from the New York Times of Sunday, April 1, which in eloquently simple prose retells a story known to every Ohioan. This oft-told tale shines like a beacon light in these troubled times:

TOPICS OF THE TIMES

MAN NAMED CHAPMAN

A hundred and fifty years ago this April a stranger turned up in Licking Spring, Ohio. Strangers were scarce in Licking Spring. The only white man living there looked closely at this one. He was 26, tall, thin, black-eyed. He wore homemade frontier-style clothing. His name, he said, was Jonathan Chapman and he had come West from Massachusetts by way of Pittsburgh. What he did at Licking Spring must have baffled its only resident. Instead of staking off a piece of land for himself, Chapman hunted until he found a small clearing. He took apple seeds from a loaded burlap bag and planted them. He put a rough fence around the plot and left Licking Spring as noiselessly as he had come.

That was the first appearance in American history of Johnny Appleseed, a man more tenderly remembered in the years to follow then any river-boat load of assorted politicians, generals, and statesmen.

MUSKINGUM WHITE WOMAN KOKOSING

A few years later Johnny was seen on the Ohio with two boats filled with apple seeds from the cider presses in Pitsburgh. Thereafter his trail is not easy to follow. He paddled his boat up White Woman Creek, up the Licking River, the Muskingum, the Mohican and the Kokosing. He set out his orchards at Steubenville and a half hundred other places in Ohio, Indiana, and Michigan. Wherever apples bloomed fresh in the wilderness a man could say for sure that Johnny had been there. Sometimes he returned to his planting for seedlings to set elsewhere; as often, he did not. He left his nurseries behind in the hope that the settlers might realize what beauty and riches he had planted for them and care for them as he did.

LIVING A RELIGION

A hundred small towns knew him, but they knew as little of his coming and going as of the birds of spring and autumn. They knew him as a religious zealot but one who lived his religion far more than he talked it. The main drive of his life was selflessness; he had set out to plant apples because, back East, he had heard that Ohio apples were dying and he felt called to replant them, that the settlers might eat the fruit and be spared the scurvy. His way of life and his work made him a legend among the simple people of his day and long before he died. In a land that was hard and where life was hard, his disinterest in the things that concerned most men brought him the great love that outlasted his life. He died in 1845, near Fort Wayne, Ind., after catching cold while inspecting one of his nurseries.

THE LEGENDS GROW

After his death the legends about him grew like one of his own trees. Men told of his ways with the Indians, of their friendship for him and their trust and of the times Johnny had dealt with them alone and unafraid. Another man told how he had seen Johnny playing with bear cubs while the mother bear watched without concern; few humans have walked this earth who could do that. Others told how Johnny would eat no meat, carry no gun, how he would give the clothes from his back to any man who needed them, how he would walk the winter woods barefoot, how he would ask a simple meal at a cabin door and pay for it with apple trees, how he asked to sleep the night on a cabin floor and was gone long before his hosts awoke.

THE HARDER AIM

The men of his day who sought and gained wealth, power, and prestige are long forgotten. Still remembered, as fresh as Ohio apple blossoms, is the simple man who took no care for the things of the morrow as he walked through early American history and brushed close to people's hearts. Perhaps it was because, after all, wealth and power and prestige may not be so hard to achieve; many a man gets them. Johnny Appleseed aimed at something much tougher: to leave the world a more neighborly place than he found it.

Congress Itself Gives Away Its Powers

OF
HON. USHER L. BURDICK
OF NORTH DAKOTA
Monday, April 2, 1951

Mr. BURDICK. Mr. Speaker, I have seen so many articles and heard so many speeches deploring the fact that the bureaus and the President are fast taking away the powers of Congress. Some Congressmen have made similar statements. The public, through radio addresses and letters, have generally importuned Congress to make an effort to reclaim its powers under the Constitution. I think this should be done, but it is so easy to accomplish that few will accept my recipe for doing it.

Under the Constitution, the House of Representatives and the Senate can, by joint resolution, reduce the powers which have been delegated to any executive bureau, and prevent further delegation. The reason why executive bureaus today make rules and regulations with the force of law is not because these bureaus have usurped the power of Congress, but because Congress has, by law, delegated these powers to the various executive agencies. Congress could have withheld such powers from the bureaus, but it declined to do so and through poor and inattentive legislation has passed on to these bureaus the power that Congress itself should be exercising.

A fair example of this wholesale delegation of powers of Congress is found in the Treasury Department. This department makes rules and regulations sometimes not only daily but hourly and these regulations have the force of law. The only way for an individual citizen to know what the law is, is to read the Federal Register which comes out every day. What was lawful yesterday is unlawful today. As soon as these regulations are published and they are published every night in the Government Printing Office, they become the law of the land. Who gave the Treasury Department any such complete and arrogant legislative powers? It was Congress and no one else. The Treasury Department has not in any way usurped this power but merely exercises its right under the authority of Congress. The authority, in many cases, is a positive command to exercise this power and to stay within the duties and obligations of its office, the Treasury is officially enjoined to make these laws.

Congress itself cannot complain because the various executive departments are actively engaged in making laws and doing what Congress itself should do. There is a grave question, too, whether Congress has the right to delegate general legislative powers.

Further delegation of these powers could be stopped at once if Congress would do so. The public should not condemn these autocratic bureaus—they should condemn Congress for creating such a situation.

The next complaint which is generally heard is that the Executive has assumed dictatorial powers. There is nothing about this situation that Congress cannot control any time it wants to. Bills are constantly coming before Congress to enlarge the powers of the President, and if Congress is not in accord, it can say "No." Suppose the President assumed powers he does not have, such as the engaging in war without the consent of Congress. What can be done to prevent it? How can the Chief Executive be stopped in this matter?

The framers of the Government had had a very sad experience with arbitrary power in Great Britain and threw off the yoke of this autocratic power so that when they themselves came to organize their own government, after a bloody revolution, they made sure that the people would never find themselves under the rule of autocracy.

The framers of our Government placed the great responsibility of preserving the people's government in the hands of those Members of the lower House of Congress by giving that body the complete control of the purse strings of the Nation. The framers put this trust in this body because they were nearest to the people and had to go before the people every 2 years to give an account of their stewardship. On this matter the Constitution reads:

Section 7, article I: All bills for raising revenue shall originate in the House of Representatives, but the Senate may propose or concur with amendments as on other bills.

Section 9, article I provides: No money shall be drawn from the Treasury, but in consequence of appropriations made by law; and a regular statement of accounts and receipts and expenditures of all public money shall be published from time to time.

The primary responsibility of checking the Executive or any other division of the executive branch rests, therefore, on the House of Representatives. Suppose the President, for example, should disobey constitutional limitations and engage in an activity which never had the approval of Congress, directly or indirectly? Even in that case, the President would be powerless to engage in the undertaking unless Congress appropriated the money, and if the House refused to pass such an appropriation, the Executive could be checked and stopped. This power the House of Representatives has and it is the strongest power belonging to any department of government. The responsibility for the maintenance of a free government is lodged in the lower House nearest to the people.

All the complaints written and heard about the powers that the President has taken away from Congress cannot be maintained. If that situation has developed whose fault is it? It is not the fault of the executive department. It is the fault of the House of Representatives of the United States of America. As Members of Congress we cannot with good grace join in this public clamor against the usurpation of powers by the President. We are at fault and no other body. If this lower House would stand up on its own feet and exercise the power which the Constitution gives it, no such charge of Executive usurpation could or would be made. We represent the people and the people expect us to protect them with this great power which has come down to us since the Constitutional Convention in Philadelphia in 1787.

Too much fault cannot, however, be found with the Members of the House of Representatives if extra powers are granted almost every day—especially those powers asked by the President. In a state of war or a condition bordering on all-out war the President, as Commander in Chief of the Nation, must have reasonable authority to act in the interest of the country and when war is actually here, democracy does not function in a normal manner. What we have a right to do in peacetime we have no right to do in time of war. We can do nothing that in any way interferes with the war effort, and the judge of that situation is the Commander in Chief. Members of the House, as a usual rule, vote just about the way that suits the people who elected them and if the real cause of stripping Congress of its constitutional powers is finally run down it will be found that the voters themselves are to blame. It is very infrequent that a Member of Congress will defy the will of the voters back home.

Applying this doctrine to the present situation, I can show how the powers of Congress are taken over. At the present moment, the President insists that we put an army into Western Europe without the consent of Congress. When that is done and a war actually starts, we are engaged in war which the Constitution says cannot be engaged in without the authority of Congress.

If I make a stand against the President's action and say we must obey the Constitution, what happens? Thousands of letters and telegrams come pouring in from North Dakota to support the President in anything he wants. These communications say, in substance, "No matter if the President is overriding the powers of Congress, the situation is grave and therefore support the President." What am I to do as a Representative of the people? If I follow my own judgment, I will not be a party to giving away those powers. I vote "No," and then the fur flies. I am branded in the papers as a misrepresentative of the people and the chances are good that I would be kicked out of Congress body and breeches at the next election. The average Congressman likes to stay in Congress, for what particular reason I do not know, and to stay in he follows the wishes of the people who bombard him with letters and messages. The powers are therefore taken away from Congress and turned over to the President, and who did it? The people did it. That is the reason why so many Congressmen vote away the powers of Congress—they are afraid not to—they are afraid of what the voters will do to them.

Those Members who do not feel that being in Congress is the most important thing in life, and that in some way they can eke out a meager existence outside Congress, stand up and vote their convictions. They refuse to turn over the powers of Congress to the Executive or anyone else. They defend the Constitution which they are sworn to do. They are not swerved by war hysteria or any other hysteria. These men may be censured, may be removed from office, and shunned as a citizen, but it is men of this stamp who have preserved our Government. These men can retire to private life with the full consciousness that they have done the right thing while in office and, after all, peace of mind and a clear conscience are more to be desired than anything the voters can offer.

Election of Governor of Alaska

OF

HON. HUGH BUTLER

OF NEBRASKA

Friday, March 30 (legislative day of Monday, March 26), 1951

Mr. BUTLER of Nebraska. Mr. President, I ask that there be printed in the RECORD a collection of editorials from Alaska newspapers endorsing the proposal I have made that Alaska be granted the right to elect its own Governor. They include an editorial from the Ketchikan Daily News of December 19, 1950, entitled "Why Not Election of Governor?"; an editorial from the Daily Alaska Empire of January 4, 1951, entitled "Elected Alaska Governor"; a column of comment from the Petersburg Press of January 5, 1951; and an editorial from the Sitka Sentinel of December 5, 1950. All of these newspapers are dailies except the Petersburg Press.

I call attention to the fact that all the daily newspapers in the Territiory, with the exception of two, have endorsed this proposal.

Along the same line, the Territorial House of Alaska has just adopted a memorial calling for enactment of my bill or similiar legislation. I do not yet have the text of this legislative memorial, but I have here a newspaper clipping from the Daily Alaska Empire, of Juneau, Alaska, for March 21, 1951, entitled "Elective Governor Approved," which announces final approval of this memorial.

In view of this wide-spread support within the Territory for the principle embodied in my bill, S. 105, I strongly believe that this Congress should take speedy action on it.

I might say that I understand that the Alaska House also feels that the Governor's successor, the Lieutenant Governor, or secretary, should likewise be made elective, and I would personally be glad to incorporate that change in my bill.

It is noteworthy, Mr. President, that the Alaska House while strongly endorsing this proposal for an elected Governor, specifically declined some weeks ago to go on record in favor of immediate approval of Alaska statehood.

There being no objection, the editorials and article were ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

[From the Ketchikan Daily News of December 19, 1950]

WHY NOT ELECTION OF GOVERNOR?

We understand that Delegate E. L. BARTLETT has announced his intention of opposing any bill which would give Alaskans the right to elect their own Governor on the grounds that it would interfere with Alaska's chances for immediate statehood.

Try as we will we cannot go along with this line of reasoning. In the first place our Delegate over 2 years ago pledged his unqualified support to such a bill only to pull strings to have it shelved at the first opportunity. If that bill had been acted on at that time Alaska today would have been working with a Governor elected by the people of the Territory and one who had their absolute trust and support. We do not believe that Delegate BARTLETT was working for the best interests of the people who elected him when he sabotaged the bill.

Now with the proposed statehood bill falling by its own weight and the bungling of those who claimed to be all out for it we find our duly elected Delegate again going all out to attempt to scuttle a bill giving us a chance to elect our own Governor on the grounds that such a measure would hurt our chances for statehood. We feel that Delegate BARTLETT is deliberately abandoning his obligation to the people of the Territory in order to keep Federal Appointee Ernest Gruening on the job. The results of the last election bear out the fact that Republicans and Democrats alike repudiated Governor Gruening for working against the best interests of Alaska and we predict that they will eventually repudiate BARTLETT for the same reasons if he continues on his present course.

In the first place the bill giving us the right to elect our Governor would not conflict or interfere with the statehood bill in any manner. Even if the 1951 Senate had a change of heart and voted approval of the statehood bill in January it would still require 2 or 3 or 4 years before the people of Alaska could elect a constitutional convention, draft and approve a state constitution, and receive favorable action from Congress on the work accomplished.

In the meantime, if the chance were given us to elect our own Governor, this work could be carried on under a man in whom the people have faith and trust. There would be nothing about the bill to prevent Ernest Gruening from filing as a candidate and giving the voters an opportunity to express an opinion about him, but we feel that they would reject him by a larger majority than any man has ever been rejected in Alaska's history. This is probably the reason why BOB BARTLETT is attempting to sabotage the bill.

Federally appointed Gov. Ernest Gruening in his long tenure in office has failed to lead Alaska forward to the position she should hold today. He has proven himself an adept politician and has created a powerful political machine at the expense of the taxpayers, but his attitudes and actions have strangled the industrial development of the Territory and divided its people.

There are men here in Alaska who have been here many years and who understand the problems of the country and have the ability to meet them in a forthright manner. Such men have the faith and confidence of the people, and voters should have the absolute right to choose one of them as governor.

BOB BARTLETT is aware of this fact, for he has told us so. We sympathize with his present position, for he is at the crossroads where he must choose between his loyalty to Gruening or his obligations to the people who voted him into office. We are sure that Alaskans will be watching his choice with interest, for they have a great deal at stake.

This much is certain: If BOB BARTLETT has legitimate reasons for opposing a bill granting Alaska the right to elect its own governor, the people will give him a close and a fair hearing. On the other hand they are not in the mood to accept the weak-kneed reasoning which was shown in the professional lobbying deal. We sincerely hope that Mr. BARTLETT continues to place the welfare of the people of Alaska above all other interests.

ELECTED ALASKA GOVERNOR

United States Senator HUGH BUTLER, of Nebraska, will reintroduce his bill in Congress amending the organic act to permit the election of the Governor in Alaska. A bill was introduced in the last Congress, but there was no opportunity for its being heard before the wind-up of the Eighty-first congressional session. Already there is heard in Alaska reports that this bill, the election of an Alaska Governor, will be fought by statehood supporters.

In regard to this important legislation Sid D. Charles, editor and publisher of the Ketchikan Daily News, editorially said, under the caption of "Why not election of governor," the following:

"We understand that Delegate E. L. BARTLETT has announced his intention of opposing any bill which would give Alaskans the right to elect their own Governor on the grounds that it would interfere with Alaska's chances for immediate statehood.

"Try as we will, we cannot go along with this line of reasoning. The results of the last election bear out the fact that Republicans and Democrats alike repudiated Governor Gruening for working against the best interests of Alaska and we predict that they will eventually repudiate BARTLETT for the same reasons if he continues on his present course.

[From the Petersburg Press of January 5, 1951]

With the new Eighty-second Congress now in session, the question of statehood for Alaska is again a live issue.

Much has been said about the advantages of statehood, some of it true, some of it distinctly untrue and still more conjecture.

The most ridiculous statements have been made up from the latter two categories. There have been slightly veiled threats made that if Alaskans are not given statehood they will "secede" from the United States. This is so obviously silly that no one up here even gives it a second thought. It is possible, however, that it might give concern to those Senators who are sincere in thinking it is dangerous to give statehood to "furriners" like us Alaskans. Incidentally, we've just been reading some early American history and find a remarkable parallel in the thinking of eighteenth century New England statesmen who believed honestly that the Union would be destroyed by the admission of the ignorant and illiterate outlanders from Kentucky and Tennessee.

In the category of conjecture is some of the argument we have heard that Alaska would contribute more to the defense of our country if it were a State. Some pretty silly propositions are being tied onto the tail of national defense kite. But we believe it is unjust to the loyal Alaskans who make up 99.44 percent of our population to claim they would love their country one bit more or defend it one whit more willingly if we were a State than if we are a Territory. Nor do we believe, despite a recent editorial we read to the contrary, that our country will toss us off the sleigh to the pursuing Russian wolves if the going gets bad. The North American continent is in this thing together and self-preservation of us all depends on mutual defense.

Statehood as an ideal is good. We hope it comes at such a time and in such a manner that we can afford it.

Meanwhile, we suggest that Congress get busy and give to us the right which even Puerto Rico has, to elect our own Governor. That would be a good beginning.

[From the Sitka Sentinel of December 5, 1950]

With the withdrawal yesterday of Senator Lucas' motion that the statehood bill for Alaska be considered by the Senate it would almost be a miracle if this question comes up again at this short session of Congress. Groundwork has been laid in both the House and Senate for its introduction when the next Congress convenes but after seeing its treatment by the Dixie Democrats there is little likelihood of either Alaska or Hawaii becoming states in the immediate future.

Puerto Rico was granted the right several years ago to elect its own Governor and more or less conducted its affair without interference from the Department of the Interior. Two years ago, Delegate E. L. BARTLETT promised to introduce a similar bill along with statehood, so that in the event statehood was defeated, Alaskans might have a chance at a greater measure of self-government.

Nothing has been heard concerning the fate of this measure but it appears certain it would receive support in the Territory both from those who favor statehood and those who oppose it. We believe such a measure should be introduced in the short session and pushed vigorously so that irrespective of what happens to any statehood bills in the future, Alaskans may have the privilege of selecting their own governor.

As many Alaskans felt the present statehood bill was deficient in a number of respects, retaining control of too large a portion of land and natural resources to the Government, the bypassing of the measure by the present Congress is something of a blessing. To those ardent adherents of statehood at any price, it is a serious blow.

If the Territory is granted the right to elect its own governor it would appear we might then have a chance to prove to the Doubting Thomases in Congress that Alaska is ready, politically, to assume its place in the Union.

ELECTIVE GOVERNOR APPROVED—HOUSE MEMORIAL SEEKING ACTION BY CONGRESS, PASSED 14 TO 10

(By Bob De Armond)

Hotly contested House Memorial 36, seeking action by Congress to allow Alaskans to elect their governor, won final approval last evening. The vote on passage of the memorial was 14 to 10.

When the memorial goes to Congress it will, at the request of Representative McCutcheon, carry a letter giving the vote on its passage. And at the request of other members of the house, the letter will give also the name, party affiliation, and the division represented, as well as the vote on the memorial of each member of the house.

Only one of many amendments offered from the floor was adopted. The amendment deleted from the memorial a reference to an elective governor bill now before Congress. Opponents of the memorial objected to the reference because a bill was introduced by Senator HUGH BUTLER, of Nebraska, whom they had labeled the greatest foe of statehood.

Democratic members of the house who had said earlier that they would probably vote for the memorial changed their position when Representative McCutcheon read a letter from Delegate E. L. BARTLETT, addressed to Curtis Shattuck, of Juneau.

"This memorial would be a mortal blow to statehood," the Bartlett letter said.

REPUBLICAN SUPPORT

In the final vote, the memorial was approved by all 10 Republican members of the house—Representatives Barnes, Johnson, Locken, Hendrickson, and MacKinnon from the first division; Laws from the second division; and Gasser, Miscovich, Stepovich, and Wilbur from the fourth division; and by all of the Democrats from the second and fourth divisions—Representatives Degnan, Franklin, Madsen, and Wells.

Voting against the memorial were the third division members of the house—Representatives Carlson, Conright, Egan, Kay, McCutcheon, Pollard, and Scavenius; and three members from the first division—Representatives Gundersen, Hope, and Metcalfe. All are Democrats.

VETO SUSTAINED

After hearing from Attorney General J. Gerald Williams, former Attorney General Henry Roden, and Attorney William L. Paul, Jr., in support of the Governor's veto of house bill 63, and Attorney Robert Boochever, and Banker Marshall Crutcher in support of the bill, the house sustained the veto.

The vote on passage of the bill notwithstanding the Governor's veto was 9 to 13, 7 short of the required two-thirds. Representative Stanley McCutcheon led the opposition to the veto in the house, as did his brother, Senator Steve McCutcheon, in the senate.

"I am sorry to find myself on the other side from the Governor," said Representative McCutcheon. "I very seldom get over on that side of the fence, but I fear the Governor has been misled by a letter written to him by William L. Paul, Jr. I find that much of the language of the veto message is similar to the language of the letter."

OTHER VETOES

Two other veto messages were received by the house during the evening, both on bills having to do with banking matters. Although the senate had voted to override both vetoes, house action on them was postponed until today.

The house voted 13 to 11 to table a senate bill providing for a salary increase for the commissioner of veterans' affairs. It also tabled by a 14-to-9 vote a senate bill setting up a Territorial department of lands under the department of taxation. Tax Commissioner M. P. Mullaney appeared before the house regarding the bill but was unable to convince a majority of the members that the department would be worth the $150,000 to $200,000 he estimated it would cost to operate it during the biennium.

SCHOOL CLOSURE

Passed by unanimous vote was senate bill 93, authorizing the board of education to close certain rural schools that the board feels could be partly supported locally. Dr. James Ryan, commissioner of education, told the house that several schools, including those at Homer, Dillingham, Bethel, and Wasilla, are larger than many schools in places that have incorporated and so assumed a part of the financial burden.

Another school bill, providing for the automatic creation of an independent school district when a municipality is incorporated within an incorporated school district was also passed unanimously.

Other senate bills approved by the house provide that the Alaska income tax will not be computed on Federal excess-profits taxes, enable the department of public welfare to extend its program to include aid to the blind and amend the law relating to suits brought by minority stockholders.

Also approved was a new senate bill making it mandatory that employees of the Territory, municipalities, and other subdivisions be covered by social security.

The house completed its work at midnight, having cleared its calendar of all except memorials and revenue and appropriation measures, which can be considered today and tomorrow.

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. WILLIAM BENTON

OF CONNECTICUT

IN THE SENATE OF THE UNITED STATES

Monday, April 2 (legislative day of Monday, March 26), 1951

Mr. BENTON. Mr. President, I should like to take a few minutes to express appreciation of the public service of Thomas B. McCabe, whose resignation as Chairman of the Board of Governors of the Federal Reserve System became effective at the end of March. He now again leaves the service of this Government with the respect and affection of all those who have been associated with him, and particularly those who have worked with him from day to day. He has made a significant contribution to the economic well-being of the Nation. I think it is well summed up in an editorial tribute which appeared in the Atlanta Constitution on March 17. The editorial said:

Because of its highly technical nature, Mr. McCabe's service to the Nation has been of a sort that could hardly be expected to attract wide public notice. Nevertheless, all of us will benefit from his contributions to a stable economy.

My personal regard and affection for Tom McCabe was nurtured nearly a decade ago when a small group of businessmen became convinced of the need for careful and intelligent planning to meet the economic problems which would arise after World War II. Some way had to be found to tap the vast storehouse of vitality, foresight, and experience of the business leaders of this country, and to weld together a constructive force to work cooperatively with the Government. Out of the discussions evolved the formation of the Committee for Economic Development. I was privileged to serve as vice chairman of the original Board of Trustees, of which Mr. McCabe was a member. With the exception of Paul Hoffman, Committee for Economic Development's great chairman whose distinguished record with the Economic Cooperation Administration has contributed so much to the moral and economic strength of our allies, no man contributed more to the formation and success of the Committee for Economic Development than Thomas B. McCabe.

Now Mr. McCabe joins Mr. Hoffman in returning to private life. The contribution of these two men, who worked with complete disregard for their personal interest, and who have devoted their energies to the national welfare during this postwar period, is deserving of the gratitude of the American public. Mr. McCabe served here in Washington during the war, as well, in varying roles. He administered the difficult lend-lease program, among other assignments. When I served in the State Department at the end of the war he patriotically assumed the responsibility of the disposal of surplus property, and surely there has been no more thankless job during the war or since.

After nearly 10 years as chairman of the board of directors of the Federal Reserve Bank of Philadelphia, 3 years or so ago, Tom McCabe answered the call of the President to serve as chairman of the board here in Washington. He brought to a difficult task a fresh approach to the problems and operations of the Federal Reserve System. His broad background of successful business experience—and he is one of the most respected men of the business community—and his previous experiences in responsible governmental positions enabled him to have an exceptional perspective both in national and international affairs. He had developed also his innate talents as a conciliator and peacemaker—a role that is difficult to play in public service. It was particularly fortunate that he possessed these atttributes and skill in negotiation in dealing with the particular problems of relationships between the Federal Reserve, with its responsibility for monetary and credit policy, and the Treasury, with its equally great responsibilities in the field of debt management. Tom McCabe's approach is to appraise objectively every problem in its true perspective and then to seek common and widespread agreement on the need for finding a satisfactory solution. He has that range of perspective which encompasses the horizons of the community as a whole, and not merely the immediate implications of the problem at hand.

Once having agreed on an ultimate objective, Tom McCabe has worked diligently and earnestly day in and day out, week after week, with a measure of patience and fortitude with which only few are endowed, to seek fair and reasonable compromise and agreement, to seek unity and harmony, and to find grounds for mutual accord, respecting the principles and objectives of each side.

The accord which was recently reached between the Treasury and the Federal Reserve exemplifies the success of this patient search for common ground in solving difficult problems. This was not a victory of one side over the other. It was a triumph of good sense on both sides—of statesmanship in its best meaning. Of this accord the March 10 issue of Business Week said:

> The announcement that the Treasury and the Federal Reserve Board have reached a full accord in their long-standing disagreement over how to reconcile a tighter credit policy with management of the public debt is exceedingly good news. Secretary Snyder and Federal Reserve Board Chairman McCabe are to be congratulated for their patience and persistence in trying to work out a reasonable solution of this difficult problem.

After pointing out that this accord obviated in large part, and perhaps entirely, the need for more drastic types of credit controls, the editorial added:

> Secretary Snyder and Chairman McCabe have had the statesmanship and good sense to save the financial system from that. It will remain for the financial community in general and the banking community in particular to give every encouragement to the working out of this new Treasury-Federal Reserve accord.

Under his direction and leadership, the Federal Reserve System, with its network of banks and branches reaching into every commercial area in the country, has continued to fulfill the mission and to serve the national interest as envisioned by Woodrow Wilson and Carter Glass who more than all others were responsible for the creation of this institution.

His role in the fight against inflation has been recognized throughout the country. He has emphasized again and again the dangers that threatened to engulf the Nation on the economic front. Time after time he warned that "you cannot maintain a defense program without a sound dollar." Conscious as he was of the way in which inflation destroys the value of the savings of the people, he has done all in his power to protect the integrity of the people's dollar at a time when its value was in peril. He is entitled to the gratitude of every man who has a savings account, a savings bond, a life insurance policy, or a stake in some retirement program. Yes; the American people. The American people are once more deeply in his debt.

Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that there be printed in the Appendix of the RECORD, a series of editorials which recognize the great work accomplished by Tom McCabe in this, the most recent chapter in his great and continuing career as one of America's most eminent public servants. When tough and difficult jobs are again to be done, I predict that Tom McCabe will once more be found in the saddle.

There being no objection, the editorials were ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

[From the Washington Star of March 18, 1951]

MR. MCCABE AND SUCCESSOR

The resignation of Thomas B. McCabe as Chairman of the Federal Reserve Board has come as something of a surprise. This probably is not justified, since Mr. McCabe has wanted for some time to return to private life. However, this resignation and the announcement that Assistant Secretary of the Treasury William McChesney Martin has been chosen to succeed him follow closely upon the compromise settlement of the dispute between the Treasury and the Federal Reserve. It is natural, therefore, that some people should wonder whether the Treasury point of view is to be imposed on the Federal Reserve through a change of Chairmen.

It is the Star's belief that there is no basis for such an apprehension. The Treasury-Reserve dispute, centering around the question of the extent to which the price (and interest rate) of Government bonds should be supported through the operations of the Open Market Committee, has been resolved on a reasonably satisfactory basis. The Federal Reserve view, in the main, has prevailed. It is true that Mr. Martin represented the Treasury in the negotiations, and presumably he was at least in general sympathy with the position that had been taken by Secretary Snyder. But there is no reason to suppose that he will attempt to reverse what has been accomplished if and when he assumes the chairmanship of the Board.

One reason for this belief is that Mr. Martin was wholeheartedly supported for the chairmanship by Mr. McCabe, and the latter certainly would not have given that support had he entertained any misgivings. Another reason lies in Mr. Martin's own integrity and competency. He will, of course, have to satisfy the Senate as to his philosophy with respect to credit policy. But if experience means anything, Mr. Martin is the right man for the job.

He has been president of the New York Stock Exchange, head of the Export-Import Bank and executive director of the International Bank for Reconstruction and Development. More importantly, he would bring to his new post both an extensive background of experience in the Treasury and a thorough understanding of the operations of the Federal Reserve. It is very doubtful that the President could have picked any man who is better equipped to carry on the fine work than Mr. McCabe has been doing.

[From the Philadelphia Evening Bulletin of March 16, 1951]

RESIGNATION WITH HONORS

The resignation of Thomas B. McCabe as Chairman of the Board of Governors of the Federal Reserve System at this time carries far more significance than it normally might.

For months he had been engaged in a tug of war with Secretary of the Treasury Snyder over Government fiscal policies. Mr. McCabe insistently upheld the independence of the Reserve Board and the responsibility with which it is charged by Congress to regulate the country's credit. In this he was fighting a desperate battle against inflation. An agreement finally was reached only 2 weeks ago on terms that were a victory for the chairman.

The agreement was widely interpreted as meaning that the administration belatedly realized that inflation must be stopped.

Heretofore it has dallied, and at times taken action which accelerated rather than put the brakes on inflationary pressures.

The extent of Mr. McCabe's victory is all the more apparent through the choice of his successor. Mr. Martin was recommended to the President by Mr. McCabe himself, and though he has been an assistant Secretary of the Treasury, has supported the Reserve Board's independence of Treasury domination.

Mr. McCabe has wanted for months to leave the exacting duties of Chairman and return to Chester as head of Scott Paper Co. But every time he made up his mind, a new crisis popped up. Now, with his position vindicated, he feels free to leave.

The country is deeply indebted to him for his services.

[From the Herald Tribune of March 17, 1951]

PEACE BY APPOINTMENT?

The contest between the Federal Reserve Board and the Treasury for undisputed leadership in national credit policy enters a fascinating new phase with the resignation of Mr. Thomas B. McCabe from the Board's chairmanship and the appointment in his place of Mr. William McChesney Martin Jr., brought over by Mr. Truman from a position as Assistant Secretary of the Treasury. The fact that Mr. McCabe has been replaced by a Treasury official naturally raises as many questions about the implications of the change for the Nation's credit policy as it does about Mr. McCabe's stewardship or Mr. Martin's qualifications for his new post. But credit policy cannot be considered apart from the men who make it, so interpretations of the policy implications of the present change must be based upon impressions of Mr. McCabe's record and Mr. Martin's qualifications.

It seems to us that the country has reason to be very grateful to Mr. McCabe for the meritorious service he has rendered as Board chairman and that it may take strong assurance in the appointment of Mr. Martin as his successor. Mr. McCabe deserves a large measure of personal credit for the fact that during the last long inflationary months of his tenure, the Federal Reserve Board has stood virtually alone among Federal agencies as one that understood the need for a consistent anti-inflation policy and was willing to take the initiative in attempting to enforce it. Again, Mr. McCabe can take satisfaction in having eased the conflict with the Treasury over interest-rate policy through his devotion to the methods of conciliation and rejection of tests of strength.

Mr. Martin is highly qualified for his new and difficult post. His intensive experience on both the private and public sides of financial operations is a matter of familiar record. In these matters he has acted as close student, operating participant, and administrator. He is credited with having played the leading role in the forging of the recent agreement under which the Treasury and the Reserve are now working. Under his chairmanship the Board should not only consolidate its authority in the field of credit control but should also, leading from this position of strength, be able to work constructively with the Treasury in the fulfillment of debt management needs. Such a prediction would appear to be much more reasonable than any more pessimistic one based simply on the fact of the new Board chairman's having come from the Treasury.

MR. MCCABE RESIGNS

In tendering his resignation to the President Chairman McCabe, of the Federal Reserve Board made it very clear that his resignation was not due to the feud between the Board and the Treasury. On the contrary, it is known that he has long wanted to return to his post as president of the Scott Paper Co., but was unwilling to quit until an agreement had been reached with the Treasury. Mr. McCabe has consistently emphasized the close relationship between monetary policy and debt management and the necessity of harmonizing those policies through constant cooperation between the Treasury and the Federal Reserve. His advocacy of consultation on a voluntary basis to settle, or rather prevent, disputes has undoubtedly been largely responsible for the recently announced accord. To be sure, many of the problems confronting the two agencies remain to be solved, but, given the will to cooperate, the differences can be settled through compromise.

The President says that Mr. McCabe may feel "justly proud" of his successful efforts to settle the dispute with the Treasury. He may. It should be added that Mr. McCabe will return to business with the good wishes of the host of friends he has made in Washington. He is a public-spirited citizen, selfless and dedicated, and he has the respect of all who have come in contact with him. To many who knew him well affection is united to respect.

William McChesney Martin, Jr., a former president of the New York Stock Exchange and the Export-Import Bank, now Assistant Secretary of the Treasury, has been nominated by the President to succeed Mr. McCabe. He is a worthy successor, admirably qualified for this important post because of his experience as an officeholder in close contact with financial groups and his reputation as a keen student of monetary and financial problems. The fact that he was one of the Treasury's principal representatives in the negotiation of the recent Federal Reserve-Treasury accord, and that his nomination was suggested by Mr. McCabe indicates that Mr. Martin can be relied upon to recognize the Board's responsibility for controlling an inflationary expansion of credit as well as its obligation to assist the Government in financing the defense effort. Assuming his nomination is confirmed, there is good reason to believe that the satisfactory relationships between the Board and the Treasury will continue to prevail.

MR. MARTIN'S APPOINTMENT

Ever since 1949, but especially since the first of this year, the Treasury and the Federal Reserve System have been locked in controversy over the basic question of whether fiscal convenience should be the overriding consideration in the determination of credit policy, or whether it should be subordinated to the general requirements of the Nation's monetary and economic stability. A fortnight ago, faced with the possibility of a congressional directive providing that all such disputes be resolved in favor of the Federal Reserve, the Treasury agreed to a truce on terms which represented at least a 75 percent victory for its adversary. Now comes the unexpected announcement that Thomas B. McCabe, chairman of the Reserve Board, is resigning and that President Truman has named as his successor an Assistant Secretary of the Treasury, William McChesney Martin.

In view of the fact that in the recent past Mr. Truman had mistakenly, if perhaps understandably, identified himself with the cause of the Treasury in this dispute, it would be easy to construe the present move as an overt act on the part of the White House and as a violation of the 2-week-old truce. But such an interpretation would, in our opinion, be decidedly superficial. The nomination may have represented a mischievous thrust at those congressional leaders who had thrown their support behind the Reserve Board, but hardly a malicious one. For, while Mr. Martin would go to the Reserve Board as a graduate of the Treasury Department, his background in the field of finance is a broad one and, for the man of 44, a deep one. As a matter of fact, long before he earned the title of "boy wonder" of finance by ascending to the presidency of the New York Stock Exchange at the tender age of 31, young Martin, had already been steeped in the lore of central banking, for his father had been one of the original governors of the Nation's 12 Regional Reserve banks when the System began operations. Since leaving New York's financial district, and an excellent record as head of the Nation's largest securities market, Mr. Martin has continued to carve out a successful career in Washington in such key posts as head of the Export-Import Bank and, more recently, executive director of the International Bank for Reconstruction and Development. Moreover, his present nomination has the complete approval of Mr. McCabe, outgoing chairman of the Reserve Board.

Needles to say, Mr. Martin's qualifications do not exempt him from the obligation to satisfy Congress as to his philosophy regarding Federal Reserve-Treasury relationships. Moreover, assuming—as we do—that he will more than adequately meet this test, we wish to repeat what we have said before. Neither that fact nor anything else that has occurred to date lessens the desirability or importance of congressional action to the Douglas resolution clearly defining the powers of the Reserve and the Treasury.

[From the Atlanta Constitution of March 17, 1951]

MR. MCCABE'S OUTSTANDING SERVICE TO THE COUNTRY

The country owes a great debt to Thomas B. McCabe, who has resigned as Chairman of the Board of Governors of the Federal Reserve System, effective at the end of this month.

Mr. McCabe has been a leader of those on the Board who have insisted, despite contrary pressure from the President and the Treasury, that the interest rate on Government securities be increased as a means of reducing credit inflation. Most economists have supported this position.

The dispute, which has persisted for months, finally has been resolved in a compromise which Mr. McCabe believes satisfactory. Having accomplished that, he has decided to fulfill a long-standing desire to return to private business.

Because of its highly technical nature, Mr. McCabe's service to the Nation has been of a sort that could hardly be expected to attract wide public notice. Nevertheless, all of us will benefit from his contributions to a stable economy. We join in wishing him well on his well-earned retirement from public life.

A Code for Conduct of Congressional Investigations

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. ESTES KEFAUVER

OF TENNESSEE

IN THE SENATE OF THE UNITED STATES

Monday, April 2 (legislative day of Monday, March 26), 1951

Mr. KEFAUVER. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to have printed in the Appendix a thoughtful article by Walter Lippmann, as it appeared in the Washington Post of April 2, 1951. Mr. Lippmann discusses the need of a code for the conduct of congressional investigating committees, especially in view of the emergence of television as a new and remarkable medium of public information.

The code should not only contain rules with reference to the use of television, radio, and news reels, but should contain provisions relative to appearance of counsel with witnesses, cross-examination of witnesses, and allowing anyone whose name has been brought out in a hearing to refute, explain, or enlarge upon the testimony referring to him.

I do not agree with Mr. Lippmann's view that television should be ruled out until it has proven itself. I think it has done this already. But in any event, many problems relative to its use need to be considered.

The Senator from Wisconsin [Mr. WILEY] has submitted a resolution for such a study. This resolution should have our early consideration.

There being no objection, the article was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

TODAY AND TOMORROW

(By Walter Lippmann)

ON THE TELEVISION PROBLEM

Senator KEFAUVER is, no doubt, well aware that the work of his committee is likely to be remembered the longest because the hearings were broadcast by television.

Suddenly many questions about television and public affairs, which before that had been regarded as theoretical, have become practical and urgent. These questions will now be threshed out in the courts, in Congress, and in other legislatures. They will be studied in the universities. They will be reported and discussed in the press and on the radio and the television networks themselves.

Long after only the oldest reporters can still remember who Frank Costello was, or even Virginia Hill, Senator KEFAUVER'S name may remain connected, like Lord Sandwich's and a quick lunch, with the grandeur and the miseries of conducting public affairs in front of the television audience. The Senator can, however, avert this dreadful fate.

He has only to recognize publicly and thoroughly what I cannot but assume he feels—that the passionate interest of such an immense audience is not in itself the answer to any problem, like lawbreaking, and that in fact it poses problems which may be just as dangerous in a free society as the lawbreaking which his committee has exposed. Mr. KEFAUVER can do what few other men in Congress are so well qualified to do. He can take the leading part in getting Congress to adopt Senator WILEY'S resolution and then in defining and debating the great issues of public policy which television is raising.

These questions are subtle, complex, and elusive. Our whole experience with television is limited. The development of television is difficult to forecast. Nothing can and nothing will be decided finally now. Nonetheless decisions, however provisional, have to be taken now. They are unavoidable. If Congress, for example, let matters drift, allowing each committee to decide for itself whether it wished its hearings televised, and when and by what company and under what commercial sponsor, that would in effect be a decision of policy which could easily have, and would tend to invite, the gravest abuses. If the television company were reluctant, perhaps because it did not think that 20,000,000 people would be interested in that particular hearing, the temptation would be strong to make the hearing interesting to an audience of 20,000,000.

Since only so small a part of the whole work of any committee, and only an infinitesimal part of the work of all of the committees, can be broadcast, the selection of what is to be televised invites the exercise of a power over what the people shall know that no editor of a free newspaper could, or would dream of, exercising.

In a newspaper there is of course a selection of the news by the editor and of what importance is to be given to different kinds of news. But much is printed each day that not every reader reads. Because this can be done, it is a violation of the professional standards of journalism not to publish at all, even obscurely, the news which is necessary to a fair judgment. But with television an event is broadcast or it is ignored: either it is in enormous headlines or it is nowhere at all. This power to choose what the great mass of the people shall see and what they shall not see of public affairs is altogether too great to be left to the judgment of a few television companies and to private arrangements made by committees and commercial sponsors and the companies.

It will be said, and I would agree, that Congress and the rest of us do not yet know enough to formulate a policy and to lay down a code of rules. What then ought we to wish to see done now, in this interim, when television is technically and economically prepared to do much broadcasting of public affairs but when on all the questions of law and policy and morals we are quite unprepared?

We must make up our minds. We can let her rip and see what comes of the enterprise of the broadcasting of politicians who like to be televised and the reaction of the audiences. Or we can take a position which, I admit, is at the other extreme—though I believe it to be the wisest. That is to prohibit for the time being the broadcasting of any of the hearings of Congress which have to do with investigation, and should therefore be judicial in character, or with the making of policy, and should therefore be deliberative in character.

No one, presumably, is going to ask that the proceedings of courts or the sessions of Congress be opened now to television, that is to say, to being broadcast when and only when they provide a good show. Is there any good reason why the same rule should not apply to committees when they are debating grave issues of national policy and when they should be thinking of their responsibility and not acting to an audience? And should not the rule apply to committees even more obviously when they are acting as a tribunal, and exercising the power to make or break men, as in a grand jury, or in a trial court or an appellate court?

I would not argue that this rule is the last word on the subject but only that it is better than the anarchy which is now ahead of us if we take no position at all. We shall have to work out a public policy. In the meantime the best thing to do is to put the burden of proof on the newcomer, and to make him do what all useful innovators have always had to do, that is to say, to prove that he has earned his rights because he has defined and established his duties.

A Report From Europe

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. HUBERT H. HUMPHREY

OF MINNESOTA

IN THE SENATE OF THE UNITED STATES

Monday, April 2 (legislative day of Monday, March 26), 1951

Mr. HUMPHREY. Mr. President, recently Mr. John Cowles, publisher of the Minneapolis Star and Tribune, made an extended tour of Europe, and has prepared a series of articles entitled "A Report From Europe." These articles appeared in recent March issues of the Minneapolis Star. I ask unanimous consent that there be printed in the Appendix of the RECORD the articles entitled "Red Imperialism, Not Communism, Is Basic Threat"; "Aid to Franco? Yes; If Needed To Resist Reds"; and "'Unified' Set-up in Our Foreign Affairs Urged."

There being no objection, the articles were ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

RED IMPERIALISM, NOT COMMUNISM, IS BASIC THREAT

American security is threatened, it seems to me, not by communism as such but by Russian Communist imperialism. That is, I believe, a distinction of importance.

The present Russian aggression is the bastard child of traditional, expansionist Pan Slavism, sired by a dynamic revolutionary movement.

The basic threat is Russian imperialism. It uses foreign Communist dupes as a fifth column for subversion. Communism as a political philosophy or religion has been so appealing to many of its converts that they have been willing to act as traitors. They have deluded themselves that they were thereby helping bring about an eventual social utopia.

Actually by betraying their country they were simply aiding Russia in its imperialistic attempt to conquer the world. But it is Russia, not communism as such, that is the real menace.

If we will come to accept and recognize this distinction, the course that we should follow in dealing both with Russian imperialism and with communism elsewhere will be much clearer. Our foreign policy will be more effective.

The chance that we can win the struggle without having to fight world war III will be infinitely greater.

Of paramount importance in Europe today is the fact that Tito, who insists that he is as good a Communist as, or even a better one, than Stalin, has recognized that the Kremlin has been using world communism as a mask to conceal Russian imperialism. Tito, as a nationalistic Yugoslav, has defiantly revolted against the concept that Russian imperialism should rule the globe.

Tito's precepts and example are opening the eyes of the Communists in other countries. "Deviationism"—the refusal to let the Kremlin lay down the line which every Communist must unquestioningly accept—is spreading everywhere.

The recent revolt of the two Italian Communist intellectual leaders may prove to be worth more to the free world in its fight to save Western Europe than the two additional American divisions for General Eisenhower's army would be.

There are many signs that Communist deviation is developing in France and Germany. That means that the Communist parties in those countries may gradually cease to serve blindly as a fifth column for Russian imperialism.

The current purge in Czechoslovakia demonstrates that even behind the iron curtain there is serious deviationism. Intelligence reports also indicate that the Kremlin is having similar trouble in other satellite countries.

Since Russian imperialism—not communism as a political philosophy—is the immediate threat to the free world, it seems clear to me that our foreign policy should be directed toward actively strengthening those, whether Communist or not, who are resisting the Kremlin.

That should mean prompt and liberal aid, food and gasoline, military supplies and planes for Tito's Yugoslavia.

Although Yugoslavia is a ruthless dictatorship, Tito and his Cabinet have recently, however, done various things that are at least gestures in the general direction of constitutional parliamentarism and civil liberties.

A few months ago the British Ambassador gave each member of Tito's cabinet a copy of George Orwell's novel, 1984. Several, after reading it, but without referring to similar conditions that existed in Yugoslavia, commented that it was like Russia.

Shortly thereafter the Yugoslav Government issued edicts reducing the length of time that a prisoner could be held without a formal trial, and expunging from the list of crimes that of having treasonable thoughts.

The British are currently serializing Orwell's novel, 1984, in their newspaper in Vienna. The book has already been reprinted in various other middle European papers and is said to have had a wide effect on public opinion toward Russia.

As Americans come to realize that it is Russian imperialism that is the immediate threat to the Western World, and that communism as such is a grave danger to our way of life here in America only to the extent that its disciples are used by the Kremlin as Russian agents or as a subversive fifth column, the answer to the question as to how we should deal with communism in Asia also becomes clearer.

In Europe, no country has gone Communist except Russia, until after it had first been occupied by the Russian Army.

In southeast Asia, although Communist agents have played a part, most of the uprisings and revolutions have sprung from the grass roots. They have been largely indigenous. The rule of the white man had broken down in Asia.

Over the past generation the Asiatics, through increased education, have come to realize that the people of the Western World have a far higher standard of living than theirs.

They have also come to believe that European colonialism—foreign exploitation—was largely responsible for the poverty and misery in which they existed. They have learned from us the idea of national self-determination and the concept of social justice.

Hundreds of millions of Asiatics aspired to a better life and felt they could get it only by revolution. Communist agents exploited these Asiatic grass roots revolts and told the people that what they wanted was communism.

Instead of assuming that we must use armed force everywhere in southeast Asia to try to suppress genuine grass roots revolutions regardless of whether or not they are nominally called Communist, we should rather, it seems to me, through ECA and point 4 aid attempt to lead the southeast Asiatics away from the Kremlin's control and to increase their friendship for America.

Aid To Franco?—Yes: If Needed To Resist Reds

Last month both the United States and Britain sent Ambassadors to Spain, their first in nearly 5 years.

Although General Franco's regime is not quite as harsh as it was when we originally withdrew our Ambassadors, Spain remains as totalitarian a state as ever. The change in American and British policy stems solely from the fact that in the supreme struggle with Russian Communist imperialism, we want such help as Spain may be able and willing to give.

A glance at the map of Europe and North Africa shows that Spain's geographic position is of extraordinary strategic importance.

If the Russians should overrun Western Germany, the Low Countries, and France, it might be possible to stop them at the Pyrenees, the high mountain range which constitutes Spain's northern border.

That possibility cannot be officially discussed, however, without its doing serious harm to our efforts to instill self-confidence and a determination to resist in the French, Belgians, Dutch, and even the West Germans.

If they should get the idea that American strategy was based on, or contemplated, a retreat behind the Pyrenees, it would be impossible to inspire them to make the military effort that is necessary for the successful defense of Western Europe.

So far our negotiations with General Franco have been tentative and exploratory. No one questions that the Spaniards would fight with intense bravery if the Russians should overrun France and attempt to invade Spain.

But it is more than doubtful that Franco would join the North Atlantic Pact if an invitation were conditioned on Spain's sending some troops to Western Germany, for example, as a contingent in the international defense force General Eisenhower is organizing.

Today Spain, with a population of 29,000,000, has the largest standing army in Western Europe. Estimates as to its size range from 15 to 22 divisions. It is tough and well-trained but extremely badly equipped. If weapons could be provided, the Spanish Army could be doubled or tripled in size.

But unless Franco should prove willing to send some divisions out of Spain, common sense would seem to dictate that most of whatever military equipment the United States can give others in the next year or two had better be devoted to arming those forces that would be in immediate battle if the Russians started west.

Spain is extremely poor. The Economic Commission for Europe recently estimated that it takes almost 50 percent more hours of work for the average Spaniard to earn food for his family than is the case even in impoverished Italy. The average Spaniard's standard of living is about half what it was before the Spanish civil war.

While the Spaniards would welcome economic aid from the United States, they are an extraordinarily proud and stubborn and isolated people and might even reject gifts to which any conditions whatsoever were attached.

Recently the Export-Import Bank advanced Spain $12,500,000 to build a large fertilizer plant, but according to reports in Madrid an additional credit of $50,000,000 has not been made available because Franco has declined to agree that he will spend it in ways which the Washington authorities think would prove of permanent benefit to Spain's economy. (On March 16, the Export-Import Bank announced a $5,000,000 credit to Spain for the purchase of wheat because of a temporary shortage prior to the Spanish harvest.)

Now that Stanton Griffis has been sent to Madrid as American Ambassador, perhaps the two countries will become mutually more understanding.

Spain is still a complete dictatorship, but that fact alone should not prevent us from furnishing the Spaniards aid if it seems militarily advisable, any more than should the fact that Yugoslavia is a Communist dictatorship deter us from helping Tito resist Russia.

At the end of the Spanish civil war, Franco shot thousands of the Republican troops and sentenced to long prison terms most of the others, including some boys aged 12, who could not prove that they had been forced to join the Republican armed forces. Almost all of them, some 250,000, have now been conditionally released, but with a few exceptions they cannot vote, hold office, practice a profession, or hold most jobs above that of common labor.

For any offense they can be reimprisoned without trial to serve the remainder of their original military sentences.

Although there is undoubtedly widespread hostility and bitterness toward the Franco regime throughout Spain, there is no way of determining its extent. Several thousand labor leaders are in jail, and no opposition of any kind to Franco is permitted. Some observers think that there is a sizable underground Communist organization, but most say that the great majority of the people—even though they may detest Franco's regime—much prefer it to a new civil war.

The Spanish peseta has been steadily declining in value. Just as the French are doing in Morocco, rich Spaniards are investing in new office buildings and apartment houses in Madrid as a hedge against inflation.

Spanish railroads are in bad shape, both as to road bed and equipment. Many of the highways would have to be improved and bridges strengthened before heavy military equipment could be moved across Spain.

Perhaps it would be wise for the United States to give Spain some military equipment of the type that would be most valuable in stopping a Russian land invasion if worst came to worse and the Soviets should overrun Western Germany and France. Presumably the only places where any ground forces could hope successfully to invade Spain would be at the two ends of the Pyrenees, near the sea. They are limited in area and with modern weapons would appear to be relatively easy to defend.

It may be advisable to give Spain artillery and equipment for that purpose, and funds for the construction of additional, and the lengthening of present, air strips in Spain, so that part of our Air Force could, on short notice, if necessary, be based in Spain. That would also involve constructing port installations and making transportation improvements, so that gasoline and supplies could be got to our fliers without delay.

But at this stage of the cold war, the United States has neither the billions of dollars that would be required to rehabilitate Spain's whole economy nor the spare military equipment with which to modernize the entire Spanish Army, if it is to be kept permanently in Spain, nearly 1,000 miles from where the Russians would presumably first attack.

"Unified" Set-up in Our Foreign Affairs Urged

The United States has a real chance of winning the struggle with Communist Russia without an all-out war, but doing it will for many years require perserverance and wisdom as well as courage.

In addition to maintaining our own armed defenses in a state of alert and adequate preparedness, and helping see to it that the rest of the free world does the same, we will have to spend billions of dollars in the next decade in backward parts of the globe to reduce the likelihood of their falling under the Kremlin's control.

Our Government is not now properly set up to deal with international problems of the kind we must face. Our foreign economic affairs are being dealt with by a dozen uncoordinated separate governmental departments and agencies. Sometimes they even work at cross purposes.

Our operations in the foreign field consequently are far less effective and much more expensive than they need to be.

Even with an efficient Government set-up, we are going to have to spend such large amounts abroad that at best we will have difficulty in avoiding income-tax rates so high that incentives are stifled.

One big improvement would be relatively simple. Congress should reorganize the State Department set-up so that a new division of it would have full responsibility for all governmental foreign economic operations. There should be three separate divisions in the State Department with the Secretary of State, the Undersecretary, and several Assistant Secretaries having jurisdiction over all three.

These three subdivisions should be, first, a Department of Foreign Political Affairs; second, a Department of Foreign Economic Operations; and, third, a Department of Foreign Information.

The first subdivision, or Department of Foreign Political Affairs, should have the same function as the present Department of State has traditionally performed.

The second subdivision, or Department of Foreign Economic Operations, should have direct responsibility for and full authority over all of the Government's international economic negotiations and over all economic operations abroad.

We now have a dozen different departments or agencies dealing with foreign governments, with little or no coordination. As a result, hundreds of millions of dollars are being wasted. We are accomplishing much less than would be possible were all our foreign economic programs unified.

Even though all State Department cables sent abroad go out under the signature of the Secretary of State and all incoming cables bear the signature of the American Ambassador, no Secretary or Ambassador can personally read even a small fraction of them.

An aggressive underling representing, say, the Department of Agriculture or Interior or Treasury may now frequently be able to persuade the State Department to transmit to an Embassy abroad a message written by him, but bearing the Secretary of State's name, even though it may put far more emphasis on some minor point than the subject conceivably merits, while far more vital matters may receive little attention.

Representatives of various other Government departments also themselves go abroad, negotiate with foreign governments, and carry on economic operations without the State Department controlling their activities.

The range of economic matters which our current international activities cover is enormous. ECA in South Asia. Oil in the Middle East. Arms and supplies for the North Atlantic Pact countries. Tin in Malaya. Economic aid for Yugoslavia. Food for India. Point 4 development of backward areas. Wool purchases in Australia. Air bases. Broadcasting stations. Import-Export Bank loans. Shipping and aviation. Preclusive buying. Purchase of critical materials. International allocations of things in short supply.

These and hundreds of operations like them should all be coordinated through one division of the State Department, that of Foreign Economic Operations, where the relative importance of each could be ascertained and relative priorities as to attention and degree of pressure be given.

The information and advice of the specialists and experts in the other Government departments and agencies should, of course, continue to be used, but operations should be coordinated and funneled through a new State Department subdivision.

There may be, for example, 200 different things that we want Great Britain or its colonies to do for us. They may have 200 other things that they would like us to do for them. All our requests and theirs should be coordinated, where they could be handled more quickly and their relative importance weighed.

The third subdivision of the reorganized State Department should be the Department of Foreign Information, combining the Voice of America and all our many different foreign informational and propaganda activities.

Billions of dollars will be saved because of the enactment by Congress a couple of years ago of the law unifying the armed services. Instead of a completely separate Army, Navy, and Air Force, we now have one coordinated Defense Establishment. In addition to the monetary savings, our present new national Defense Establishment set-up has increased the effectiveness of our over-all security.

We need a similar reorganization of the Department of State, so that it, through a new Department of Foreign Economic Operations, will have direct responsibility for and control of all of the Government's international economic operations.

Rural Electrification

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. LYNDON B. JOHNSON

OF TEXAS

IN THE SENATE OF THE UNITED STATES

Monday, April 2 (legislative day of Monday, March 26), 1951

Mr. JOHNSON of Texas. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to have printed in the Appendix of the RECORD, an address by the senior Senator from Oklahoma [Mr. KERR] on January 30, 1951, at Cleveland, Ohio, at the annual convention of the National Rural Electrification Association.

There being no objection, the address was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

Thank you, President Clark, my good friend Walter Harrison, Clyde Ellis, distinguished officers, directors, and friends, our good friend Claude Wickard, and my fellow Americans. It is a privilege to be presented to you by my fellow Oklahoman, Clark McWhorter. There is no one here any more aware than I of my unworthiness of the wonderful things that he said about me, but, Clark, I want to assure you that there is no one here that would have been any worse disappointed than I, had you not said them.

It is a pleasure to be here with this fireball, Clyde Ellis. It is not a great deal of credit to a man in the Congress from the southwestern part of the United States to be for rural electrification. If he wasn't, Clyde Ellis would make the place where he sits down so warm that he'd soon get so tired that he'd be willing to go along with Clyde and do what he wanted to do just to get a little rest once in a while.

I certainly was thrilled at the sight of those lovely young ladies that were queens and near queens, and I understand now, Clark, why it was you told me that you were making arrangements to serve another year. Of course, I am not surprised that you have increased the number of your queens.

I remember the story of the American soldier in England who fell in love with and asked a lovely English girl to marry him. And he did such a splendid job of it, she was trying to express her appreciation at the same time she was telling him "Yes," and finally she said to him, "I wish you'd explain to me how it is you American boys are so courteous and so considerate of women, seeing that in America you have no queens."

"Ah," he said, "You don't understand." He said, "Here in England, you have one queen—but in my country every woman is a queen."

I did notice this though, Clyde, those young ladies probably are not old enough to vote for me—but I guess I will still be running when they are.

I ought to pay my tribute to the women who are here and say like these other men, "I, too, am on your side." They do have a vote in your convention, don't they, Clark? I have never seen a convention yet but what they were the majority whether they had a legal vote or not. You know, I learned a long time ago what some fellows don't learn until they are too old to do them any good.

An old fellow went to see his grandson, a kid about 8 years old, and the kid, who hadn't seen him in a long time, didn't recognise him; and it nearly broke the old fellow's heart.

"Why," he said, "But, don't you know me?"

The kid said, "No, I don't."

"Why," he said "I'm your granddad."

"Now," said the boy, "That's funny. There has been a fellow around here all my life that I have called 'Granddad'," he said, "but it wasn't you." And he said, "They never told me that granddads come in pairs."

"Well," said the old fellow, "But, it's this way. You see, I am your granddad on your father's side."

"Oh," the boy said, "it's that way. But if you aim to stay here and do well, you'll have to get on the other side."

He was like the old fellow that had the experience of marrying and losing his wife and then falling in love with another fine woman. He proposed to her, and she accepted him, and he said, "Now, I want to make a request of you." He said, "You know I was married before."

She said, "Yes."

He said, "That is over and gone, but I have a very sentimental heart." And he said, "I can never fail to remember with some affection the one who is gone, and with your permission I have her hat that I loved the best, and I'd like to put it up here on the shelf in this closet in our room and just keep it as a memento of other days."

And she said that was all right and they got along fine, but in a few years she, too, passed away, and before too long he went through the same experience with another lovely lady and after she had responded with an affirmative reply to his request that she marry him, he told her the same thing.

He said, "You know, I'd like to keep here on this shelf as a memento of that second wonderful woman who blessed me by being my wife this lovely hat of hers, and as I look upon it, it will freshen my memory and restore my sentiments."

And so that fine lady agreed, but in due course of time she, too, passed away, and he went through the same identical experience and the same identical speech with number three. But I'll tell you right now she had learned more than the others.

She said, "All right, big boy, you can put that hat up there with the other two if you want to. But I want to tell you right now that the next hat that goes on that shelf will be a derby."

You know I was thinking, Clark, as I was sitting here at this great convention of rural electrification, what a magnificent crowd this is, what a fine looking bunch of men and women are here in this great assembly that has seen so many wonderful assemblages. I want to tell you, though, it is something, as you think about other assemblages that have been here. I understand in this very hall Republican national conventions have chosen their nominees for President. But as you look out over this crowd tonight, Claude, can you see that they look any less prosperous or any less handsome even than a Republican national convention? And I want to assure you that they are a dog-gone sight smarter, and it just proves that in this wonderful age of rural electrification that folks are as good as people, or anybody else.

And I want to say this, as I think about this great setting here: The only thing that I know of that would improve it, Clark, would be if we could just fix it so that the electricity were furnished by the Southwestern Electric Cooperative, of Tipton, Okla., or maybe the Kiamichi Electric Cooperative, from over in eastern Oklahoma. I believe the lights would be a little brighter.

And I want to say that I am grateful to my fellow Oklahomans who are here and who have been so very, very wonderfully kind, and as I think about this great convention I wonder if there is anybody here who ever had an experience similar to the good woman down at Nevada, Mo. The rural-electrification program was completed, the houses were wired, the equipment purchased, and the current was turned on late one afternoon. Then after a while some of the good women got together and they were talking about their experience and what it was that impressed them the most about the coming of electricity to their homes.

One of the women said, "I'll tell you right now, when I cooked on my new electric stove it was the most wonderful experience that I had ever had."

Another one said, "Now, I'll just tell you right now, it was the washing machine that I enjoyed the most." She said, "It was the first time the clothes were ever cleaned at my house that I didn't do it with that old up-and-down motion on the washboard."

Another one said, "Well, the thing I love about it is the electric ice box. Imagine keeping the food so fresh and so fine for so many days."

Finally, one good lady, a little old lady, who hadn't said a word, spoke up and she said, "Well, I'll tell you I liked the ice box and the washing machine and all that. But," she said, "the greatest thrill I had was just sitting there that evening and looking at pa." She said, "I hadn't seen him after dark for years."

You know, as we think about the progress of our country, it is not difficult to find the secret. Our country belongs to the people. The country's progress is the people's progress, and the people's progress is the country's progress. As we think about the things that we do—as we think about the effort that is required—we are thankful that we live in an age when there is power, when there are agencies, when there are elements available to us that do work in addition to what we can do with our hands. One man plus electricity may do the work of 10 men, or a hundred, or a thousand, and I say this to you—that one of the great differences between this magnificent country of ours and others is that we have available the means of accomplishing and working with other than just the hands and the physical power of our people.

I say to you that many things contributed to this Nation's emerging victorious from World War I and World War II, but I know of nothing that made a greater contribution than the abundant power—electric power—available in our country. Yes; power in the factories and the mills; but just as important, and maybe more so, was the power on the farm. We have seen the amazing transformation of a mighty nation, where once 7 of 10 families lived on the farm, until today less than 2 out of 10 of the families live on the farms. And yet the production is greater because of the progress, the scientific development, and the increase in the amount that each unit of manpower can produce.

And one of the great contributing factors to that amazing development is electric power—electric power—and it is so marvelous when we think about how short a period of time has seen so much of this development. I don't see any women here old enough to remember when there wasn't power available on the farms, but I see a lot of men who are, and if you want to know the difference, you talk to these men and they'll tell you how it was. Why, it has been but short time ago that public power was unknown in this land. When you think about it—development of public power in so brief a time, and the contribution it had made to the peacetime development and the wartime strength of a mighty nation, truly we pause in awe and wonder and also to give our silent thanks that such a great blessing has come to our people.

I say this to you, that rural electrification has been more of an emancipation proclamation for the farm women of America than Lincoln's proclamation back yonder more than 80 years ago was to the slave population of the South. And America will not have come into her own until electrification has been taken to every farm home in the land, not only the poles and the lines up to the doors of the farm homes, but an abundance of cheap power available through those lines.

I could not go further without pausing a moment. I was impressed by the tribute paid here a little while ago to the great man whose picture we see there. I am aware of the contribution made by so many of you, here tonight, and by the countless thousands across the length and breadth of our land in this great program. But I am reminded that today at noon a new record was established by the man serving as Speaker of the House of Representatives. As the noon hour passed, SAM RAYBURN had served as Speaker of the House of Representatives for a longer period of time than any other man in the history of the Nation, and I know of no man who has made a greater contribution to rural electrification. And so far as I am concerned he can continue to serve there the rest of a very long and useful life.

Man versus the forces that he has had to fight has brought into dramatic picturization the value of the utilization of power—the value of the team of man plus power. Man plus power has played a great part in building the richest, the most powerful nation on the earth. Man plus power has had a vital role in bringing this mighty Nation victorious through two World Wars.

And I want to say this to you tonight, my fellow Americans, man plus power, plus the unquenchable, unconquerable spirit of America, is winning the present world-wide struggle against the powers of darkness. As you and I think about the history of our Nation—as we think of that day back yonder nearly 200 years ago when a little group of 3,000,000 people banded themselves together under the provisions of a document that says, "We the people of the United States of America"—when that limited number had the courage to look the world in the face and declare themselves a free and independent government—when they had the courage to look their own sons and daughters in the face and say, "We are launching here an experiment to the success of which we are dedicating our lives, our fortunes, and our sacred honor." When we think of what they did—with their limited resources—we are impressed by the fact that they had a vast abundance of faith, of undying courage.

Well, if those 3,000,000 with their limited means, with their meager resources, with the wilderness beyond the mountains to their backs and with almost an unknown sea to their front, could lift the flag of freedom and set their feet on the pathway that led to liberty and justice, I want to ask you tonight of what should 153,000,000 Americans be afraid?

When we think of the vast material wealth and power—when we realize tonight that ours is the greatest, the strongest, the richest, the most highly productive Nation on the earth, when we know that here in our land man has reached his greatest zenith of production and progress, scientific development and knowledge, freedom, liberty, and justice, of what should this mighty Nation be afraid?

Ah, there are many things that gird us with undying courage—but high on the rank is the knowledge of the vast and abundant quantity of electric power, and the knowledge that as the decades come, we will add to it manyfold. We are grateful for vast deposits of coal; we are grateful for the great abundance of oil and gas, those amazing fuels and sources of power; but I would remind you that when the last ton of coal shall have been mined and burned—when the last barrel of oil shall have been pumped and consumed—when the last cubic foot of gas shall have been produced and used—this Nation may still have a never-ceasing source of heat and light and power from the development of its hydroelectric possibilities.

When your forebears and mine started westward across this Nation, they were looking, yes, for a home, for security, for the opportunity to develop themselves and their families. The means with which they accomplished those results, they referred to as "Land and wood and water." Well, when this young lad right here is an old man, his grandchildren will be looking for land and wood and water. We have the land in vast abundance, in the most productive quantities, and the finest climate on the earth if we will conserve and rebuild and utilize it. We have the water in blessed abundance if we will conserve and use it. As we do we produce that which serves the function that our forebears wanted the wood for most—the heat and the light. Yes, we have been abundantly blessed. We have seen the proper use of the great development of our blessings. We have seen our country grow; become stronger and prosper.

You here tonight know better than any other group the blessings of public power. I believe I see the dawn of a day in which all producers of power have a higher respect and regard for all other producers. I am grateful for the fact that yonder in the Southwest, representatives of public power—the Southwestern Power Administration, guided by Douglas Wright, one of the greatest of the men who have developed this program—the Oklahoma power producing authority—and private utilities have joined hands in a cooperative contract that has produced the finest grid of electric power available in this Nation outside only of the great Northwest with its unlimited hydroelectric power.

They have seen that whatever estimate is made for the consumption of power is inadequate. They have seen that no matter how much the utilities produce or the State produces or the Government produces, that there cannot be too much electric power. And so they have joined hands in what I believe will be a model contract for others in like positions across the land. They guarantee power that is not only cheap, but available and abundant, for our cities and towns and our farms.

As we look ahead, we are aware of the grave danger which our country is confronted with, but, as we know the danger and analyze it, the great knowledge comes to us that we can meet it and we can overcome it. I say this to you tonight—and I don't know when the darkest hour has been, or is, or will be—but it will be the hour before the dawn. There is no nation on this earth, or available group of nations, that can defeat or subjugate or conquer free, united America.

You know, our enemies in this world-wide struggle have spent a lot of money and gone to a lot of trouble in an effort to find out how strong America is. They have their subversive agents. They have their accredited experts studying what they can find of our productive capacity and power of our military machines, of our military equipment. Ah, they are trying to find out what the latest guided missile may be. They are trying to find out what the latest improvement in our air power might be. Yes, we know that their submarines have come to the surface in close proximity to our shores in many places, seeking to find out what the power and strength of our fortifications are.

We know they have shot down our airplanes yonder, seeking to find the secret of America's military might. Well, I want to say this to them in defiance and to you in reassurance—they are looking in the wrong place to find how strong America is.

Nearly a year ago, I was invited to a little community in Oklahoma called Limestone Gap. It was a rural school, with an eighth grade graduating class of five members. I accepted that invitation, along with a number of others in Oklahoma, to go and visit those young people in their hours of graduation. The great press in Oklahoma chided me a little bit that I had come from Washington to Limestone Gap to make a graduation speech. I told them that I was honored to go to Limestone Gap—that, in the first place, I was invited, and that politicians are like business, they go where invited and stay where well treated.

In the second place, Limestone Gap was very near to the farm where I was born. It was just such a school as I had attended. I was happy to meet friends there and make new acquaintances. But over and above all that, I went to Limestone Gap to find at first hand what was in the hearts and minds of the people at Limestone Gap—because there is the secret of how strong America is. Oh, we are proud of our planes and our ships and our tanks and our guns, but they are not the accurate measure of the strength of the Nation, as are the will power and the dedication and the spirit to strengthen the moral fiber in the hearts of the people.

And I want to say this to you, when you go to the Limestone Gaps or to the great conventions—when you go to the crossroads of the great cities—you stand in amazement at the rugged devotion and strength of the people of this mighty Nation—and that is the secret which a totalitarian nation can never know; that is a spirit which no despot can ever conquer; that is a strength which no arrogant aggressor can ever analyze or overcome.

I sat this morning with a group of Future Farmers of America yonder in Washington, a group of United States Senators and a group of farm boys. We gave the boys the floor. We asked them to talk to us and tell us of their projects and their work, and I want to say to you that our hearts were lifted as we heard these young men recite the stories of their accomplishments. We heard them tell the reasons why they arrived at the conclusion that they love the land and all over this blessed country the people love their land.

Yes, whether it is on the farm or in the cities—what a country—when the people are so dedicated to it and when their hearts are so filled with love and affection for it—and what a country, with its whole source of opportunities to its youth.

One of my associates and I a little while ago went to one of the great engineering schools in this country to interview some of the graduates in a certain phase of scientific education. We asked for the opportunity to interview the members of the graduating class. We did—and we found some that we liked especially and who were interested in our work, and we made arrangements to employ some two or three. We then went to the dean of this great engineering school and we said we would like to have one man a little further along in scientific research than any of these. "Do you have some that have gone even farther in the field in which we are interested?"

"Why," he said, "yes, we have three men here who are finishing their doctorate degrees, but," he said, "they'll come pretty high."

Well, we asked him if it would be expensive to interview them, and he told us no. So we visited with them and we found one that we liked especially and who seemed to kind of harmonize with us, and we told him we'd like to have him, and he said he'd like to come. And we sat with him and I said, "I'd like for you to tell me a little bit about your family, and about your background and where you come from."

He said, "My father was an immigrant from a country now behind the iron curtain. My mother was a nurse. They saw me through high school. I received a fellowship to a great university and that, together with the work I was able to do, saw me through that school. Then I received a scholarship here and that, together with the meager help my father and mother could do for me, has seen me through here."

He said, "I want to go to work for you, but first I want to go yonder to a State far away from here to visit my father and mother. My mother is no longer able to work. My father is still a waiter yonder in a great hotel."

I said, "What a country that the son of an immigrant could work his way through schools and come to the point where he could graduate from the toughest engineering school on the earth with the highest honors in his class. What a country—and what a strength—and what a power—in a united America."

The people in the cities and towns, the people at the crossroads, the people on the farms, have had the opportunity to develop their resources and their opportunity and their security. All over the world, men and women envy you and me. They watch us as we go to work unhampered by any fears—as we come home to a happy family meal, as we go to our schools and our churches, as we drive our cars down any road, or play the radio, watch the television, or go to the movies. But to these people all over the world, there comes from the Kremlin the constant warning to them that our way of life—the American way of life—won't work. It can't last, they say. It will either be destroyed or destroy itself.

You know, some actually think that what we have in this blessed land is too good to be true. I say to you that it is good enough to be true. The Russian war dogs shout forebodings of doom for our American way of life. They do this, trying to build confidence among their own people. They do it, trying to undermine the confidence that others have in us or that we have in ourselves. From that whited sepulcher of men's hopes wherein their evil designs are incubated and from whence they are spewed out to curse and blight the free world, the war lords in the Kremlin shout that western civilization will destroy itself.

I say that western civilization is stronger today than it has ever been. It is becoming more powerful each day. It will become strong enough, and very soon, to either prevent world war III or win such a war if a stupid and cruel foe provokes it.

Western civilization, our civilization, will also be wise enough and strong enough to safeguard our freedom and our liberty while we are safeguarding the security of our country. This power is physical, yes—but this power is also moral and spiritual. Thus while we either prevent the starting of world war by Russia's mad rulers or while we defeat them, if they force war upon us, we will at the same time seek to persuade people around the world—yes, even those behind the iron curtain—to find and claim human freedom and spiritual liberty for themselves.

To accomplish these ends, which are the minimum, we must match and surpass Russia's military power.

We must then compel those monsters in the Kremlin to come before the bar of world opinion and human justice. They must be held accountable for their terrible sins. They must be compelled to accept peace—real peace—with adequate guaranties that freedom and liberty and justice will not perish, but will prosper and flourish in the earth.

The rural electric co-ops march in the front ranks of a united and determined America. Through cooperation and unity you have come thus far, and you have found it good. Through cooperation and unity among yourselves you will continue to go forward toward your goal of abundant power for abundant living for every farm home. Through cooperation and unity 153,000,000 Americans are marching with irresistible tread toward their most cherished goals of freedom, prosperity, and security at home and peace around the world.

The Democratic Party, a Progressive Party That Has Never Died

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. ROBERT S. KERR

OF OKLAHOMA

IN THE SENATE OF THE UNITED STATES

Monday, April 2 (legislative day of Monday, March 26), 1951

Mr. KERR. Mr. President, last Saturday evening the distinguished senior Senator from Wyoming [Mr. O'MAHONEY] delivered an eloquent and powerful address at the annual Jefferson-Jackson dinner, in Detroit, Mich. I ask unanimous consent that it be printed in the Appendix of the RECORD.

There being no objection, the address was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

THE DEMOCRATIC PARTY, A PROGRESSIVE PARTY THAT HAS NEVER DIED

(Address of Senator JOSEPH C. O'MAHONEY)

No member of the United States Senate could come to Michigan to make a political speech and, at the same time, refrain from paying his tribute of highly deserved honor, respect, and admiration to the great statesman who has represented this State in the Senate of the United States since early in 1928. By curious coincidence, ARTHUR H. VANDENBERG took the oath of office as a Senator of the United States on March 31, 1928, exactly 23 years ago today.

As a Democrat and as an American I honor both my party and myself when, on this notable anniversary, I say that ARTHUR VANDENBERG ranks among the greatest statesmen of this country. His character, his courage, his ability, and, above all, his loyal Americanism have won for him a secure position in the history of this Government and in the history of the world. He is the type of ideal statesman who places country above party. The people of Michigan have recognized these great qualities in him, and, as one who has served with him for more than 17 years, I thank the people of Michigan who have made all of the people of the United States their debtors by returning him to the Senate in election after election regardless of the temporary trend of the political tides.

It is appropriate that I should make this reference to the services and the character of Senator VANDENBERG on this occasion because there never was a time when it should be more clearly understood by all of the people and particularly by those of us who occupy positions of leadership in the public affairs of the Nation that a political party has no reason for existence except to serve the best interests of all the people. Partisanship which becomes only factionalism and which is motivated only by the aspiration to hold political office performs no public service, and the party which operates on that basis is doomed to failure as the political history of this country amply proves. Good government in the interest of all is always the best politics.

We have assembled at the annual Jefferson-Jackson dinner to honor two of the outstanding statesmen of this country from whom Democrats have always drawn their heritage of political principle. It should never be forgotten that we who gather as Democrats year after year throughout the Nation to draw renewed devotion to the principles for which these men stood, are the members of the only party the life of which is coequal with the life of the Nation itself. Jefferson was the founder of the Democratic Party, but more important than that, he was one of the principal founders of our Nation and no man in all history more clearly outlined than did he the obligation of political organization to serve the welfare of all the people.

THE UNDYING VITALITY OF THE DEMOCRATIC PARTY

We are members of a party which has never died because it has drawn undying vitality from the fact that its members and its leaders have recognized that its primary function is to promote popular government and to advocate policies best calculated to preserve the opportunity of the masses to enjoy the inalienable rights of life, liberty, and the pursuit of happiness which Jefferson so eloquently defended in writing the Declaration of Independence.

It is no mere chance that from Jefferson to Truman the Democratic Party has preserved throughout the history of this country an unbroken record of devotion to progressive principles save only for a brief time in the last century when its leaders yielded temporarily to defend the vested interests of the slave power. Let no Democrat forget, however:

First, that Jefferson himself advocated the abolition of slavery;

Second, that Martin Van Buren, beloved friend, lieutenant, and successor of Andrew Jackson as President, became, in 1848, the first Presidential candidate to advocate free soil;

Third, that when Abraham Lincoln and his colleagues joined, in the middle of the last century, with supporters of Van Buren to form a new party to oppose the extension of slavery, they went back to Jefferson for a name; and

Finally, that when in the middle of the Civil War Lincoln ran for reelection his running mate was the military governor of Tennessee, the former Democratic United States Senator from that State, Andrew Johnson, whose administration as the successor of Lincoln after the latter's martyrdom was ruined by Republican leadership in Congress because he sought to carry out the liberal program of Abraham Lincoln.

The party Thomas Jefferson founded was called the Democratic-Republican Party. Under Jackson it became known as the Democratic Party and in the middle of the nineteenth century it was only natural that the new advocates of human rights should have chosen to be known as Republicans just as Jefferson was known as a Republican, though sneeringly called a "Jacobin" by the reactionaries of that time, just as we are now called Socialists and Communists by the reactionaries of our time.

LINCOLN ON THE LEGITIMATE OBJECT OF GOVERNMENT

It is not surprising, therefore, that when the Lincoln papers were opened in the Library of Congress on July 1947, there was found among them a fragment of writing in Lincoln's own hand which ought to be committed to memory by every American citizen and particularly by those who, in the current political scene, are constantly denouncing the Democratic Party on the charge that it has given too much power to government. These are the words of Abraham Lincoln, follower of Jefferson, advocate of freedom, defender of government of the people, by the people, for the people. Listen:

"The legitimate object of government is to do for a community of people whatever they need to have done but cannot do at all or cannot do so well for themselves in their separate and individual capacities. In all that the people can individually do as well for themselves the Government not to interfere."

In our time we have seen private central economic power establish arbitrary control over the lives of the people. It was the failure of the Republican Party to put an end to private economic exploitation of the masses that made possible the victories of Woodrow Wilson, Franklin D. Roosevelt, and Harry Truman. They were advocating the principles of the welfare state so well defined by Lincoln, when he said that it is the legitimate object of government to do for the people what they need to have done but cannot do at all or cannot do so well for themselves.

Contrast the history of this democratic vitality from the days of Jefferson to the days of Truman with the history of the parties which have opposed us. Washington, the first President, was the choice of all the people. He was the unanimous choice of the Presidential electors, both in 1788 and in 1792, but in his Cabinet Jefferson became the leader of the party of the people and Hamilton the leader of the party of the vested interests. Hamilton became the leader of the Federalists, a political party which in 1796 gave the United States one and only one President, John Adams. Jefferson followed in 1800 and not until 24 years had elapsed was the Jeffersonian succession broken. In 1824, though Andrew Jackson had the largest vote, he lacked a majority in the electoral college and John Quincy Adams, under whom the Whigs came into existence, was elected President by the House of Representatives. He served only a single term and was succeeded by Andrew Jackson. There followed under Jackson and Van Buren 12 years of progressive government in defense of the people against the vested interests.

HOW THE WHIGS DIED OF A STRADDLE

In 1840 the Whigs came back to power for a single term. It is significant that they campaigned without a political platform of well-defined principle, just as it is significant that in 1848 the Whig Party achieved its last national success when instead of meeting the issue of the time, the slavery issue, it nominated Zachary Taylor, a candidate satisfactory to the proslavery interests, for President and Millard Fillmore, an antislavery man, for Vice President. That straddle, that failure to meet the issue, killed the Whig Party. It died 100 years ago for lack of political principle, a disease which no party can survive.

Now, the Republican Party of our time, which, curiously enough, has been distinguished like the Whigs before it for the preponderance of single-term Presidents it has elected, is quite obviously making ready to wage the campaign of 1952 without a clear-cut platform of political principle. It is preparing in 1952 to die of a straddle just as the Whigs in 1852 vanished forever from the political stage.

Let us not forget that the election of 1948 was won by Harry Truman when most political observers were of the opinion that he was doomed to defeat. His success was based upon the simple fact that he had a platform and the courage to maintain it whereas he was opposed by a party which was trying, like the Whigs before it, to pussyfoot into power.

The Democrats of Michigan are making their campaign now to the people of this State, to the independents and to the Republicans who believe in straightforward, courageous, and positive government for the benefit of the people. You have a Democratic Governor, the only Democrat in 36 years to have been reelected chief executive, a triumph which came to Governor Williams because he is a leader with a program as well as a leader of personality and of principle.

You can go into this campaign in every county and in every city of this State and successfully challenge your opponents to say precisely where the Republican Party, as a party, stands upon the great issues of our time.

You may invite the voters of Michigan to join you because you have a party with a positive program and a positive record. And if any opposing political leader should cherish the hope that a Presidential campaign in 1952 can be won by name-calling or finger pointing, just tell them that KEFAUVER and FULBRIGHT are Democrats. If the cry of socialism and communism should be raised, just tell them that the Truman program has contained communism at the borders of Greece and Turkey while the Marshall plan has turned communism back in Italy and in France and has rehabilitated all Western Europe and made it once again the forum of freemen.

WHERE DOES THE GOP STAND ON MODERN ISSUES?

This is the record that no one can deny, but where does the Republican Party stand as a party on either domestic or international issues?

Does it still adhere to the claims of Landon and Willkie and Dewey that it should be given power because it possesses a better capacity than the Democratic Party to make effective the political reforms conceived and enacted by the Democrats?

Does the Republican Party pledge itself to continue the present policy of our Government to win international peace by collective security through the United Nations, or does it propose, by returning to a bankrupt isolationism, to invite a third world war and thereby risk the destruction of human freedom everywhere—freedom to the preservation of which this Nation has been dedicated since its very inception?

No man tonight can tell where the Republican Party stands upon these issues, domestic or international. No man can doubt where the Democratic Party stands.

When, at the beginning of this century, the Republican leadership failed to meet the domestic policies of that time, the people turned to Woodrow Wilson. The reforms of his two administrations enacted in the face of persistent and desperate Republican opposition have never been repealed.

When Republican leadership in the twenties again failed to meet the domestic issues, the people again turned to the Democratic Party. The reforms which have been enacted since 1933 under Democratic leadership in the White House and in the Congress still stand unchallenged except for the indirect attack which is made upon them by reactionary Republican leaders who indulge themselves in general charges of socialism and communism, but who do not dare to advocate the repeal of the progressive legislation enacted under Roosevelt and Truman.

The independent voter knows these things. The independent voter knows that your party gave agricultural relief where the opposition failed. The independent voter knows that the Democratic Party stands for social justice, that it is opposed to the economic exploitation of the masses, that it is the advocate of opportunity for the individual and that it has been so successful in carrying out these purposes that in the 5 years since the war America has enjoyed the most prosperous era in all history.

EXTRAORDINARY PROSPERITY OF LAST 5 YEARS

A Democratic Congress passed and President Truman signed the Employment Act of 1946 which brought to the people of this country, instead of a depression following the end of World War II, the greatest prosperity that any people have enjoyed anywhere on the face of the globe. Some 20,000,000 motor vehicles have been built and purchased in the United States in the last 5 years. More petroleum has been produced, refined, and consumed during these 5 years than during the war itself with all the staggering military consumption of the conflict. New homes have been built all over the United States. Slums have been abolished, rural electrification has made markets out of the most distant farms and ranches. Corporate profits have reached new highs never before experienced. Every daily paper in the United States, day after day and week after week during the past 5 years has been recording the development of this prosperity. From 1945 to 1951 the people of the United States in every county and in every community from coast to coast and from north to south has achieved new records of progress and plenty. Wages are higher than ever before and salaries are higher than ever before. More than 60,000,000 people are employed and no one can deny the record. It stands for all to see.

Tell the independent citizen of Michigan, tell the new voter who has never lived under a Republican administration what happened when Herbert Hoover was President. Ask them if they are willing to trust the future of this country to the reactionary leaders who fought all these progressive steps while they were being enacted and who denounce us now as Socialists because we enacted them. Ask the Republican leaders whether they propose to abandon the me-too platforms of their past four Presidential campaigns or whether they have the courage to demand the repeal of this legislation.

You know what the answer will be. The reforms brought about by the Democrats were so long overdue that they cannot be abandoned, but if the direction of this Government were to be handed back to the opponents of progress, the fruits of Democratic success would be rapidly dissipated and the whole struggle for the reestablishment of social justice would have to begin again. So much for the domestic scene.

How about the international program? Modern science has made isolationism an impossibility. Nay, more than that, American inventive skill, American scientific progress has so improved the means of transportation and communication in the modern world that we have no choice but to march courageously down the path the great Senator VANDENBERG so firmly treads.

TIMID STATESMEN CANNOT LEAD AMERICANS

American long-range airplanes have triumphed over mountains and oceans. There is no geographical barrier behind which a timid people could be safely led by a timid statesman. We cannot follow Mr. Hoover with any hope of salvation to retire behind imagined barriers while abandoning the natural resources and industrial potentialities of Europe and Asia and Africa to the Communists. To turn our backs upon the free people of Western Europe would be to surrender the resources and the skills of the whole Eastern Hemisphere to communism. To condemn the people through whom we received the religious doctrines of Christianity and the political doctrines of freedom to totalitarian slavery would be a surrender of principle that would dishonor the memory of all the great founders of this Republic. It would profit us nothing. We would surrender two-thirds of the world's resources. We would surrender the aspirations of hundreds of millions of people who want peace and freedom and we would condemn ourselves to the loss of our own essential liberties by years of fearful waiting for the atomic attack the Soviets would be bound to launch.

We have no alternative but to remain loyal and steadfast and courageous in defense of the principles of freedom. The whole genius of our people has been that of courageous and confident self-government. Our political creed is that of popular government. It faces its greatest threat now at the hands of the Communist dictators who are waiting for us to yield to timidity and defeatism.

That is not the spirit of America. Americans are free. They know that there is no materialistic force capable of matching strength with the power of a free soul. We know that the people of the world do not want war, that they are driven to war only through the folly or the stupidity of leaders without faith in God or man.

THE SPIRIT OF AMERICA IS THE SPIRIT OF FREEDOM AND PEACE

We know that war settles nothing, that every successive war is more appalling than its predecessor. Surely we know that a third world war would plunge all the world into a new era of darkness and tyranny, but we know that if we have the courage to live as our predecessors on this continent have lived, freely, courageously, and devotedly in the knowledge that the spiritual power of man can never be permanently overthrown by the evil of materialism, then it will be our glory to have been the Nation that shall have led the world to permanent peace.

The Democratic Party is the party that has never died because it has been a progressive party. It served the people in the time of Jefferson and Jackson. It served the people under Wilson and under Roosevelt. It's serving the people now under President Truman. It has a program, a progressive program which Republican leaders resist but dare not attack.

The Republican Party on the other hand is a party without a nationally recognized program on either the home front or the international front. Not until the Republican Convention is held in 1952 will it be possible for the people to know to what extent it will try to lead the country into the past, but all the signs of the times indicate that in 1952 it will turn back into the same paths of indecision and futility in which its predecessors, the Federalists and the Whigs, perished.

Opportunity in India

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. WALTER H. JUDD

OF MINNESOTA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Monday, April 2, 1951

Mr. JUDD. Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my remarks in the RECORD, I include the following editorial from the New York Herald Tribune of Sunday, April 1, 1951:

OPPORTUNITY IN INDIA

The famine in India has shown no signs of abating; the bill to provide American wheat for the hungry has been stalled in Congress. A quick decision is imperative, both from the standpoint of humanity and as a matter of practical politics. The primary purpose of dispatching wheat to India is to alleviate distress, a step which is in accord with a great American tradition. But against the background of the differences between the United States and India on matters of foreign policy, there are some in this country who would make the wheat shipments conditional on some change in India's attitude, and there are many Indians who suspect that the grain, whether given as a gift or a loan would have political strings attached. Delay only fosters this unhappy condition and creates an atmosphere of asperity around the whole project.

The House Rules Committee has been brooding over the bill, chiefly because the Indian Government had originally asked to be allowed to purchase 2,000,000 tons of wheat on a long-term loan, and some committeemen believe that the whole project should be considered on this basis. Mr. Truman suggests that 1,000,000 tons be sent immediately as a gift and the disposition of the rest be discussed later. There is good sense in this proposal; it would meet the most urgent needs of India without further parley, while allowing debate on terms of payment for the remainder of the wheat. But in any case, some decision should be reached speedily. The United States has an opportunity to prove to the Indian people that their welfare is a matter of concern to this country; that Americans do not always think, as some of the more excitable Indian publicists like to charge, in terms of weapons and power politics. The wheat would be a very eloquent ambassador to India, and the less haggling and obstructionism that accompany it the better.

The Struggle Between Russia and the West

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. HUBERT H. HUMPHREY

OF MINNESOTA

IN THE SENATE OF THE UNITED STATES

Monday, April 2 (legislative day of Monday, March 26), 1951

Mr. HUMPHREY. Mr. President, it is an honor and a privilege for me to bring to the attention of the Senate a series of three articles by Prof. Herbert McClosky which appeared in the Minneapolis Star for February 27 and 28 and March 1, dealing with the conflict which exists today between the free and democratic countries of the world and the Soviet Union and her satellites. Not only is Professor McCloskey a personal friend of mine, but he is a respected member of the University of Minnesota teaching staff, and one of the leading young political scientists in the country. I therefore ask unanimous consent that the articles be printed in the Appendix of the RECORD.

There being no objection, the articles were ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

[From the Minneapolis Star of February 27, 1951]

WHAT HAS BROUGHT US TO THE BRINK OF WAR?

(By Herbert McCloskey)

No conflict faced by modern man has been more important for the future of freedom and culture than the present struggle between the Soviet world and the West.

What is the meaning of this conflict? Is it merely a struggle between hostile economic systems? Is it a struggle for territory? Is it, as Soviet leaders claim, caused by Wall Street or by American foreign policy?

The conflict before us is so fundamental that if the Soviets win, we shall lose not only our freedom but many other qualities upon which civilization rests. It is, therefore, vital that we understand what it is about, that we do not indulge in fanciful myths about the nature of the enemy that confronts us.

The very scope of the present conflict and our profound hope that it will not need to be resolved by war sometimes leads us into confusion concerning its nature and causes.

This belief is advanced mainly by Soviet Communists. Yet Soviet leaders consider Britain no less an enemy than the United States, despite the fact that Britain has partly abandoned capitalism in favor of socialism. Still we have no serious conflict with Britain. And the number of Americans who would be willing to risk war with Russia over differences in the economies is ridiculously small.

Related to this is the Communist charge that the present conflict results from the manipulations of a rather vague demon known as Wall Street.

But Wall Street (or more accurately, American businessmen) is not always more influential than other power groups in determining our foreign policy.

Following World War II, many businessmen were friendly toward the Soviet Union and eager to enlarge their trade relations with the U. S. S. R. Even today business-minded leaders are by no means always in the forefront of the struggle against Soviet power. Men like Taft, Hoover, and Joseph B. Kennedy, for example, are the champions of the least provocative policies toward the U. S. S. R.

Furthermore, businessmen differ among themselves in many of their attitudes and opinions. To assume that they form a single segment of opinion and influence is to torture the facts.

It is sometimes thought the conflict is essentially about competing territorial aspirations. It is manifestly clear, however, that the Western Powers now possess few such aspirations.

The Soviet Union, for its part, protests its innocence on this score, and while, in the light of the enormous territorial expansion of the U. S. S. R. since 1945, we may reasonably question this innocence, it does not appear that the mere addition of territory is what the Soviet Union most needs or wants.

The struggle to influence territories, especially in central Europe and the Far East, has, of course, sharpened the conflict, but this appears to be a derivative rather than a primary factor.

It is also thought by some that the fault lies mainly with American politics and foreign policy. Are we blameless? Have we contributed in no way to the present world difficulties? It would be rash indeed to assume so.

We have failed in a most vital internal area—race relations—and this has reflected itself in world affairs. We are known throughout Europe and, more important, throughout Asia, as a nation that treats Negroes shabbily, confines them to second-class citizenship, and holds peculiar notions about white supremacy.

It is more difficult than we usually imagine to present ourselves and be accepted as the friends of the non-Caucasian peoples of the world when we are so obviously vulnerable on this score.

Another shortcoming is our inexperience in international politics. We often lack finesse and refinement in our international dealings. We are sometimes wanting in the patience and subtle wisdom that a more experienced people might have developed.

We have sometimes been rash, and have antagonized sensitive Europeans and Asiatics. We have exhibited sometimes an excess of pride, and even arrogance, in our attitudes toward other nations.

We have committed sins in the past by joining with other Western Powers in imperialist ventures. We grow increasingly more free from this, but our past sins nevertheless continue to plague us.

Factors of this sort have contributed to the present conflict, but none of them is decisive, and none of them compares in significance with the behavior of the Soviet Union in provoking the conflict.

It may be said, of course, that we contribute now by our policy of resistance and rearmament, and there is a sense in which this may be true. For it is possible that these policies will have a provocative effect on the Soviet regime.

COMMUNIST RELIGION SOWS SEEDS OF WAR

(By Herbert McClosky)

The major responsibility for the present world conflict belongs to the Communist regime of Russia. At least four characteristics of Soviet communism must be examined to understand why this is so: (1) Its ideology; (2) its dictatorial government; (3) its distorted sense of reality; and (4) its irrational anxieties and fears.

Soviet communism is no ordinary political movement. It is a political religion, dogmatic, consecrated, fanatical, and with a view of history that regards the ultimate victory of communism as a certainty.

The driving force which, according to Bolshevik ideology, motivates history to this end is the class struggle. The doctrine of class struggle is a central myth of Communist theology. This struggle, say Soviet Communists, has now been transferred to the international realm where it will some day produce a final Armageddon in favor of communism.

Soviet leaders apparently believe, therefore, that a world conflict is inevitable, and have, in fact, said so on numerous occasions. Capitalism in crisis, they argue, will seek to start a war in order to survive. So long as there is a division of the classes in the world, the struggle will remain.

So the U. S. S. R. prepares for war. It did so even when other nations were preparing for peace. It maintains the largest army, the most continuous flood of military preparations, the most aggressive foreign policy, the most persistent tendency to expand, the most uncooperative policy of all nations in its international dealings.

There is, however, more to the story. Nothing is plainer about the Soviet system than that it is a dictatorship of the most extreme and concentrated sort.

As a doctrinaire dictatorship, it tends always to read the motives of others in conspiratorial terms. It cannot be persuaded of the good will of those it has marked as enemies. It is essentially irrational and beyond the reaches of reason. Neither logic nor facts can readily prevail against it. It is a closed system, ideologically and politically, and it cannot easily be appealed to.

In a society that cannot conceive of honest intellectual disagreements and that places no reliance on the free play of ideas, distortions crowd out reality and ultimately forbid it. The Soviet regime has forbidden itself from learning the truth, for it has not only closed its mind, but has also closed the channels by which the truth might emerge.

Where the price of error is arrest or death, do even its agents dare to report the truth when it contradicts the dogma?

To deal with a regime of this sort, is to deal with a phenomenon so fundamentalist that it will have the world only on its own terms; a phenomenon in whose given word no faith can be placed; that refuses to understand the simplest and plainest language; and that twists and perverts whatever argument it touches.

It knows little or nothing of compromise, though it respects power, and will on occasion yield to it.

Soviet leaders respect no other man's opinions and values, because they hold themselves to have divined the final truth about man and the universe. They regard tolerance as a sign of weakness, and disagreement as a sign of depravity. They regard all means as permissible to them, for they believe and have said that there is no morality except revolutionary, class morality.

The Soviet dictatorship is, furthermore, like all dictatorships, psychologically insecure, for its sense of reality is so distorted that it is subject to exaggerated fears and anxieties of its own making. It is partly this and partly its messianic ideology that drives the regime to expand and to extend its rule over others.

This expansion, in turn, deepens the conflict, for it is then thought by others, and with justification, that the Soviet dictatorship will never be satisfied until it controls the entire world.

WE HAVE NO CHOICE BUT TO RESIST

(By Herbert McClosky)

Facing a growing conflict with the Soviet Union, what choices do we have? Four possible courses seem open to us: (1) The policy of the third camp; (2) pacifism; (3) submission; (4) resistance even at the risk of war.

The third camp idea expressed by a number of European intellectuals holds that Soviet communism and capitalist America are two giant ogres, both bad. It regards the choice between them as imperfect, and therefore chooses neither.

The basic assumption of this view is erroneous, and the view itself is perfectionist and utopian. It bewails the imperfect choice that faces it, and wants to have the struggle on its own terms or not at all.

Most of us cannot hold with this view. We have no right to assume that because the struggle is imperfect, we have no responsibility toward it. The life that has been built out of the democratic tradition may be less than perfect, but it is nevertheless worth choosing, worth preserving, and worth defending.

Nor, for most of us, is pacifism a realistic alternative. The motivations of pacifism are extraordinarily noble. It demands of us, however, that we be more than human, or perhaps less than human.

For the pacifist asks of us that for the sake of the pure principle we must be prepared, if necessary, to sacrifice friendship, love, loyalties, liberties, and perhaps our lives. This is more than most of us who are merely human are willing or able to pay.

If Soviet leaders were the sort of people who might respect pacifism, this alternative might be meaningful. But Soviet pacifists are in concentration camps or dead.

We come now to the alternatives of submission or resistance.

It is hard to believe that men who value freedom could hold with submission. For to submit is to give ourselves up to a way of life that could destroy the vitalities of civilization.

The Soviet regime has imposed on its own people and would impose on others, if it could, a ruthless dictatorship, unlimited in power and largely lacking in moral sensibility. It exercises on its own people and those it has conquered the methods of deceit, violence, and terror. It persecutes its scientists, its scholars, its artists for even the most modest deviations from dogma, and it imposes upon the great mass of men a despotism as great as any the world has ever known.

Against this, there exists in the west and in America, a democratic conviction that is still, despite shortcomings, of considerable vitality.

Let no one tell us that political freedom is of no consequence, that it means only the freedom to starve or to suffer. Among many other things, our freedom makes possible the correction of our shortcomings, a searching out of our deficiencies.

It gives to all of us some opportunity to initiate the course of our own lives. We have the hope of realizing, through freedom, our best qualities, and we can correct error.

This is no trivial matter. Where there is no possibility of correcting error, the entire culture becomes warped and distorted. It is regulated and ground down by those who assume their own infallibility.

If the present conflict should unfortunately come to final issue, let us at least be clear-headed concerning its meaning. For no matter what causes it, it will be a conflict over the survival of the humanistic tradition. We will have to choose between freedom and despotism.

Is the RFC Necessary?

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. HAROLD H. VELDE
OF ILLINOIS
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Monday, April 2, 1951

Mr. VELDE. Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my remarks in the RECORD, I would like to insert in the appendix of the RECORD a very timely editorial, brought to my attention by Mr. W. C. Erkert, director of purchases, Keystone Steel & Wire Co., of Peoria, Ill., entitled "Is the RFC Necessary," and appearing in the March 26 issue of the American Metal Market:

IS THE RFC NECESSARY?

The scandals that have been exposed in the investigation of the Reconstruction Finance Corporation by the Senate Banking Subcommittee headed by Senator J. WILLIAM FULBRIGHT have captured the newspaper headlines and have become the butt of jokes on radio and television, obscuring to some extent a basic issue: Is the RFC really necessary?

Questions of public morality and political influence as brought to light recently in the nearly 15 months' old probing of RFC affairs are serious enough, but the question of the economic justification for Government lending on a large scale in present circumstances of excessive availability of credit is one that should have the closest scrutiny by the Congress of the United States.

Senator HARRY F. BYRD, of Virginia, has introduced a bill (S. 1116) in the Senate to abolish the lending activities of the RFC, to liquidate its holdings and use the proceeds for a reduction of the Federal debt. So enthusiastic was the response to Senator BYRD's proposal that fellow members immediately wanted to climb on the bandwagon and appear as cosponsors of the measure.

The Reconstruction Finance Corporation was a depression-born instrument created in the Hoover administration and as such it has in the past served a useful purpose. In its early days it saved some distressed banks, kept some railroads out of receivership, and extended agricultural credit in worthy cases. Today many in Congress of both parties favor its abolition as a political grab bag.

Jesse Jones, its former able administrator, is among those who would do away with it entirely. Former President Herbert Hoover, whose Commission on Organization of the Executive Branch of the Government recommended more than 2 years ago the liquidation of RFC and the taking over of its duties of guaranteeing loans by the Treasury Department, has recently emphasized his earlier findings in a letter to a Member of Congress. "That agency," says Mr. Hoover, "was created as a result of my recommendations to the Congress in 1931 to meet the credit collapse at that time. It was set up as a purely emergency agency, with stringent restrictions on the type of loans and their security. These restrictions were subsequently relaxed and the agency continued in nonemergency periods."

In its report to Congress the Hoover Commission stated its objections to the manner in which RFC has been conducted in recent years in the following paragraph, which of course was written long before the current investigation was begun:

"Direct lending by the Government to persons or enterprises opens up dangerous possibilities of waste and favoritism to individuals or enterprises. It invites political and private pressure, or even corruption. Emergencies may arise in depression, war, national defense, or disaster which must be met in this way. But direct lending should be absolutely avoided except for emergencies."

In submitting his bill for liquidation of the RFC and the transfer of some of its most useful functions to the Office of Defense Mobilization, Senator BYRD said:

"The history of the RFC shows that it has done a good job when it was really needed but, as might have been expected, its access to the financial resources of the United States has been too great a temptation for political camp followers in periods when it did not have a job to do."

During its nearly 20 years of existence, the RFC has made more than 30,000 direct business loans totaling approximately a billion dollars and more than 5,000 business loans with banks participating of nearly $200,000,000. These are exclusive of defense loans, bank loans, railroad loans, exclusive of loans to political subdivisions and the mortgage-loan program. Many of these loans have been written off as uncollectible, according to Senator BYRD, though claims have been made that the RFC has operated at a profit. Of the uncollectible loans, a majority were made, it is charged, in periods when there was neither war nor depression in sight.

Many of the RFC loans have been subject to criticism other than those given the spotlight during the Fulbright committee hearings. Besides the Texmass, Lustron, Gunther, Jaeckel and Miami Beach hotel cases, there have been such loans as $34,000,000 to the Kaiser-Frazer Corp. to build automobiles and another $10,000,000 for the establishment of a selling organization, the $1,500,000 granted to the Hal Roach movie studios when the RFC itself found turmoil in the moving-picture industry, and $2,705,000 granted to a gold-mining company in Alaska which was in trouble largely because of Government restrictions on equipment and supplies.

"Such loans," declared Senator BYRD, "do not promote the public welfare. They provide easy credit which is not needed in inflationary periods. At this time they may provide employment, but in competition with vital defense requirements. Under current circumstances, it is competition by the Federal Government with private banking enterprise and a step toward the nationalization of banking."

The Government's investment in Federal lending corporations is $20,000,00,000, according to the Federal Reserve Bulletin, or nearly 10 percent of the Federal debt. But beyond this, the credit that is available to Government lending agencies totals $55,000,000,000, of which there are charges in the form of loans and guaranties of nearly $45,000,000,000. Those who favor the liquidation of the RFC charge that this is one of the primary causes of inflation. New commitments for Federal credit listed in the 1952 budget total $13,300,000,000, of which more than $10,000,000,000 is for housing and agriculture. These are exclusive of short-term loans such as the commodity credit program.

There are 73 Federal corporations which are concerned in one way or another with loans. Among the more important are the Public Housing Administration, the Farm Credit Administration, the Federal Crop Insurance Corporation, the Housing and Home Finance Agency, the Export-Import Bank, the Rural Electrification Administration, and the Farmers Home Administration.

But despite the adherents that Senator BYRD's bill for abolition of the RFC will attract, there is by no means anything like unanimity in Congress that the RFC should be completely done away with. Senator FULBRIGHT, whose committee has brought to light sordid stories of its dealings, does not believe this course is either feasible or desirable, declaring that the RFC has a number of important duties in the present emergency. Only last year, he has stated, Congress provided additional duties for the RFC in connection with the Defense Production Act. His remedy for the conditions which have prevailed in the administration of the RFC is embodied in Senate bill S. 514 which he has introduced and which would provide for a single Administrator or Governor and a loan policy board.

"To defeat the reorganization plan, on the grounds that the RFC should be abolished, would merely prolong the present conditions," he declares, "without any assurance either that the RFC would be abolished, or that it would be restored to a position of independence and integrity."

Another sponsor of the plan to continue RFC is Representative WRIGHT PATMAN, of TEXAS, who has become known as the friend of small business. Declaring that there is very little risk capital available from banking and private sources, Representative PATMAN says that "a vote against RFC is a vote against independent business in this country."

So the battle for and against the RFC may emerge as one of the outstanding issues of the Eighty-second Congress in both Houses and on both sides of the aisle. It is an issue in which party lines will be split and which may carry over into the political campaign of 1952.

United States World Aims and Hopes for World Peace

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. WILLIAM BENTON
OF CONNECTICUT
IN THE SENATE OF THE UNITED STATES

Monday, April 2 (legislative day of Monday, March 26), 1951

Mr. BENTON. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to have printed in the Appendix of the RECORD an article written for the Foreign Policy Bulletin by my colleague from Connecticut in the House, Representative A. A. RIBICOFF, of Hartford. The article appeared in the March 9, 1951, issue of the Bulletin. It deals with the need for this Nation to clarify its world aims and its hopes for world peace.

Representative RIBICOFF's article is the second time in as many months that he has issued an important statement on foreign policy which has contributed to the current "great debate." Earlier, on March 21, 1951, he delivered one of the main talks at the Hollins College, Virginia, convocation exercises. Titled "We Shall Prevail," the speech by this distinguished member of the House Foreign Affairs Committee stressed the need for moral leadership in today's crisis.

Mr. President, those who know Representative RIBICOFF admire him for the wholehearted manner in which, during his service in the House, he has brought his great ability and intelligence to bear on his work as a member of the House Foreign Affairs Committee. His article in the Foreign Policy Bulletin, and his recent talk at Hollins College which already has been inserted in a previous edition of the RECORD, should be studied by all the Members of Congress and by the American people.

There being no objection, the article was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

RIBICOFF URGES RECAPTURE OF POLITICAL INITIATIVE

For the first time in history one nation has strayed into a position of leadership without wanting it. Yet nevertheless the whole free world, economically and militarily, depends on the United States. It is this brutal fact that increases our frustration and our soul searching. "Why, oh God," we cry, "just we?" If we do not lead, no other free nation can take our place. If we do not lead, Soviet Russia will rush into the vacuum created by our abdication.

OUR NEW WORLD ROLE

The implications of our changed international status have been slow to sink into the national consciousness. Yet we do not sufficiently realize that everything we do affects other nations. Nor have we learned that we ourselves can now be subjected to new pressure and new kinds of attacks that cou'd never have touched us before. It is our country's task to determine whether freedom or slavery is the principle to survive for the next centuries.

Although the United States is the nucleus of the non-Communist world, there is no central control, no compelling unifying idea. Korea dramatically opened our eyes to the dangers that confront us and revealed the weakness of ourselves and our allies. Consequently, one fact overshadows all others. Our present policy is bigger than our present means. We should multiply our means to cope with our commitments.

We no longer live in the carefree times when we could ignore the rest of the planet. What we announce we will not defend, the other side automatically takes. Moreover, no portion of the non-Communist world is without importance to the defense of the whole. Because of our geographic position and interests, we must keep in balance our policies as to Europe, Asia, and the Americas. We cannot separate our world relations and responsibilities and treat them separately from one another. Our commitments in one area must not be permitted to endanger our capacity to act in others.

CORRECTIONS OF POLICY NEEDED

There must be some corrections in our short-term foreign policy.

1. Outside the United States we must try to create a single automatic military alliance, embracing all countries willing to join, concentrating on Western Europe as the most valuable, but not overlooking other areas. Although we might be forced out of one area or another, if war comes, we must not voluntarily renounce any important region of the world.

2. We should create local centers of strength able to deal with second-degree aggression, beginning with a far eastern pact—not unlike the North Atlantic Pact—and a Mediterranean pact, for if this second-degree aggression cannot be handled chiefly by local forces, we must either have to submit to it or else fritter away our strength. An example of local defense is the Greek-Yugoslav-Turkish combined force, which could probably handle aggression from the captive countries of Hungary, Bulgaria, and Rumania.

3. We cannot unilaterally promise each nation and each segment of the globe that we will defend it without getting in return its promise to help us when necessary. Since defense, moreover, is global in scale, we must have commitments from those with whom we are allied to help us in other areas of the world.

4. We need allies as much as they need us. We have interests in common. We must find a common policy with our friends and then follow it together.

5. By appropriate organs we should try to weld our camp into an effective instrument to make it as solid as that of our opponents. For example, we may point to the pooling of military components under General Eisenhower in Europe and the proposal to pool European economic interests under the Schuman plan.

Although terrible danger to all free peoples compels the United States to rearm, we must never forget that war is the last push that topples civilization. We must press the campaign on the front of peace making, and not only on the front of armed opposition. We must recapture from the Communists the political, social, economic, and spiritual factors without which military strength usually fails. Spiritual power is the ultimate key to the world's ills. We must contribute ideas as well as dollars and soldiers.

LONG-RANGE POLICY GOALS

The following should be the basis for our long-range foreign policy:

1. We must proclaim that our goals for the world are similar to the goals of this Nation from its founding. Paraphrasing the Constitution of the United States, they are: A more perfect world, common security, the establishment of justice, universal tranquility, the securing of peace in our own land and throughout the world, general welfare of all peoples, the securing of the blessings of liberty for all peoples and for posterity.

2. We must proclaim that we are for universal disarmament and international control of weapons.

3. We must proclaim that American wealth, American resources, America itself, are not the ends but the means to an end. The Creator did not endow this Nation with all its vast potential merely that Americans might luxuriate in the midst of a depleted, dismayed, and disheartened world. We should tell the world that once we eliminate the scourge of war we are willing to adopt a peace budget instead of a military budget. Under an international program similar to point 4 we shall help to raise the underdeveloped peoples of this world out of ignorance, poverty, and disease.

4. The McMahon-Ribicoff resolution, recently introduced in Congress, has its place in this program. This resolution is a declaration of friendship of the American people for all other peoples of the world. It emphasizes the desire of the American people for peace, friendship, and brotherhood with all men throughout the world, including those of the Soviet Union.

5. We must take the lead in transforming the United Nations into a world organization able to enact, administer, and enforce world law. This will require fundamental revisions in the United Nations Charter. These changes can be limited and confined to matters relating to the prevention of war.

For our generation and all mankind one question overshadows all others. Are we going to be able to work out the problems that arose out of World War II, or will world war III follow?

All this is a tremendous task. But it is not beyond our capacity. If we have the will to lead, we shall prevail.

A. A. RIBICOFF.

(This arficle was specially prepared for the Foreign Policy Bulletin by Representative RIBICOFF, Democrat of Connecticut, who is a member of the House Committee on Foreign Affairs.)

The Bitter Wheat of India

OF
HON. WALTER H. JUDD
OF MINNESOTA
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES
Monday, April 2, 1951

Mr. JUDD. Mr. Speaker, under leave granted to extend my remarks in the RECORD, I include the following article from the New York Herald Tribune of Sunday, April 1, 1951:

THE BITTER WHEAT OF INDIA—UNITED STATES, IN DELAYING GRAIN, IS RISKING THE LOSS OF A FRIEND

(By Margaret Parton)

NEW DELHI.—Recent news that India will exchange raw jute for 50,000 tons of Russian wheat as she recently exchanged jute goods for 50,000 tons of Chinese rice is considered here further indication of India's determination to keep food imports free of political implications and obtain food for her undernourished people wherever it may be found.

American observers here also regard the news of the Russian deal as another signal to Washington that in Indian eyes the time for discussion of merits of the 2,000,000-ton wheat gift is fast running out.

A month ago, when it appeared India would receive the grain without undue delay, most Indians were already half convinced that the gift was a spontaneous humanitarian gesture, as they had so often been told in preliminary publicity. Now they are beginning to change their minds, and the new mood is a bitter one.

A recent cartoon in a normally pro-American newspaper here showed a large blond labeled "United States" leaning possessively on a pie marked "Food for India." To an emaciated Indian at the other end of the table she was murmuring: "First tell me you love me, honey."

The view represented in this cartoon is spreading fast. If the offer of wheat to India is really a humanitarian gesture, Indians ask, why then must it be debated at such length? A recent spate of touring American private citizens who flatly tell Indians in public and private that they must sign up with America or else has aggravated opinion. Such an attempt at a straight-from-the-shoulder approach never does any good in India and in this case it merely confirms growing Indian suspicion of American motives.

American observers in India are also uneasy at the way this matter is being delayed in Washington. Many Americans here feel that in Indian eyes the wheat gift has come to symbolize the potential goodness of America, just as the atom bomb symbolizes evil. Since symbols are all-powerful in India, the possibility is that denial of the wheat will have a disastrous effect on Indian public opinion of America and on India's reaction to American policy in general. While America may not win India with wheat, America may well lose India without the wheat.

Proposals that a loan rather than a gift should be made seem here to be equally unfortunate. While such proposals might have been justified before, Indians were so generally led to believe that the gift would be forthcoming that they now appear in Indian eyes to turn Uncle Sam into Shylock. Economic experts also point out that a long-term loan would tie up India's economy for years and might prevent her from getting loans elsewhere for nation-building projects.

Meanwhile, India's struggle to avert widespread famine continues, and although the Government is importing shiploads of grain every day (against payment) from America, Canada, and elsewhere, many thousands of peasants are facing semistarvation this summer.

In North Bihar, for instance, such limited foodstocks as are available are sufficient to feed the population on a meager scale for only 2 or 3 weeks more. After that the Government will probably be forced to declare North Bihar a famine-stricken area and divert to it dwindling supplies of grain which are already desperately needed in other provinces.

From this distance it appears that the time for questions and debate in Washington is now past, both in regard to acute human hunger and also to America's relations with India. While it is true the grain will certainly help in relieving starvation in a hard-pressed country, even this consideration may count for less in the long run than restoring India's fast-vanishing faith in the sincerity of America's humanitarianism.

Assignment of Ground Forces to Duty in the European Area

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. HERBERT R. O'CONOR
OF MARYLAND
IN THE SENATE OF THE UNITED STATES

Monday, April 2 (legislative day of Monday, March 26), 1951

Mr. O'CONOR. Mr. President, on previous occasions I have expressed the conviction, with regard to sending American troops to fight on foreign soil in times of peace, that this is a matter of policy on which the Congress should be consulted in advance and not merely asked to approve decisions already made.

In this connection, I call to the attention of the Senate a statement by the Committee on the Present Danger, a national group comprised of distinguished representatives of the professions, the educational world, and of business, in which there is set forth the considered conviction that such action as is proposed must be the joint responsibility of the Congress and the Chief Executive, and asking that it be expressed as the sense of the Senate that the Congress be consulted in advance, through its appropriate committees, as to any new long-range policy requiring the stationing of large numbers of additional United States forces in Europe in support of the North Atlantic Treaty.

I ask unanimous consent that the statement by the Committee on the Present Danger be inserted in the RECORD.

There being no objection, the statement was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

STATEMENT BY THE COMMITTEE ON THE PRESENT DANGER

The Senate is about to vote on a resolution concerning sending troops to Europe in support of the North Atlantic Treaty. The importance of this subject to the safety of our country can hardly be overstated.

In the hope that it may serve to clarify the issues, this committee ventures its comment.

The real question is how best to defend the United States. This is a military problem. We must look to our responsible military leaders, who must conduct our defense if war comes, to plan the strategy they will employ. It is their unanimous, professional judgment that the defense of the United States should be laid in Europe jointly with our allies under the North Atlantic Treaty; that we must contribute our fair share of the ground forces of the joint army being created under General Eisenhower; that supply of munitions and contributions of sea and air power are not enough; that flexibility as to future decisions for deployment of our troops is an imperative necessity in a future no man can predict.

There is danger that these real issues may be obscured by an unnecessary question as to the respective constitutional powers of the President and the Congress. The Constitution makes the President Commander in Chief of the Armed Forces. This carries with it the powers implicit in command as to deployment of existing forces. But the Constitution also provides that it shall be the function of the Congress "to raise and support armies." In addition, of course, Congress has the power over the purse.

Stationing a relatively large United States force in Europe to support the North Atlantic Treaty will involve the functions of command, of raising and supporting armies, and of making appropriations. It must be the joint responsibility of the Congress and the Chief Executive to continue to provide the requisite forces, to pass the laws to create them and the funds to pay for them.

The press recently attributed to General Eisenhower the statement that he might as well be sent to the middle of the Atlantic Ocean unless he is to have in this task the support of the President, of the Congress, and of the public.

The true issues then are not constitutional questions, but whether this country is ready with unity to carry out, the spirit as well as the letter of the North Atlantic Treaty; whether it will give its wholehearted support to General Eisenhower's mission; whether it will abide by the considered judgment of its responsible military leaders as to how best to defend the United States.

Secretary Marshall has just stated that the danger is greater now even than last November.

Accordingly this committee urges with deep conviction—

A renewed spirit of national urgency, and of unity of action in this matter between the President and the Congress.

To this end, that the Senate express—as is proposed in section 2 of the joint committees' resolution now pending before it—"that the threat to the security of the United States and our North Atlantic Treaty partners makes it necessary for the United States to station abroad such units of our Armed Forces as may be necessary and appropriate to contribute our fair share of the forces needed for the joint defense of the North Atlantic area."

That it be expressed as the sense of the Senate that the Congress be consulted in advance, through its appropriate committees, as to any new long range policy requiring the stationing of any large number of additional United States forces in Europe in support of the North Atlantic Treaty.

That assurance of such consultation be given by the President.

That the above not be done in a way which might tend to cast any uncertainty or cloud upon the power of the Commander in Chief to take instant action wherever necessary, as emergencies may arise or threaten, to deploy existing forces—a power more urgently requisite for the safety of all of us in today's world of sudden mass-destruction weapons than it has ever been before.

HON. LAWRENCE H. SMITH
OF WISCONSIN

Monday, April 2, 1951

Mr. SMITH of Wisconsin. Mr. Speaker, hardly a day goes by that some former Democratic policy maker does not publish a book in an effort to protect himself or his benefactor against historical judgment that is certain to follow. Today we have the sorry spectacle of Sumner Welles offering his excuses for the dismissal foreign policies of the New Deal when he was a high spokesman for the State Department from 1933 to 1943. His confessions appear in his book, Seven Decisions That Shaped History.

Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my remarks, I am including a timely article by Mr. George Sokolsky, which appeared in the Washington Times-Herald today. This outstanding writer puts Mr. Welles on the spot. Congress will await an answer to the Sokolsky demand that he "come clean" and name those who "confused" the late President Roosevelt in our foreign affairs.

The article follows:

THESE DAYS

(By George Sokolsky)

Sumner Welles returns to public controversy after a prolonged illness attending the curious circumstances of his departure from the State Department. His resurrection is ushered in by a book, "Seven Decisions That Shaped History," and by the chairmanship of a letterhead organization "Freedom International."

The book is extraordinarily controversal, attacking Cordell Hull, Herbert Hoover, Gen. George Marshall and about everything else, except Franklin D. Roosevelt and Sumner Welles, who were never wrong.

But as I read the book, I could not help recalling that Sumner Welles was in the State Department in extremely important positions from 1933 to 1943 and that he did not speak up at the time to alert the American people. He has waited until 1951 to tell us what we should have known when the mistakes were being made by his own State Department.

For instance, he says:

"In China the Nationalist Government of Generalissimo Chiang Kai-shek remained in power. There was good reason to assume that with the pledged support of the Soviet Union and of the United States it would gradually overcome the opposition of the Chinese Communists and consolidate its authority over a united nation."

That, of course, is absolute nonsense and is written only to defend, by implication, the shameless conduct of Roosevelt at Tehran and Yalta. Welles knows that Chiang broke with the Communists in 1927 in such a manner that no peace between them could ever be possible.

Writing of Roosevelt's troubles with Chiang Kai-shek, Sumner Welles says:

"The repeated—and, it must be admitted, bungling—efforts of several of President Roosevelt's representatives in China to persuade Chiang Kai-shek to comply with the demands of the Chinese Communists were producive of misunderstanding, and damaged the prestige and authority of the Nationalist Government.

"Likewise, the profund ignorance of China, and the lack of Far Eastern experience, of certain of the President's representatives there served him in ill stead. These envoys spent much of their time quarreling with each other, or with their subordinates; and, while I know of no instance where they did not try to carry out the President's instructions to further the establishment of a strong postwar China, their erroneous judgment and the wide diversity of their recommendations made it impossible for him to obtain any accurate over-all estimate of the situation."

This is important evidence and has often appeared, in one form or another, in this column, but from Sumner Welles, it is of greater value because he was running the State Department when many of the mistakes were made. And he gives no names, no facts, no details.

Wo are these advisers? Is one of them, perchance, Owen Lattimore or Lauchlin Currie?

Roosevelt, according to Welles, was not only confused by his advisers concerning his China policy, but by Gen. George Marshall concerning the over-all war strategy, Marshall being, according to Welles, incorrect in his information and his decisions.

Welles does not give details as to who it is that made these mistakes. Are we still being governed by the men who were, in his opinion, all wrong? They have, to date, cost us 60,000 casualties. Are they still determining our policy.

If you look at the dates, Gen. George Marshall and Dean Acheson made the worst mistakes, but Sumner Welles does not say who advised them regarding Far Eastern affairs.

Again Sumner Welles, defending Roosevelt, says:

"At the Cairo conferences with the Generalissimo and Madame Chiang Kai-shek, the President had at his side no expert adviser on Far Eastern affairs. At Yalta also such advice was lacking.

"If the President had had with him at those two conferences so authoritative and keen-minded an expert on Far Eastern affairs, for example, as Dr. Stanley Hornbeck, who had for many years been the State Department's political adviser on the Far East, a number of defects in the Cairo and Yalta agreements on Asia might well have been avoided."

This is a correct view but incomplete. Roosevelt did have advisers at Cairo and certainly at Yalta. Gen. George Marshall was at Cairo as was General Wedemeyer.

At Yalta, President Roosevelt's expert on Far Eastern affairs was Alger Hiss.

What we need to know from Sumner Welles is, who confused President Roosevelt, who appointed the quarrelsome, contending people who gave him, as Welles says, bad advice?

We want names, we want responsibility. Who appointed Hiss? Now that Sumner Welles has written this confession, let him come clean.

Ukrainians a Potent Ally Against the Stalin Regime

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

OF WISCONSIN

Monday, April 2, 1951

Mr. KERSTEN of Wisconsin. Mr. Speaker, the Ukrainian people can be a potent ally of the United States in the fight against the Stalin Communist regime. These people who have been so oppressed by Stalin have been yearning for their freedom. Not only are they subject to the usual Soviet terrorism, but in addition they suffer as a minority group trod upon by the aggressive and imperialistic policies of Soviet Russia. With more than 40,000,000 Ukrainian people living in the Soviet Union, this group constitutes no small prickly thorn in the side of Stalin, but rather a tremendous national group which if properly led and supported may well prove the downfall of the Stalinist regime. I believe that the American people should support the Ukrainian resistance to Communist tyranny.

I include herewith two articles—one from the March 1951 issue of the Sign, and the other from the March 24, 1951, issue of the Brooklyn Tablet. These articles tell in greater detail the possibilities for revolution existing among the Ukrainian people. They follow:

[From the Sign for March 1951]

WEAPON AGAINST RUSSIA—NOT A SUPER ATOM BOMB NOR A POWERFUL JET PLANE, BUT THE PRINCIPLE OF SELF-DETERMINATION FOR MISCALLED RUSSIANS IS THE WEAPON TO BEAT THE KREMLIN

(By Leonard J. Snow)

The United States has available today a weapon which can beat the evil men in the Kremlin to their knees, save the world from the menace of Red imperialism, and bring political and spiritual freedom to the slave population of the Soviet Empire itself. Best of all, use of this weapon may very well bring all these blessings without precipitating the horrors of a third world war.

For this weapon is neither a super atom bomb nor a powerful jet plane of new design. In fact, it is not a weapon of mass destruction at all but a long overlooked principle of simple justice which, properly applied, can be of immense benefit, not alone to this country and its allies, but also to the inhabitants of the Soviet Union.

The weapon is the principle of national self-determination which gives each distinctive people in the world the right to live as a free nation, under a government of its own choice, and within the territory it inhabits. If self-determination were applied to the crazy-quilt pattern of different races and nations which make up the population of the Soviet Union, at least two dozen, perhaps more, independent states would replace the single giant Communist slave empire that exists today.

The "Union of Soviet Socialist Republics" and "Russia" are neither synonyms nor equivalent terms, although most Americans use them interchangeably. Actually, of course, the Soviet Union, as the name indicates, is a federation of many nations and peoples, of which the group known as the Russians is the largest. But one basic fact that the name does not indicate is that the federation is an involuntary one, produced by Russian conquest over a period of hundreds of years, and not by the free choice of the federated peoples. As a matter of fact about half of the present population of the Soviet Union—that half of the 200,000,000 inhabitants who are ethnologically non-Russian—is anxious to cast off its connection with Moscow.

Among these non-Russians are from thirty-five to forty million Ukrainians and about 10,000,000 Byelorussians, who are related to the Russians to about the same degree that the Dutch or the Swedes are related to the Germans. There are fifty or more million other people in Stalin's empire—among them Tartars, Buryat Mongols, Armenians, Turkestanians, and Finns—who differ from the Russians as greatly as the Chinese do from the French.

If the United States, which has always firmly refused to recognize territorial changes produced by aggression and conquest, comes out bluntly as an advocate of self-determination for these minorities in the Soviet Union, it will gain their sympathy in the cold war. If the cold war becomes a shooting war, this country will gain the active cooperation of hundreds of thousands of desperate representatives of these minorities who will regard war between the Soviet Union and the West as a golden opportunity to launch their own fight for freedom from Moscow's chains.

These statements are neither speculation nor wishful thinking. They are based on the studies of hardheaded policy-making officials in Washington who have the benefit of access to our intelligence files.

These men are convinced that the minorities incorporated into the Soviet Union's huge population are straining at the bonds which tie them to the ruthless Communist dictatorship. Knowledge that the United States recognizes their right to independence and a national existence of their own will cause these people to hamstring Moscow's war plans by sabotage, large-scale desertions from the Red army, and even open revolt against the Communists. It is possible that by these actions alone Stalin's empire can be broken up from within. But, even if Stalin is foolish enough to resort to war in the face of these domestic difficulties, sponsorship and active encouragement of self-determination will give the United States and its allies the assurance that they will have an easier war to fight and win.

The immediate consequence of a breakup of the Communist empire will be to lift the shadow of fear from this planet because most of the new states which would emerge will desire nothing better than to live in complete friendship and harmony with the rest of the world. Even if the Communists retain control of one of the new states, their power to do harm through conquest and aggression, which today comes from the extent of the empire they hold and its enormous human and industrial resources, will be eliminated. Under self-determination, the most the Communists may manage to keep for themselves—and that is doubtful—is a Russian state of about 90,000,000 people centering around Moscow.

There is a tendency to forget that Soviet expansion and conquest is not a new phenomenon but a continuation of the savage Russian imperialism which was the order of the day under the Czarist empire. For instance, the Caucasus region has belonged to Moscow for less than 100 years. Bringing the Caucasus into the Russian fold was not a peaceful process of bringing civilization to a savage area. It was a deliberately planned policy of conquest in which the preponderant military strength of semibarbaric Moscow crushed the ancient Christian kingdom of Georgia and in so doing left behind wounds which have never healed.

Just after the end of World War II, one of the Soviet attaches on duty at the Red Embassy in Washington was an admiral of Georgian extraction. He must remain anonymous because he has since returned to the Soviet Union. This man told his American friends that the spirit of nationalism and the desire for independence from Moscow have never disappeared in his homeland of Georgia. The people of Georgia, he said, were biding their time and waiting for their chance to achieve freedom. They will welcome, with undying gratitude, the knowledge that their aspirations were looked on with sympathy by the West and they will co-operate fully in any feasible plan to bring the Red slave empire to an end.

The Communists have been slightly more subtle in following the Czarist Russian policy of imperialism. Ostensibly they have encouraged minority cultures but, by placing Muscovite gauleiters at the helm in each minority area, they have attained the same net effect as the Czarists: The minorities have been allowed autonomy in unimportant affairs but are tied to Moscow's apron strings in matters that count. Like the Czarists, the Communists bleed the minority areas white of their produce and raw materials for the benefit of the majority Russians.

The attitude of the minorities toward their Russian masters is best illustrated by their immediate response to the fall of the Russian Czar in March 1917. When that happened, most of the minority peoples, living on the periphery of the Czarist Empire, in the west, the east, and to the south, declared their independence and established free and usually republican governments. In other words, the minorities took advantage without delay of the collapse of Moscow's power to free themselves from any connection with the Russians although the democratic successors to the Czarist state promised them sympathetic treatment and a large measure of autonomy under locally chosen governments.

In November 1917, when Lenin and his Bolsheviks overthrew the provisional Kerensky government, despite the difficulties caused by the German occupation of considerable Russian territory, literally dozens of independent states had replaced the old empire. In Eastern Europe there was a free Ukrain and a free White Russia. In the Caucasus, and along the shores of the Caspian Sea, the Georgians, the Armenians, and half a dozen other races, declared their independence. In the Crimea, a Tartar state was formed. Siberia was the location of no less than five free states. The far-off Asiatic possessions of the Czar reverted to their former independent status. The Baltic States—Latvia, Lithuania, and Estonia—joined Finland in asserting their independence.

Nothing was left of the despotically ruled empire but those territories inhabited by the Russians themselves.

The Communist masters of Russia, although they gave lip service to the principle of self-determination, were then, as now, shrewd men who realized that reconquest of the old Czarist empire would give them a fine start on their plan to conquer the world for Marxism. They also realized that world opinion would not give much support to the new states because the West, not having learned to differentiate between the various distinctive ethnological groups living in the former territories of the Czar, lumped them together as Russian and looked on their wars as so many domestic quarrels.

So Lenin and his Bolsheviks sent their armies against one new state after another and reannexed their territory, this time as part of a Communist empire.

By 1925 the last of the independent states was crushed and the capitals of Europe were crowded with political refugees from the ruthless vengeance of the new Communist empire.

It is these political refugees—and those who joined them in exile during and after the Second World War—who have kept alive the idea that the way to root out Bolshevism is to offer the hope of freedom to the minorities of the Soviet Union. Between the wars, these exiles learned to recognize that it was their own weakness, caused by their inability to work together against the Communists, rather than the Bolshevik power which destroyed their opportunity for freedom. Many of the exiles decided that only through the close cooperation of all the minorities could they hope to regain their precious independence. They organized political associations which cut across national lines, included representatives from all or nearly all minorities, and set as their goal the restoration of freedom to all.

In Warsaw, for instance, Prof. Roman Smal Stocki, a famous Ukrainian scholar who now teaches at Marquette University, organized the Promethean League with delegates from a baker's dozen of the minorities. Between the wars, the Promethean League disseminated independence propaganda from outside the Soviet Union and fostered a secret underground movement within the Communist empire. The league was shattered by the Second World War, but Prof. Smal Stocki has now reorganized it in this country.

Similar in purpose to the Promethean League is the Anti-Bolshevik Bloc of Nations, organized in the Ukraine in 1943 by underground representatives of the minorities who were then fighting against both the Nazi invaders and the Soviet partisan bands. The ABN now maintains its headquarters in Edinburgh.

The existence of such organizations among the thousands of exiles from the Soviet Union, plus information brought to Washington from inside the Soviet Union by agents of our various official intelligence services, has convinced many American Government officials that a strong demand for freedom exists among the Soviet minorities. There are available on-the-spot reports which reveal that Soviet treatment of its Central Asian minorities, for example, is extremely brutal, and that, as a result, a major part of the population of this area is especially anxious to cast off the Soviet yoke.

Although the constitution of the Soviet Union, the so-called Stalin constitution of 1936, provides for self-government in minority areas of the country, our officials know that in every case the majority of highly placed administrators are Russian carpetbaggers. Only the lowest posts in the administrative echelons are open to the minority representatives.

In the western areas of the Soviet Union, particularly in the Ukraine and in the former Baltic States, Soviet brutality has caused the extermination of a large part of the population and the wholesale transference of other millions to the slave labor camps. These facts are well known to newspaper readers from the charges brought against the Bolsheviks before the United Nations by exiles from these regions. Secret information in the possession of the United States Government confirms these charges in every respect.

If there is further doubt that the minorities of the Soviet Union are eager for freedom, two postwar acts of Stalin's government should serve to dispel the notion. When the United Nations was organized, Stalin thought it necessary to make concessions to minority feelings by insisting that the Soviet Ukraine and the Soviet White Russian Republic should have their own representatives in the General Assembly as well as their own foreign ministers and separate armies. Of course, by placing Communists in charge of these important posts, Stalin has assured himself that whatever autonomy these states have gained has been on paper only.

In its second action, the Soviet Government deliberately destroyed several of the minorities which had enjoyed a slight degree of autonomy under the watchful eyes of Russian overseers. Among these victims were three autonomous republics—two Tatar and one German—located in the Crimea. The population of these regions was shipped to the slave labor camps of the Arctic and their territory was transferred to other minorities on the pretext that these people had cooperated with the Nazis during the war.

Doubtless this was partly true. Most of the minority peoples in the areas occupied by the Germans early in the war did cooperate with the invaders. But they did this not because they favored Hitler's cause, but because they looked upon the war as a God-given opportunity for them to gain their freedom from the men in the Kremlin. Students of Eastern European affairs agree that if the Nazis had properly and decently treated the people of the Soviet Union in the areas occupied by the German Army, Stalin would have lost the war. When the Germans first came in they were welcomed because anything seemed better to these slaves of the Communists than the system under which they had been living. But when the minorities understood that the Germans were coming in as masters rather than as liberators, they turned against them.

Knowing these facts, many responsible Washington officials are convinced that it would be a strategically wise move for this country to announce to the minorities that we look with approval on their aspirations for freedom and will do all in our power to help them achieve it. Such a proclamation, which would pay back the Communists in their own coin because they are constantly urging the people of the West to revolt against their governments, would cause so much strife and dissension within the Soviet Union, as the minorities regained their hope of freedom, that Stalin would be kept too busy to think of foreign adventures.

The Red army would be needed to strengthen local garrisons and quell domestic insurrections instead of for foreign conquest. But since the proportion of minority troops in the Red army is the same as in the general population, it would not be long before Stalin's troops began to join the civilian population in the quest for freedom. When that happens, the break-up of the Soviet state, founded as it is on military power and not the will of the people, will follow inevitably.

Thus there is a good chance that if this country comes out for self-determination and proclaims it by every propaganda means we possess—by radio, leaflet, and word of mouth—we will never have to fight a war with the Communists, who bear within them the seeds of their own destruction. The minority exiles in this country and in Western Europe are the means by which we can carry these propaganda messages to the enslaved people of the Soviet Union. They understand the aspirations of their fellow countrymen at home. Their very presence in the West is proof that the minorities enthralled to the Russian Communists are anxious for the opportunity to throw off the Soviet yoke. Certainly we will pay a cheaper price in blood and treasure for the destruction of Red Russia's imperialism if we give these men the chance they seek to sow the seeds of liberty in the heart of the Soviet Union.

If we decide to use this plan, there is always the possibility that war with the Communists will come before it can be put into effect and bear its fruit. If that is the case, we will find that advocacy of self-determination will create a pro-United States climate of opinion in the minority areas of the Soviet Union. We will be fighting the Soviets with one will and one determination; they will be fighting us with a divided and unhappy people.

Washington knows these facts but hesitates to take the necessary steps because it is not sure the American people are sufficiently acquainted with Russian history to understand that the break-up of the Soviet Empire would be an act of historical justice. If the people of this country show that they understand and support self-determination for Soviet minorities, Washington will fall in line.

UKRAINIANS URGE MORE "VOICE" AID—SESSIONS HERE ALSO ASK HELP TO UNDERGROUND FORCES IN EUROPE

The all-out and unqualified support to the United States Government in its ever-increasing efforts to oppose the aggressive and imperialistic policies of Soviet Russia, whose ultimate and decisive aim is the imposition of slavery upon this country, was pledged by the Ukrainian Congress Committee of America at the conclusion of its 2-day annual meeting at the Hotel Statler, Manhattan, Sunday.

The Ukrainian Congress Committee of America, representing over a million citizens of Ukrainian birth or origin and having branches in three quarters of the United States, has been vigorously campaigning against Soviet Russia's enslavement of Ukrainia and other non-Russian countries of Eastern Europe, and advocating the application of the principles of self-determination to all peoples subjugated by the Kremlin.

The main feature of the meeting was the report of the president of the organization, Dr. Lev E. Dobriansky, professor of economics at Georgetown University, Washington, D. C.

Dr. Dobriansky stated that one of the most gratifying effects of the work of the committee was the growing realization in both governmental and congressional circles, of the urgent need of relying on the subjugated peoples, such as the Ukrainians who, fighting for the liberation of their country from Soviet Russia, are in a true sense allies of western freedom.

URGE JOINING ANTIRED FORCES

A series of resolutions was voted by the meeting. One of them called for the intensification of efforts in disseminating vital data on developments inside the Soviet Union, which data the committee is receiving from various Ukrainian organizations both inside and outside the iron curtain and imparting as invaluable advance information to our Government, while another called upon similar organizations to unite for an over-all coordination of anti-Communist efforts.

Another resolution deplored the inefficacy of the Voice of America in making genuine appeals to the peoples of the Soviet Union, whose predominant aspirations for liberation from the Russian imperialistic yoke is potentially the most powerful and effective weapon against the Soviet aggressor.

It was emphasized that the Ukrainian Congress Committee, guided by a sense of Christian charity and compassion, observes a well grounded distinction between a historically undemocratic Russian leadership, now in the form of Soviet communism, and the perennially victimized common Russian people; another part of the same resolution castigated those irresponsible anti-Communist Russian political leaders for whom the conservation of the Russian territorial empire is more important than the defeat of Soviet communism.

Finally, the committee called for American aid of every description for the underground Ukrainian Insurgent Army (UPA), which is the vanguard of the anti-Communist forces behind the iron curtain, and which collaborates intimately with the known Slovak, Lithuanian, and Polish underground resistance systems, thus creating a vast reservoir of anti-Soviet and anti-Communist forces behind the iron curtain.

The committee also called for the application of the basic American principle in foreign policy, namely, the principle of national self-determination, to be applied to all peoples, large and small, as consistent with our democratic beliefs and the principles of international justice, and endorsed the recent policy proposed by Harold E. Stassen, president of the University of Pennsylvania, who advocated the complete and true sovereignty and independence of nine eastern European countries, now in Soviet slavery, among which in the first place was Ukraine, the longest and most fiercely oppressed victim of Soviet Russia.

"Washington in a State of Unparalleled Confusion" Says Mr. Felix Morley

OF

OF WISCONSIN

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Monday, April 2, 1951

Mr. SMITH of Wisconsin. Mr. Speaker, Felix Morley is an outstanding journalist and author. Writing in Barron's for March 19, he calls attention to Washington scandals and says they are the country's peril. And indeed they are, Mr. Speaker, for the people are alarmed about present conditions which President Truman ignores. Recently he was bold enough to say that he is surrounded by "honorable men."

Under leave to extend my remarks, I am including Mr. Morley's article:

"ALL HONORABLE MEN"—THE WASHINGTON SCANDALS ARE THE COUNTRY'S PERIL

(By Felix Morley)

Under the English system, a vote like that in the House last week on the RFC would probably have brought on a general election.

By the narrow margin of 200 to 197, with 36 absentees, the Representatives favored a Republican resolution to reject President Truman's plan for reorganizing this now unsavory lending agency. It was a clear vote of no confidence. The resolution said, in effect, that reorganization of the RFC should be tabled because the national interest demands its complete abolition; the sooner, the better.

Because the Reorganization Act, under which the vote was taken, requires a majority of the entire House membership, the resolution failed. But that was only because 18 Republicans were absent when the vote was taken. If the fate of the administration had actually been at stake, the GOP whips would have had those absentees in line. Then, with the defections from the Democratic side, the RFC would have been on the way out. It may be, anyway, if the Senate approves the Byrd resolution condemning this agency's "sordid record of fiscal vandalism."

The failure of last week's congressional attack on the RFC is important because it emphasizes that Congress is relatively powerless against entrenched corruption. The inflexible term of executive office is a weakness, as well as a strength, in our governmental system. Short of the process of impeachment, there is no way in which the Truman administration can be ousted prior to November 1952. It is close to 2 years before another President can take office. Until then the Nation must put up with what it has.

When Mr. Truman returns, next week, from his March vacation at Key West he will find Washington in a state of unparalleled confusion. On every sector of the mobilization front matters are definitely getting out of control.

The problems of the Economic Stabilization Agency, boycotted by organized labor, increase daily. Its able publicity director sadly admits that he is too busy releasing the kaleidoscopic regulations to know whether or not they are observed, or even understood, by those on whom they are so prolifically showered.

The issue of military assistance to our European allies is still far from settled. At best it will be some weeks before General Eisenhower has any more American troops under his command, unless they are sent without congressional approval. In spite of protracted hearings, neither House has as yet approved the administration request for a free hand in this matter. And indications are strong that the free hand will not be granted.

The Senate has acted to extend the draft and inaugurate UMT. But the House is only now completing committee consideration of this legislation, rendered urgent by the fact that the present draft law has less than 3 months to run.

Although Seoul is again happily in our hands, the Department of State has revealed no plan for ending the Korean war. In a military sense this has been going as well as could be hoped, but General MacArthur has given public warning that stalemate is the best he can achieve within the present policy setup. Meantime, the UN seems to have washed its hands of its Korean problem child. The only current news from UN is that the windows in the new Secretariat building will have to be weatherstripped to keep out New York's soot and grime.

Weatherstripping, however, will not avail to exclude the dirt that has been sifting into so many Government agencies here in Washington. The current revelations of official connivance in racketeering of many kinds are appalling to honorable leaders in both political parties.

It is a Democratic Senator, FULBRIGHT of Arkansas, who seriously suggests "a general investigation of the moral level" of the Federal Government. And since this suggestion we have had, inter alia, the testimony of the official who said last week that nothing but friendship prompted him to support a highly dubious RFC loan: "Maybe I'm naive or something but that doesn't seem wrong to me."

The revelations brought out by the RFC and crime investigations, and in both there is much still to come, are highly disturbing because, in the words of Senator NIXON they "show a complete lack of understanding of what is morally right and proper for a Government employee."

From the domestic viewpoint the scandals are causing a mistrust of government which, while perhaps fundamentally healthy, is materially hampering the conduct of emergency business.

The Fulbright committee reports that its "hearings have not been successful in establishing the real reasons why RFC loans were made." And the suspicion thus engendered carries over into other fields. It has already led to the charge that the administration wants four more divisions for Europe just as a first installment. The feeling grows that all the administration policies are devious and that Congress should therefore block rather than cooperate.

The results is obstruction of policies that are wise as well as those that have been demonstrably shameful.

Obstruction means delay—in matters that demand action as well as in those where inaction is desirable. Tax legislation is a case in point. Clearly the defense effort demands fundamental reexamination of the tax structure and it had been expected that the Congress would have come to grips with this problem before Easter. The present state of the calendar indicates that it will be May, or even later, before any new tax legislation can be cleared by the House.

The picture is equally unhealthy from the viewpoint of American prestige abroad. President Truman says that his foreign policy aims to insure that people everywhere have the things that are necessary to make life worth while and that they live by the moral code in which they believe.

In the light of the mink coat and other revelations these words have an ambiguous ring, and lead to cynical interpretation. Yet the defense effort depends, before anything else, on vital faith and conviction in regard to the values we mobilize to defend.

After 19 years of uninterrupted power the Dmocratic administration has not merely lost its spiritual elan, but is more and more giving evidence of clinging to power primarily for its fruits, corrupt or otherwise. That would be serious if we had not assumed a position of world leadership. It is doubly serious when the future of civilization depends on a consistency between what we say and what we do.

Fortunately, the real Voice of America does not emanate from Washington. It speaks most clearly in the countless communities where men and women meet their daily tasks with no thought other than doing the job at hand as well as possible. The symbolic significance of Easter was never more important to the American people than this year, when the prospects of an improvement in direction from the center of political power are distinctly dim.

Proposed Virgin Islands Organic Act—Address By Gov. Morris de Castro

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. W. F. NORRELL

OF ARKANSAS

Tuesday, April 3, 1951

Mr. NORRELL. Mr. Speaker, while in the Virgin Islands on official business for the Committee on Appropriations on March 27, 1951, I heard Gov. Morris F. de Castro, of the Virgin Islands, deliver an address on the radio. He expressed his views on the subject of a proposed new organic act dealing with the governing and financing of the Virgin Islands. I believe the views he expressed may be of interest to Members and others. I wish to make it clear that my inclusion here of the Governor's speech is not to be construed as endorsement or approval by me of his views, but under leave to extend my remarks, I include herewith as a matter of public interest a copy of Governor de Castro's radio address:

Fellow citizens of the Virgin Islands, tonight I am going to discuss the proposed organic act for the Virgin Islands, as introduced in the House of Representatives by Congressman MURDOCK on February 14 this year, and give you my views, simply and clearly, on the essential provisions which I believe should be given consideration in any change which may be made in our basic law. In accordance with my determination to declare my position on any public question, I shall face the issues here squarely and factually. I sincerely hope that those who may not agree with me will recognize that it is my right and duty to state my views, however controversial they may be.

Let me preface my remarks by saying that the Congress of the United States will decide finally what form of constitution will be provided for the people of the Virgin Islands. This is so because Congress has the supreme right of legislation and of government for the insular possessions of the United States. This is so, also, because whatever form of government we get will directly affect the relationships between these islands and their sovereign, the United States of America. Members of Congress will listen respectfully to the proposals which will be submittted by our legislative assembly, by the Governor, and by various citizens of the islands but, in the final analysis, the decision will be theirs, not ours. We shall hope that the final decisions of Congress will embody our desires and our aspirations.

It is necessary, therefore, that the people of the islands should think these problems through calmly, carefully, and deliberately. We should make every effort to present a united front at the congressional hearings which will undoubtedly be held here in the islands later this year. We should not let such disturbing or vexing questions as to who might lose office in the executive or legislative branches of the government by a new organic act color our thinking or confuse our facts. We must deal with principles, not with personalities. We should bear in mind that the fewer problems we indicate, the fewer differences we present, the better will be the opportunity to convince Members of Congress of what our real needs are and just what are our true aspirations.

Let us begin then with the premise that the people of the Virgin Islands, under the Organic Act of 1936, have enjoyed and are still enjoying a good measure of autonomy. With the exception of the right to elect our own Governor and to vote in national elections, our people have all the benefits and the privileges of American citizens. We have a bill of rights roughly equivalent to that of the Federal Constitution, including freedom of speech, freedom of the press, and freedom of worship. We have universal franchise through which our own legislatures, with very broad legislative powers, are elected. A generous National Government has helped us provide a reasonable degree of freedom from want.

What, then, shall we seek in our new organic act? In answering this question, it is important to observe that what we seek is not the ultimate answer. The new organic act will undoubtedly be a composite of the things we seek in order to grant us greater autonomy and the things which the National Government will require in order to make us more self-supporting, more economical of operation, and more responsible and effective in our relationships with the United States. There are a great many details which go into the preparation of a new organic act which need not concern us here. These are the details of draftsmanship which must be left to legal technicians. We need concern ourselves only with a few basic considerations. After these shall have been determined, the rest is easy. I should now like to compare these basic points contained in the proposed organic act now before Congress with our present organic act, analyze them, and give you my own views upon each of them.

Here they are: The Murdock bill proposed:

1. An elected governor in 1953. We have an appointed governor now.

2. A single legislature in 1951. We have three legislatures now. Legislative sessions of 60 days in each year with compensation to be paid during sessions only. We have continuous sessions with annual salaries for our legislators now. Election of members of the single legislature from each island constituting a district with five members at large from all islands. We have now specified numbers of members from town and country districts and specified members at large in each municipality.

3. Abolition of the President's prerogative to act upon local legislation after it has been passed over the Governor's veto. At the present time, the President decides when a bill is passed over the Governor's veto, and the Governor still refuses to approve it.

4. Confirmation of department heads only by the legislature. At present the councils have to confirm all appointees.

5. Return of the internal revenue taxes and no more Federal appropriations. We now receive annual appropriations but not the internal revenue taxes.

6. A single treasury. We have two separate treasuries now, and finally

7. A resident commissioner in 1953. We have none now.

These seven basic principles require serious consideration so that our people may be made fully aware of their many complications and ramifications without which awareness we cannot intelligently make up our minds. Let me now discuss each of these issues.

First and foremost, there is the question of an elective or an appointive governor. I realize that this is perhaps the issue which is the most difficult for me to discuss because I am an appointed governor. It is difficult, also, for the reason that my motives may be so easily impugned. Nevertheless, these times call for honest and courageous leadership and for expressions of honest convictions. I shall, therefore, not hesitate to state my opinion. I am in favor of the ultimate objective of an elective governor. An elective governor is the highest political benefit which the people of these islands may ever hope or expect to achieve. Certainly we cannot hope for statehood or commonwealth status. When Puerto Rico was granted the right to elect its own governor, nearly 50 years after its annexation by the United States, the party system had been well established. Here in the Virgin Islands, 33 years after the purchase of the islands by the United States, only 14 years after universal suffrage was extended here, we have not yet developed the party system of government. In St. Croix last year 30 candidates ran independently for 9 seats in the Council. In a situation such as this an elected governor under present conditions might well not have any party representation in the legislature, resulting in a stalemate in government. I am strongly of the opinion that, before we elect our governor, we need first to develop the party system fully. We need to be more nearly self-supporting. We need to shoulder greater responsibilities in government. In my opinion, our new organic act should provide for an elective governor in a few years when we shall have developed more political maturity and better statesmanship, which we shall need to carry out our responsibilities under a more liberal constitution.

Second, there is the question of a single legislature or of three legislatures, how they shall be elected, and how its members shall be compensated. Here, too, I face a difficult issue because it is so closely connected with incumbents who may question my sincerity of purpose. Yet I must state my opinion candidly. I am in favor of a single legislature, meeting for a stated period each year, and compensated on a per diem basis while in session. I am in favor of election of members to represent each of the three islands, rather than districts within each island. I am in favor of a small board of island commissioners, on an honorary basis, elected from each island, to meet once a month to handle purely local problems. No one can gainsay the fact that three separate legislative bodies, such as we now have, all with full legislative powers, provide a top-heavy, burdensome, and most expensive legislative machinery for 26,000 people. This system has resulted in a per capita legislative cost which is far greater than in any other American community. There is absolutely no need for our legislatures to be in continuous sessions throughout the year. Many States with populations far greater than these islands have legislative sessions every 2 years, with extraordinary sessions at the call of the governor. With due respect to the members of our legislative bodies, I respectfully submit that legislation for 26,000 people can well be enacted during a regular session each year, with such special sessions as emergencies may dictate. We would need to project our budget better. We would need to have a program for the islands. But the legislative participation in such program and in the budget need not provide for active participation in administrative affairs. There must be a clear line of demarcation between the powers of the executive and the powers of the legislature. I am in favor of an adequate per diem for legislators during sessions. This is the method of compensation provided in the new organic act for Guam, just passed by Congress. And we will be deceiving ourselves if we think that we are going to get different treatment. The salaries we pay to our legislators far exceed what is paid in many States. Alabama, with 3,000,000 people, pays its legislators $10 per day during sessions. Arizona pays $8 per day for 60 days, and Arizona's population is 745,000. Connecticut pays $600 every 2 years. Florida pays $10 per day during sessions. Missouri, with a population of 4,000,000, pays $125 per month. Alaska pays $15 per day, and Alaska's population is 105,000. West Virginia pays $500 annually.

I believe that it is unnecessary to continue the system of electing representatives for the town and country districts separately and members at large in each island. These Virgin Islands should constitute a strong and unified political entity. It is fallacious to hold that any responsible citizen of St. Croix, for example, may not adequately represent Christiansted and Frederiksted and the country districts as well. It is fallacious to hold that any responsible leader in St. Thomas may not represent adequately the town and the country districts of the island of St. Thomas. Let us get away from the horse-and-buggy days. Let us advance our thinking as the times have advanced. In my opinion, nothing would solidify our islands more than election of members of the legislature on an island-wide basis. We should have proportional representation in our legislature, namely, one member for so many thousand population. However, to give St. Croix the same number of members as St. Thomas, we might for the present compromise with four members to be elected from St. Croix, four from St. Thomas, one from St. John, and six members at large, with the provision that not more than three of the members at large shall be from any one island.

Third is the issue of full legislative right to override executive vetoes. At present there is the provision that if any bill is passed over the Governor's veto, the Governor may send it to the President for final action. Incidentally, this still remains in Puerto Rico's constitution. I am in favor of allowing bills passed over the Governor's veto to become law by reason of the overriding of the veto. When members of the legislature have this power, which they do not have now, they will have to exercise more mature judgment and greater political skill. This is a step to provide political maturity which should be taken now.

Fourth is confirmation of officials and employees by the legislature. I am in favor of limiting legislative confirmation to policy-making officials. The present system whereby all executive appointments, from custodial to policy-making employees, must be confirmed by the legislature is a vicious one. It must be changed, for it defeats the very objectives of a true merit system. It exists in no other American community. It is an effective bar to good government. It brings politics into our civil service. I agree that all department heads, when we pay their salaries, and all policy-making officials should be confirmed, but certainly not the members of the custodial, clerical, and professional services.

Fifth is the return of the internal revenue taxes. I am in favor of the return of these taxes to the Virgin Islands treasury. I am also in favor of a reduced central administration to be paid from annual Federal appropriations. I am certain that the only way we will get this great benefit, and I believe we can get it this year, is for us all to agree that the Congress should for the time being provide reasonable limitations as to the broad use of the funds so returned to the Virgin Islands. I agree with the provisions of the Murdock bill that the internal revenue taxes may be expended under the supervision of the legislature after the broad purposes and objects of expenditure shall have been approved annually by the President. In other words, the President would say that so much of these funds would be spent each year for operating expenses of the government of the Virgin Islands, so much of the funds for capital improvements, and so much for reserve funds. Thereafter, the legislature would budget the funds and provide for the details of their expenditure but circumscribed by the broad purposes fixed by the President.

Sixth is the question of a single treasury. I am in favor of a single treasury. In a new form of government, this would be academic. It is elementary that in a government for the islands as a whole, funds raised in one island may be expended for the benefit and government of the entire group of islands. This change requires no further justification or explanation. It is bound to come.

And, finally, is the provision for a Resident Commissioner. I am, of course, in favor of the creation of a Resident Commissioner for the islands. We urgently need such representation in Washington. However, we also know that in the recently enacted Organic Act for Guam, Congress deleted the provision for a Resident Commissioner. We should ask for this great benefit, and justify it as strongly as possible.

I have given you my views on the most important provisions of a new constitution. Let me conclude by stating that I believe we have the best opportunity we have ever had of getting the internal-revenue taxes—millions of dollars annually returned to us for the benefit and government of our islands if we can agree on the main provisions of a new organic act which will satisfy Congress and at the same time give us a better governmental structure. And these main provisions, I repeat, should be a single legislature, with specified annual sessions, to be elected in 1952; representation by islands instead of by districts within islands; an honorary board of commissioners sitting once a month to pass on purely local matters; confirmation of policy-making employees only; a single treasury effective immediately; and ultimately the election of the Governor, when we shall have developed a responsive and responsible elective system and achieved the necessary political maturity to provide for a fully autonomous government.

I most earnestly urge that we set aside all sectional and provincial differences and present a united and intelligent as well as forward-looking approach to the Congressmen who will preside over the organic act hearings. This is a year, my fellow citizens, of possible great achievements for the people of the Virgin Islands. My considered judgment is that if we unite on a program such as I have outlined, we shall have an excellent opportunity of making a significant political and economic gain before the close of the year. May I leave with you this thought: "Wisdom in self-government develops slowly, with exercise." I thank you.

Sheer Wastage

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. DWIGHT L. ROGERS
OF FLORIDA
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Tuesday, April 3, 1951

Mr. ROGERS of Florida. Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my remarks in the Appendix of the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD, I am including herein a letter from William R. Spear, editor of the Fort Myers News-Press, a daily paper printed in my district. I also include an editorial entitled "Sheer Wastage" which points out very forcefully the waste of the taxpayers' money in addition to the unnecessary waste of newspaper prints which is causing a paper shortage. Certainly the committee of the Congress having jurisdiction over this subject matter should look carefully into the complaint made by Editor Spear, and perhaps the newsprint and paper situation could be relieved so as to permit the newspapers of this Nation to obtain the newsprint they need. I desire to recommend this editorial to your careful reading and to commend Editor Spear for this constructive criticism:

FORT MYERS NEWS-PRESS,
Fort Myers, Fla., March 9, 1951.

Representative DWIGHT L. ROGERS,
House Office Building,
Washington, D. C.

DEAR DWIGHT: I wish you'd take a look at the enclosed material and the envelopes it was mailed in.

Every few days I get one of these releases in one of these expensive manila envelopes, which, of course, go into the wastebasket. While you may not be a newspaperman, you can readily see that it is of no news value whatever. Since it comes to the News-Press,

I assume it is sent to all the other papers of the United States too, and I will guarantee you that no paper, not even the New York Times, prints it.

Today, in one single mail, I received these three separate envelopes, containing the releases I enclose, and I just couldn't refrain from squawking to my Congressman about it.

In these times when newspapers are desperately hard up for enough newsprint to print their papers on, and some have even had to curtail their service to their readers because of the shortage, it seems outrageous to me for the Government to waste expensive paper in this manner—and pure waste is what it is—not to mention the expense.

Sincerely yours,

BILL SPEAR.

SHEER WASTAGE

Would you like to read a speech on forced labor that runs 14 legal-size pages of single-spaced typing which some man named Walter Kotschnig delivered before the United Nations Economic and Social Council in Santiago, Chile, March 15? Would you like the paper to leave out the news about the school board and the city council, the society personals, and some of the sports to make room for printing this 14-page speech for you?

You wouldn't? Why, that's amazing—to the Government, that is. The Government apparently thought you would, for it has mimeographed this speech and mailed it to the News-Press and also, presumably, to the 1,771 other daily papers in the United States. It was mailed, moreover, in a heavy kraft envelope of the finest quality made, a big envelope 10 by 15 inches (1 foot 3 inches long). These envelopes, even when bought in lots of 10,000, are listed in the printing catalog at about 1½ cents apiece, not counting the cost of the printing on it. It would cost a private individual 9 cents for the postage alone, but the Government, of course, mails it "free"—meaning at the taxpayers' expense. Counting in the cost of mimeographing and handling, it cost considerable for the Government to send this to the News-Press, where it wound up in the wastebasket, and to all the other papers which, you can be certain, treated it similarly.

This material was mailed out by the United States mission to the United Nations, and, if you think that's wasteful, read on. This was but one such mailing from this outfit. Every few days others arrived—all equally worthless. In one single mail the other day three separate releases of this nature were received—all separately mailed in three of those huge, expensive kraft envelopes.

This is just from the United States mission to the United Nations—one single Government agency. There are scores of other Government agencies and most of them bombard the newspapers of the country with propaganda and press releases that have no value whatever. The flood is so heavy that actually it takes a good deal of time by somebody on the staff of the paper just to open all this mail and see what it is.

Aside from the sheer waste of the taxpayers' money which this involves, there are two other aspects of the matter that make it outrageous. One is the postal deficit. If all this worthless postage-free material with which the Government bureaus flood the mails were eliminated, it seems quite likely that the Post Office Department could operate in the black without the new increase in postage rates which President Truman has now proposed. The second is the paper shortage. Newspapers are desperately hard up for newsprint. Some have had to ration circulation and advertising. Every paper, including the News-Press, feels the pinch. Yet the Government finds plenty of paper to waste in this manner.

Not Just a Bunch of Figures

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. WALTER NORBLAD

OF OREGON

Thursday, March 22, 1951

Mr. NORBLAD. Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my remarks, I include herewith an editorial by Robert Letts Jones in the Salem (Oreg.) Capital Journal, which further expresses the viewpoint of that community in the pending CAB-West Coast Airlines case:

NOT JUST A BUNCH OF FIGURES

For a company that wants to serve Salem, West Coast Airlines shows a peculiar attitude.

In the case before the Civil Aeronautics Board that has been going on for almost 2 years, West Coast Airlines goes along with the CAB suggestion that the feeder-line service quit serving McMinnville and move operations to Salem instead. But in putting Oregon's capital on its route West Coast would push United Air Lines out.

In summing up its position West Coast admits that passenger traffic into and out of McMinnville for last year "obviously would not begin" to cover costs of maintaining a station. There is no written consideration given the people of the city as far as expenses of McMinnville in providing an airport. The feeder line assumes that if passengers of that city want air service those passengers can travel either to Portland or to Salem, if West Coast is permitted here.

When it comes to the advantages of coming to Salem, West Coast Airline considers the 1948 figures of United Air Lines serving the capital. Instead of the 1948 figures, those of 1950 in relation to 4 or 5 years ago should be considered if the city's welfare and future are to be given any consideration at all. For instance, air cargo or air freight originated on United Air Lines out of or into Salem in 1946 was 6,621 pounds. In contrast to this, poundage figures for the year 1950 were over 420,000 pounds. The total revenue for United service in Salem shows the same growth. In 1945 the airline took in $37,000. By 1950 the revenue figure was $300,000.

West Coast's position is that it, as a feeder line, should be permitted to be the only service for the capital because it has other stations in Oregon. But so does United. Futhermore, West Coast claims the traffic potential of Salem is not very substantial. If Salem doesn't look attractive to West Coast, why does that feeder line want to come into Oregon's capital and second city in size as the only air transport service? West Coast should have asked to come in as a supplementary service, not as the only one.

Salem's position is the same as it has repeatedly been: This city needs United Air Lines main-line service. The figures of passengers, revenue, and air cargo and freight show how this city has used United. Is the fact that the Salem station rates as seventh of all cities, regardless of size, served by United west of the Rockies in handling of air freight to be ignored, for instance?

It is hoped the Civil Aeronautics Board will give consideration to the people of this community who would be affected adversely if United sevice were suspended here. The airport with its new developments has been based economically on United service.

It is unfortunate that West Coast treats a city it would like to have on its route as a bunch of outdated figures—with no feeling for wishes in this case.

The Rubber Shortage

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. JOSEPH R. BRYSON

OF SOUTH CAROLINA

Tuesday, April 3, 1951

Mr. BRYSON. Mr. Speaker, inquiries have been coming from my constituents regarding the acute shortage of rubber. Rubber is essential in many of our industrial plants, to say nothing of its more general use in the manufacture of automobile tires and accessories. We are, from all accounts, approaching further restrictions on the use of rubber, as evidenced by the announcement that new automobiles will be equipped with only four tires, whereas, in the past, they were equipped with five tires. There is considerable controversy and confusion among our people regarding the statement recently made by President William O'Neil of the General Tire and Rubber Co. that he had perfected a system whereby the synthetic rubber output could be greatly increased. It was said that this system would almost immediately increase the synthetic rubber supply by 22 percent and that presently the increase in the supply could be easily raised to some 40 percent. By reason of the confusion, red tape, and apparently unnecessary delays on the part of the Government, this producer is now operating in Canada. Surely there is some intelligent, logical approach to this problem, and I urge that immediate action be taken.

Relief for Meat Dealers

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. JAMES F. LIND

OF PENNSYLVANIA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Tuesday, April 3, 1951

Mr. LIND. Mr. Speaker, under unanimous consent, I include in the Appendix of the RECORD the following letter which was sent to me by Mr. Ross L. Bell, chairman of the York County Meat Dealers' Association's board of governors, and which concerns relief for meat dealers now caught in the price squeeze:

YORK, PA., March 31, 1951.

The Honorable JAMES F. LIND,
House of Representatives,
House Office Building,
Washington, D. C.

MY DEAR MR. LIND: While I was in Washington this week on March 27 and 28 I was amazed to find that meetings were still being held with cattlemen and livestock growers discussing the future program on controls. In other words the action and discussions were still in the formative stage.

Even the retail meat advisory committee release dated March 20 was the first meeting of that particular group to discuss dollar and cents prices to be established on beef, veal, lamb, pork, etc.

We had been led to believe that some of these prices were to be released March 16 and 23. This will hardly take place soon while plans for action are still in discussion.

Why then was it necessary to freeze one group on prices so far ahead unless it was done to quiet the clamor of the housewife, or general public at the expense of the retailer, even more so the independent slaughterer, or even the packer.

We were all led to believe that within a month or so something would be forthcoming that would regulate prices at the retail level and also some kind of control this time on the sale of the live animal and its fair distribution.

After it was found to be a much larger task than expected, Mr. DiSalle ignored all requests to unfreeze prices until his program was ready. At all costs he would hold the line and get out prices as soon as possible.

I had a personal interview with Mr. Arval Erickson, Assistant Director, Food Division, Office of Price Stabilization, on Tuesday, March 27, just 25 days after he had written to me promising action. The letter was an answer to a telegram sent to Mr. DiSalle on February 19 stating that we were then feeling the effects of a price squeeze. Pressure was put on packers and wholesalers to roll back increased prices. This did not eliminate the chief headache, namely, the ever-increasing cost of cattle.

Up to the present time nothing has been done about the cattle situation and Mr. Erickson said another 15 days or even another month could pass before this picture could be changed.

I am sorry to say at that rate of slow motion activity, the very law that was enacted to protect the licensed, legitimate meat man will have succeeded in forcing him to the wall. If we continue to operate under freeze prices we are bound to lose more money. In a recent check with some of the men the losses run from $500 to $5,000 over a period of about 30 to 60 days. The only other alternative we have to remain honorable is to close our doors completely. This will be our second experience in doing this. The last time we did this when we found ourselves out of compliance with the second OPA law, we were forced to close down for 30 days before we could get any action from the Government.

At that time we merely asked for a reasonable law so that we might operate with a fair profit. We did not insist upon abolishment of the law, but those in power evidently realized what a messy business the whole thing was and threw it out completely.

With regards to the losses, I can substantiate my claims along this line and they will stand up under investigation. These figures will be taken directly from the book records of some of our members during the past 60 days.

To quote Mr. Charles Bauer, our worthy president of the Retail Meat and Food Dealers, a statement made at Chicago, January 23: "The meat dealer has been and is in a real squeeze, and is tired of being the whipping boy of the entire livestock and meat industry, when the truth is that he is making less money then he did before the inflationary factions took effect."

Several factors enter into this picture to change the volume of business and consequently the over-all profits. I will merely mention some of these and can go into detail later if necessary:

Increased prices on wrapping paper and paper bags.

Increased prices on hog and sheep casings, etc.

Increased rates on all mechanical repair work, etc.

Increased costs on equipment for replacement, new or second-hand.

Increased taxes, social security, unemployment, etc.

We have already taken a 3-cent decrease in fats and oils.

We have already taken a cut of $3.50 on hides.

Wages have been increased in many instances to keep the trained employees from leaving to go into defense work at much higher rates.

Last but not least, as I mentioned before the ever-increasing prices of cattle.

The membership has been very patient and in spite of noticeable increases by others who either in ignorance of the law or in direct disobedience continue to pass on to the customer increased costs. The group have been striving despite losses to abide by the ceiling but they cannot be expected to continue to do this indefinitely. In fact they have now reached the breaking point.

As hard as it would have been for regional office to thoroughly check into violations on price it does seem that at least some measure of protection at this late date could have been given the sincere merchant. However, a release dated March 26 shows the power of enforcement now to be through Washington. For further details read the release on this matter of the above date.

Valuable information was secured back in September and November of 1950. The title known as Utilization of Farm Crops-Meat Products—the Subcommittee on Senate Resolution 36 headed by the Honorable Senator GUY M. GILLETTE, chairman.

The witnesses gave some very valuable information, opinions, and advice based on years of experience in the meat industry or other industry closely related and allied with the meat industry.

In my contacts and through conversation with various members of OPS, I am convinced this valuable information was hardly if ever used to formulate a system of fair and equitable control of meats.

I would like it known here and now I personally am in no position to point a finger at any person or group and judge them responsible for existing conditions either through sins of omission or sins of commission. Rather would I take the position of humility and ask of God's guidance through prayer and humble thought to point the way to lead us out of the ungodly mess.

With a Nation as blessed as ours we should hang our heads in shame that we cannot live together and produce God's gifts in abundance and share them with our fellow men, having no other controls than the law of nature, supply, and demand and the will of God to protect us from unseen dangers.

May God help you to help us.

Very sincerely,

ROSS L. BELL.

House Joint Resolution 180

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. FREDERIC R. COUDERT, JR.
OF NEW YORK
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES
Thursday, March 22, 1951

Mr. COUDERT. Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my remarks, I insert a report contained in the New York Times of Sunday, March 4. This relates to House Joint Resolution 180, which provides a method for removal of the President and the compelling of a general election in great emergencies. I submit it for the thoughtful consideration of Members of Congress and the public:

COUDERT PROPOSES REIN ON PRESIDENT—SEEKS AMENDMENT TO COMPEL HIS RESIGNATION IF CONGRESS VOTES "NO CONFIDENCE"

WASHINGTON, March 3.—A resolution for a constitutional amendment that would require the resignation of the President upon a two-thirds vote of lack of confidence will be introduced next week by Representative FREDERIC R. COUDERT, JR., Republican, of New York, his office announced today.

Mr. COUDERT's bill would authorize the Congress, by a concurrent resolution and on a two-thirds vote of lack of confidence to the President, to compel either the resignation of the President or force a national election for President, Vice President, and Senators and Representatives within 40 days.

Congress would be authorized in a joint session to elect a successor to the President upon his resignation or upon his failure either to resign or call for a national election, according to the terms of Mr. COUDERT's resolution. For this purpose, three-fourths of the Members of both Houses would constitute a quorum, and a majority of the quorum would elect.

In the event of a general election, the President, Vice President, Senators, and Representatives in office when the concurrent resolution was adopted would continue to serve until 14 days after the election. Their successors would then take office. The amendment would not apply to the person holding the office of President at the time of the proposed Coudert amendment.

Thus, if a President, following a no-confidence vote, refused either to resign or call an election, Congress would elect a successor who would serve out his unexpired time. Should he call an election, however, he, the Vice President, and Members of Congress would remain in office until 14 days after the election of their successors, unless reelected.

Under Mr. COUDERT's plan the President would have 10 days from the time of the passing of the concurrent resolution in which to decide on a course of action. Should he call for the new election, it would be held on the seventh Tuesday following the passage of the resolution.

Mr. COUDERT's resolution would have to be approved by a two-thirds vote of each Chamber of Congress. It would then go before the States, and if passed by three-fourths of the State legislatures it would become part of the Constitution.

Speaking of the proposed amendment, Mr. COUDERT said: "I offer this drastic revision of our constitutional system only with the greatest reluctance and in response to the existence of conditions which the founding fathers certainly could not have contemplated.

"Some such action as this is made necessary by the enormous growth of the power of the Presidency over recent years and the corresponding decline of the Congress. This has resulted in a dangerous distortion in our constitutional structure that threatens the security of the United States and the continued existence of free representative government."

SEES PRESIDENT'S ROLE CHANGED

He pointed out that at the beginning of the Korean fighting he had first voiced the need of such legislation. In a speech from the floor, he had charged that if we had had a parliamentary system resembling Great Britain's, the administration "would be out of office overnight."

The British system was discussed at length during the writing of our Constitution, Mr. COUDERT said, but was rejected.

"The situation has changed drastically since that time," he asserted. "At that time the central figure in our governmental set-up was the legislature. The President was to have been an honest-to-goodness executive.

"Now, however, the power of the President has become so strong that Congress cannot do a good job of legislating."

The proposed amendment would be based on the British system "as far as applicable," Mr. COUDERT said. "The principle would be the same. It would give the elected legislature an opportunity to effect a change of government in a great emergency without having to resort to the hopelessly fumbling method of impeachment."

Mr. COUDERT pointed out that under his plan the legislature itself would act as its own control in the use of its "recall" machinery, as Parliament did in England.

"Not many Congressmen would like to face the task of going out to campaign for office again before their terms expired," he explained. "The legislation would not be used much; only in a very great emergency. It would be a weapon we should have in our governmental closet."

Donaldson Air Force Base

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. JOSEPH R. BRYSON
OF SOUTH CAROLINA
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES
Tuesday, April 3, 1951

Mr. BRYSON. Mr. Speaker, I have just received the attached official notice that the air base in my home town, formerly known as the Greenville Air Force Base, Greenville, S. C., has been redesignated as Donaldson Air Force Base. The naming of this splendid air base for Capt. John O. Donaldson was suggested by local citizens. Attached hereto are certain records regarding young Captain Donaldson's distinguished service:

[From the Department of Defense, Office of Public Information, Washington, D. C., April 3, 1951]

AIR FORCE RENAMES GREENVILLE, S. C., BASE

The redesignation of Greenville Air Force Base, Greenville, S. C., as Donaldson Air Force Base in honor of a World War I ace, has been approved by Gen. Hoyt S. Vandenberg, Chief of Staff, United States Air Force.

At present the base is being used as a basic pilot training school for USAF pilots.

Capt. John O. Donaldson was credited with bringing down eight enemy airplanes in the First World War. He was awarded the Distinguished Service Cross, Distinguished Flying Cross (British), and World War I Victory Medal with the Aisne-Marne, Somme Offensive, Ypres-Lys, and Defensive Sector Battle Clasps.

Captain Donaldson was born on May 14, 1897, at Fort Yates, N. Dak. He received his primary- and high-school education in Greenville. He also attended Furman University in Greenville before taking his ground-school training at Cornell University.

He was selected as one of the winners of the Mackay trophy for 1919 for a round-trip transcontinental flight. Lt. Belvin N. Maynard was cowinner of the trophy.

Following his discharge in 1920, Captain Donaldson spent the next 10 years in commercial aviation. He met his death while stunt flying at an air show held at Philadelphia, Pa., on September 7, 1930.

Dedication ceremonies will be held in the near future. His widow, Mrs. John O. Donaldson, of Atlanta, Ga., is expected to participate in those ceremonies.

JOHN O. DONALDSON, NOTED ACE, DIES AS HIS PLANE CRASHES

PHILADELPHIA, PA., September 7.—Capt. John O. Donaldson, one of the most distinguished and skillful aviators in the World War fell with his plane from an altitude of 1,800 feet late today over municipal airport and suffered injuries which resulted in his death in Mercy Hospital an hour and a half later. Donaldson shot down nine enemy planes and two balloons during the war. Forty thousand persons, gathered for the American Legion air races, saw Captain Donaldson's plane go out of commission and crash.

Captain Donaldson was officially credited with nine planes and two balloons during the World War and his heroism was recognized by the decorations he received from five nations. These included the Distinguished Service Cross, the Belgian Croix de Guerre, the British Flying Cross from the Prince of Wales.

WELL KNOWN HERE

Captain Donaldson who was fatally injured in a plane accident yesterday in Philadelphia was a member of a prominent Greenville family. He spent most of his boyhood days here with an aunt, Mrs. N. D. Furman, attending Greenville High School and later Furman University. After leaving Furman he entered Cornell University, quitting his studies to join the Air Forces during the World War. Twice during the war he was shot down behind enemy lines and taken prisoner. Both times he managed to escape and return to his fighting unit. He was said to be the fourth ranking American ace.

Captain Donaldson was associated with the aviation industry most of the time since the war. In 1919 he won first place in the SE-5 class, Transcontinental Air Races. He served as commanding officer of several United States Army training schools in this country and abroad.

JOHN O. DONALDSON

John O. Donaldson died as he lived in an airplane. Countless flying hours and one of the Nation's most distinguished aviation records were behind this Greenville native when he met his death so tragically Sunday in Philadelphia.

As a youth he left Cornell to answer his country's call to arms, choosing aviation and making a name for himself in that field scarcely equaled by any other airman in any army. He was officially credited with bringing down nine German planes and two balloons, and five Allied nations decorated him. Friends said he accomplished more than he was credited with.

John Donaldson died young which added to the tragedy of his death, but into his 34 years was crowded a great deal of achievement, both in military service and in civilian life. He will long be remembered.

MY CAPTURE AND ESCAPE

(By John O. Donaldson)

The following account of the capture by the Germans of a young American aviator, his escape from prison, his recapture and second escape, constitutes one of those extraordinary narratives in which luck, misfortune, and persistent daring have been so artfully ordered by fate as to seem almost increditable. The author, who is the son of Gen. T. Q. Donaldson, of the Inspector General Department at Tours, France, received his instruction in flying at the Ground School, Cornell University, then with the Royal Flying Corps at Toronto, with subsequent gunnery practice in Texas. In June 1918 as a member of the Thirty-second Royal Flying Corps he was sent to France. During the following 2 months he brought down nine German planes, of which he was officially credited with five (i. e., witnessed by four observers). Then Lieutenant Donaldson was awarded the Distinguished Flying Cross by Field Marshal Haig and has received two citations by General Pershing. He has been recommended for the Distinguished Service Cross. The following, given in Lieutenant Donaldson's own words without attempt at embellishment describes his last flight and capture and the extraordinary sequence of subsequent adventures and misadventures culminating in his escape through the electric-wire barrier into Holland.

MAYNARD'S RECORD BEATEN 11 MINUTES—REVIEW OF ACTUAL FLYING TIME MAY GIVE FIRST PLACE TO CAPTAIN DONALDSON

Although 2 days behind Lt. Belvin Maynard in finishing his second transcontinental flight at Mineola, Captain Donaldson may be the winner of the Army's 5,400-mile airplane reliability contest on the technical point of actual flying time.

The performace of these two men, who are far ahead of their 60 competitors on all points of competition, represent superiority in two methods of flying that differ radically. Maynard flies entirely by compass and pays little attention to any but the important landmarks. Donaldson flies near the ground and finds his path entirely by reference to his map and the landmarks.

Captain Donaldson also set a record for a single day's flight with a little scout plane by flying 823 miles from Rock Island to Binghamton.

Captain Donaldson and Lieutenant Maynard will be the guests of the Flying Club today and they, with other winners in the competition, will receive their trophies at an armistice dinner of the Flying Club in the Hotel Commodore on November 11.

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. THOMAS J. LANE
OF MASSACHUSETTS
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES
Tuesday, April 3, 1951

Mr. LANE. Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my remarks, I wish to include the following fine editorial that appeared in the Lynn Telegram-News, Lynn, Mass., April 1, 1951, concerning our colleague, JOHN W. MCCORMACK, House majority leader:

FOR GOD AND COUNTRY

Once again House majority leader JOHN W. MCCORMACK, Democrat, of Massachusetts, proves conclusively that he is one of our great national leaders. In a statesmanlike address delivered this week to the Boston University Law School Alumni Association, Congressman MCCORMACK said that the United States should enter at once into a military alliance with Spain, and that Spain should then become a member of the North Atlantic Pact.

Leader MCCORMACK hinted very strongly that negotiations to that end are already in progress. His position was unequivocal on the point that "differences in form of government should not be permitted to interfere with those steps being taken which are in the national interest of such countries."

With Congressman MCCORMACK's position, we are in hearty accord. All logic, common sense, history, economics, and military strategy dictate that Spain is a natural ally of the United States.

The United States is a member of the United Nations. Spain is not, because of the veto power exercised by Soviet Russia. A communistic, atheistic, totalitarian government such as Soviet Russia can be in the United Nations. A monarchy such as Great Britain with its hereditary line of Kings and Queens can also belong. Canada, Australia, New Zealand, India, Pakistan, and other members of the British Commonwealth of Nations can become members of the U. N., but Spain is outside because the Communists do not like her form of government. Isn't that just too bad? We should placate our enemies and dump our friends.

It couldn't be that this hostility to Spain stems from the fact that Spain is a great Catholic country where communism has made no headway and where communism suffered such a sharp defeat in the Spanish Civil War? The lunatic fringe, the so-called Loyalist Front, has never forgiven Spain for driving out Communist doctrines.

In any European war with Soviet Russia the United States must have Spain as an ally if it is to be in a position to knock out Russia. Anti-Communist Spain lies athwart the gateway to the Mediterranean at Gibraltar. A friendly and stable Spain is necessary to any war operations in that area.

Spain has vital and essential minerals, such as manganese, nickel, beryllium, etc., and it also possesses the Pyrenees, which General Franco and his well-trained troops can hold against any Soviet attack. Behind the Pyrenees lie most vital airfields from which American-based planes and bombers can operate at will.

Spain is the mother country of most of the Latin-American countries. In Latin America there are 158,000,000 persons with whom we do a great business. American investments in Latin America total $4,800,000,000, as compared with $2,100,000,000 in all Europe. Each year the United States buys from Latin America a total of $2,777,000,000 worth of goods, which include $219,000,000 worth of copper and many millions of lead and other vital strategic minerals.

Yes; Leader JOHN W. MCCORMACK is again talking directly to the American people, and in his characteristic, forceful manner he is showing the logical way for America to move in this critical period. We most heartily agree with the concluding remarks of Congressman MCCORMACK's Boston University address:

"With the Communist threat the road to security and peace is through strength. It is by America using its great strength affirmatively and effectively, with the moral forces of the world leading the way, that the probability of another world war in our lifetime might be averted.

"If this is accomplished, the chances for peace for a long period of time faces the world of today and tomorrow."

Address of Mr. Charles K. Finch

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. JAMES J. DELANEY
OF NEW YORK
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES
Tuesday, April 3, 1951

Mr. DELANEY. Mr. Speaker, under unanimous consent to extend my remarks, I include in the RECORD portions of a speech delivered by the president of the Queens County Bar Association, Charles K. Finch, at the association's annual dinner in New York in February:

The men who wrote the Declaration of Independence were the founders of our country; and just as you or your client, in founding a new corporation, would have the privilege of selecting and decreeing the purposes of your new corporation, so too, did the founders of this country have those same privileges; and it is very interesting today, when most people have forgotten the Declaration of Independence, and when most people in this, and other countries are wandering about aimlessly, not knowing where we are going and not even knowing where we are supposed to go, for us to reflect upon it.

To be brief, those who are partially well informed, and all who desire to admit the truth, know, despite all the camouflage and flowery and disputatious speeches rendered daily at the U. N., at Washington, and other similar places, that the struggle, which exists throughout the world today, is between materialistic atheism, more commonly known to some as communism, and the believers in a God. Where did the founders of this country stand on this question of a deity? They, who had the right to tell us our position in said regard—since they drew our Charter and named our purposes—made four significant references to it in the Declaration of Independence, in order not only to teach us their creed, but to set the course which they expected us to follow. In order to underline fundamental truths, which they feared others might discard, they wove into the Declaration of Independence four significant sentences, two at the beginning and two at the end. Each specifically affirms the dependence of every human being on God:

1. The first reads: "When, in the course of human events, it becomes necessary for one people to assume the separate and equal station to which the laws of nature and nature's God entitled them." Here, our forefathers emphasized that the natural law itself depends on God.

2. The second is equally positive: "We hold these truths to be self-evident. That all men are endowed by their Creator with certain unalienable rights."

3. Toward the end of the document the authors appeal "to the Supreme Judge of the World" for the rectitude of their intentions.

4. The Declaration closes "with a firm reliance on the protection of Divine Providence, we mutually pledge to each other our lives, our fortunes, and our sacred honor."

Thereafter, a very good American by the name of George Washington said, referring to freedom of religion, "Every man, conducting himself as a good citizen, and being accountable to God alone for his religious opinions, ought to be protected in worshipping the Diety according to the dictates of his own conscience."

Another great American by the name of Abraham Lincoln said in one of his famous speeches, "I am responsible to the American people, to the Christian world, to history, and on my final account to God." In his immortal Gettysburg address, he said: "That this Nation, under God, shall have a new birth of freedom—and that government of the people, by the people and for the people shall not perish from the earth." He also stated: "We have been the recipients of the choicest bounties of heaven; we have been preserved these many years in peace and prosperity; we have grown in numbers, wealth and power as no other nation has ever grown. But we have forgotten God. We have forgotten the gracious hand which preserved us in peace and enriched and strengthened us, and we have vainly imagined, in the deceitfulness of our hearts, that all these things were produced by some superior wisdom and virtue of our own. Intoxicated with unbroken success, we have become too self-sufficient to feel the necessity of preserving grace, too proud to pray to the God that made us."

Lest it be thought that similar statements are not made by men of our day, I would ask your further indulgence, while I quote from Gen. Jonathan Wainwright, who, on November 22, 1945, the first postwar Thanksgiving, said: "Oh, God, our Father, today we give Thee thanks for the things which we take for granted, for freedom, for security of life, for food and shelter and the presence of loved ones. * * * In gratitude for all those who paid the price of victory, we now ask Thy guidance and we dedicate ourselves to that cause for which they gave their last whole measure of devotion—Lord of Hosts be with us yet, lest we forget."

On Armistice Day in Boston, the distinguished Gen. Omar Bradley warned: "With the monstrous weapons man already has, humanity is in danger of being trapped in this world by its moral adolescents. Our knowledge of science has clearly outstripped our capacity to control it. We have many men of science, but too few men of God. We have grasped the mystery of the atom and rejected the Sermon on the Mount. Man is stumbling blindly through a spiritual darkness while toying with the precarious secrets of life and death. The world has brilliance without wisdom, power without conscience. Ours is a world of nuclear giants and ethical infants. We know more about war than we know about peace, more about killing than we know about living. This is our twentieth century's claim to distinction and to progress."

I would ask, in conclusion, that, if you ever have occasion to remember me, you do so by recalling that Lincoln, in his famous Gettysburg address, said, "This Nation, under God."

Let us, as sworn defenders of these United States of America, read and reread the Declaration of Independence and the Constitution of the United States. Let us listen to and follow the mandate of the founders of this country. Gentlemen, let us advocate the return, and let us return to God."

CHARLES K. FINCH,
President.

Why Are We Staying in Korea?

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. ALBERT M. COLE
OF KANSAS
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES
Tuesday, April 3, 1951

Mr. COLE of Kansas. Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my remarks in the RECORD, I include the following address by Hon. Alf M. Landon at the FFA banquet, Washburn Rural High School, Thursday evening, March 29, 1951:

WHY ARE WE STAYING IN KOREA?

Why are we staying in Korea? What's the shooting all about? I don't know of any question that is of more interest to you and your parents than our foreign situation.

Incidents these days in little, far-off Iran or Albania may affect the life of every American.

Right now, the daily news from Iran is of great significance because it is in Iran that the Dictator Stalin must seek the oil he desperately needs for war. But even if he does get control of the Iranian crude petroleum—that is a long, long way from having the refined product where he must have it for war.

By staying in Korea, every American will have a much different future. That does not mean that we can ease down in our military operations. However, if we had left Korea—part of the free world would not have survived the shock. Free people's governments would have been unbalanced. Some would have been overthrown. By staying in Korea we gave the free governments of the world a needed shot in the arm.

In Korea, we are fighting what may well be another of civilization's decisive battles—because of its effect in the rest of the world.

In modern total warfare, there are no more single decisive battles like Hastings or Tours where the French stopped the Moslem's invasion of Europe.

If Islam had won, there would be no Christian civilization as we know it today—with its conscience to bother us about its defects.

Tours was a battle between the Moslem and Christian ideologies.

Hastings was a battle of one gang of feudal tyrants against another gang. It was nothing but gang war although called one of the decisive battles because it blended the Norman blood with the Saxon.

Probably the most apt historical comparison with Korea is Lignica—the battle where the Poles stopped the army of Genghis Khan and his Mongols invasion of Western Europe. It was a battle of pure brute force on the one side—without any ideologies—against western civilization.

There is no Communist ideologies involved in the Korean War because there is no communism in Russia. There is nothing in Marx and Engels that justifies the brutal slave state of the Soviet.

The warm humanity of Marx and Engels would have revolted at a communism based on the concentration camp—assassination—and wholesale murder.

They would have flayed Stalin the Terrible as one of cruelest tyrants of all time.

No; the Korean War is not between the Communist and Christian ideologies—there is nothing left in Russia of the real communism of Trotsky. There is only a typical tyranny of a few Mongols and Asiatics, masquerading as Communists. They seek to grind the free peoples of the world under their bloody heel—just as they have ground the Russian masses. They use communism for propaganda purposes just as they use foreign minister conferences and the United Nations. It's the dictator of all Russia's biggest lie. It was remarkably successful for a long time in blinding some people to the plain overwhelming evidence of the basic contradiction between the true cooperative society that Marx and the murdered Trotsky envisaged and the barbaric brutality and cruelty of the Kremlin.

Therefore, we are not battling in Korea so much for our social and economic beliefs as we are for political and religious freedom of all peoples—including the Russians themselves.

The issue is government based on just consent of the governed and government based on sheer naked power—on terror of torture and the sword. It is barbarism versus civilization.

It is ironical that the battle for freedom of conscience and the Bill of Rights is being fought in Korea that has known so little of both.

It is being fought in that country—so poor in natural resources and manpower—and without any great strategic value—because it is there the Soviet first chose to tackle in open war the armies of the free peoples of the world.

In Korea, Dictator Stalin sent up a trial balloon to find out what America really would do if he challenged the cold war into a shooting war.

He got a swift and probably surprising answer—in view of previous statements by our President and Secretary of State that Korea lay outside our defense perimeter.

If we had ducked Stalin's challenge, Asiatic terrorism today would be on the march throughout the world under the fake label of communism. Instead, the Korean War is turning out bad for the tyrants of the Kremlin. Resistance to their cruel and oppressive rule is increasing. Purges are taking place among all their satellites. But worst of all for the Kremlin rulers was the disillusionment among so many of their followers in other countries. The Korean aggression was the final blow to many who in spite of everything still clung to their faith in the peaceful intentions of the Kremlin.

Our dramatic change of policy on Korea overnight spurred our own country—and other countries—to prepare their military establishments to fight for survival.

Stalin the Cruel reached his high point the day President Truman announced his Turko-Grecian policy. Of course, that policy also was a complete reversal of our previous policies favoring Soviet expansion everywhere.

Taking advantage of the weakness of the military defenses of the free governments—the lack of unity both at home and between each other—the intense desire for peace—the tyrants of the Kremlin have been running the most colossal bluff in all history.

Just as they have used the fake label of communism for propaganda purposes, they have been clever in creating a false impression of Russia's might and a corresponding disbelief among the free people's governments in their own strength.

We have been too much inclined to see only Russia's strength—and overlook her great weaknesses. We have been seeing only the hole in the doughnut. Stalin might have the manpower, but he certainly lacks the fire power to be another Genghis Khan.

Russia lacks natural resources vital to a successful war—the productive capacity vital to a successful war—and the Kremlin rulers also lack the vital confidence and faith of their own people. Millions of Russians greeted the German Army as a liberator.

The record shows: (1) Actually the Communists did not win by themselves a single major battle against the Germans. The defense of Moscow was won by old man weather and the stupid brutality of the Nazis that alienated the Russians; (2) several hundreds of thousands of Russian soldiers enlisted in the German Army. Germany was able to form about 25 divisions from deserters and residents of occupied territories.

Fear feeds on fear. The most fearful man in all history is the one who reached his goal through terror and violence, murder and assassination.

Only a little more than a hundred years ago, ships of the British Navy did not dare to give their crews shore leave in foreign countries because those crews would desert wholesale.

The tyrants of Russia are now in the same situation as the tyrants of England were then.

The tyrants of Russia fear to send their own troops into battles outside their country. They have not been able to successfully indoctrinate the youth of their satellite countries—except in North Korea.

Of all Russia's satellite countries, North Korea had the lowest level of existence.

Therefore, it was easy to take some three or four hundred thousand Korean boys—by feeding and clothing them better than they had ever known—indoctrinate them in the Soviet's army.

If the Soviet challenge in Korea had worked—then several million Chinese boys would have been indoctrinated the same way—and the dictator of all Russia at that time would have had an army he could depend upon for conquest of the world.

Sounds fantastic you say. Well, no more fantastic than America betraying our own allies to the Kremlin after World War II. We handed the dictator, Stalin, control from the Far East to almost the center of Europe, before we reversed our policy with the Turkish-Grecian loan. By our foreign policy at Yalta we encouraged Stalin's dream of world conquest.

World conditions are ripe for seizure of power by force.

In many countries of the world there is a loss of confidence in government and loss of faith in the religion of our fathers. As a result of two World Wars in rapid succession, explosive forces are at work in all countries.

American civic consciousness is reaching a new low level. Topeka may not have its pastel mink coat but it is a matter of common knowledge that slot machines are operating all over our State in violation of the laws of Kansas. Where that condition exists, public corruption exists. In the legislative session just ended, our State administration evaded its duty to strengthen the arm of our law-enforcement officers.

Just before the collapse of the golden age of Greece, it was possible for an Athenian citizen to eke out an existence without working—through government aid. That same situation exists in America today. Yet more and more Government aid is being adopted in one way or another by both parties not only in Washington but in State capitals as well.

What is the difference between the members of a country club, or some other social organization, who favors slot machines because they mean cheaper food and lower dues and the man who is willing to eke out an existence without any effort of his own on the public dole? Both are living off the other fellow.

Fortunately, the old American spirit of push ahead has not been entirely corroded yet.

Today we face either the climax of civilization as we have heretofore known it or one of those interludes by which humanity is compelled to pause and gain breath for a new push onward and upward.

Vice President BARKLEY said on his recent visit that America has a responsibility to European countries.

I emphatically disagree. The only responsibility we have is to save our own hides. It is my belief we are doing just that in Korea. If ever an army stood at the gate and battled for a free and peaceful world, it is the United Nations forces in Korea.

In the meantime we are strengthening our own forces and bolstering the defenses of Western Europe. We are preparing to meet Asiatic force with force—if necessary. Or we are prepared to live and let live.

If other nations in the world are not willing to join us in a fight to maintain their own democratic processes and their own individual freedom we are the one nation that can retire to an impregnable armed camp on this Western Hemisphere.

I believe, and said so at the time, that the talk of a German expeditionary force based on the port of Dakar in Africa invading South America at the point of the Brazilian bulge as a reason for us entering World War II was a lot of hog wash.

But I believe our own republican form of government would be bound to suffer if we retired to life in our own armed camp.

By the same token, it will suffer if we take in too much territory. In fact, victory in the end for a free world depends on America keeping our financial base strong and equal to the job. So far Great Britain, France, Holland, Belgium, Germany, Spain, and Italy have not been able to cooperate in an adequate collective organization for either mutual defense or trade agreements for a better economic system.

Our foreign commitments must be determined by what our foreign allies are doing—in the way of starting to repair their tragically weak defenses—and what our own economic system can stand. For many years I have been stressing the dangers inherent in our unsound fiscal policy and the state of our national defense.

America is rapidly mobilizing our military strength. But we are lagging dangerously in a constructive, affirmative foreign policy.

1. The United Nations should implement its resolution branding Red China as the aggressor by imposing economic sanctions. Two courses of action were adopted at that time. One called for continued efforts to attain a peaceful settlement—the other for study of possible sanctions against the Reds. Sufficient time has passed to make it plain that the Chinese Communists do not intend to seek a settlement on any reasonable terms. Therefore, it is timely to raise the alternative issue of economic sanctions.

Our allies continue to sell too much strategic material to our mutual enemies.

2. The treaty of peace with Italy must be immediately revised.

3. A peace treaty with Japan is long overdue.

4. Both Germany and Spain have much to contribute and should have been incorporated a long time ago in the defense of a free world.

5. We need friends wherever we can find them. The failure to use the forces of the Nationalist Government of Chiang Kai-shek demands a better explanation than has yet been given to the American people.

6. We must strengthen our relations with our neighbors to the south.

Therefore, with faith in the righteousness of our cause—the courage, the devotion, and efficiency of our fighting forces—and backed by the greatest productive capacity of any nation in the world—we face with confidence the battles to preserve our life, liberty, and the pursuit of happiness.

Undoubtedly all of you boys will be called by your country to arms. Possibly some of you boys here tonight may make the supreme sacrifice in that holy cause.

You have a right to demand that there be no relaxation on the part of every civilian in doing everything he can to back you up.

You have the right to demand that your public officials fulfill their responsibilities and duties in the same lofty spirit of patriotism that you will fulfill yours in the armed services of your country.

And let Mr. Truman be ever conscious that as our leader, "If the trumpet give an uncertain sound, who shall prepare himself for the battle?"

Third Anniversary of the Marshall Plan

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. ABRAHAM RIBICOFF

OF CONNECTICUT

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Tuesday, April 3, 1951

Mr. RIBICOFF. Mr. Speaker, 3 years ago today the United States embarked on one of the most far-seeing, and at the same time most controversial programs in its history—the European recovery program, or as it has been more popularly known, the Marshall plan.

In those 3 years, the Marshall plan has recorded remarkable accomplishments in helping war-torn Europe regain her economic stability and productiveness. A continent that was suffering actual physical hunger 3 years ago now has brought its agricultural production back to prewar levels. A continent whose factories had been smashed by the bombs and shells of a major war, and whose economic organization had been completely disrupted by a conqueror's occupation, now sees its industrial production not only back to prewar levels, but some 40 percent above them.

The physical accomplishments in relieving hunger and reviving production and trade are significant, but they pale beside the importance of the Marshall plan's accomplishments in the field of international politics.

Three years ago Europe appeared to be a potentially easy victim for expanding Communist imperialism. Today, the possibility that communism could take over by default has disappeared, as the misery and disorganization on which it feeds have given way to prosperity and order.

Now, entering its fourth year, ECA is embarking on a new phase of operations—designed to help Western Europe provide itself not only with bread, but with the means for its self-defense as well.

The United States can be justly proud of the part it has played in helping Western Europe. In aiding our free neighbors overseas, we also have helped ourselves—by creating new sources of strength for use in the world-wide fight against Communist expansion.

The results of 3 years operation of the Marshall plan are at once a rebuke to those who fought its creation and functioning so bitterly—and glowing evidence that this great Nation is, in a mature manner, accepting its leadership in the world.

Under leave to extend my remarks, I include the following:

STATEMENT BY THE PRESIDENT

On this third anniversary, it gives me great pleasure to congratulate you who have carried out so well the aims of the European recovery program.

When General Marshall first made his proposal, the shadow of economic collapse, with its attendant evils of unemployment, of hunger, and political unrest, hung over the countries of Western Europe. The great question in 1947 was whether free institutions could survive.

Today, thanks primarily to their own efforts, the people of Western Europe, together with our help, have rebuilt the economies of their countries and have developed a new spirit of confidence in themselves and in their free institutions. To my mind, this spirit, this rising confidence in the hearts of the people, is one of the greatest sources of strength in the free world.

By working together, economic recovery has been substantially achieved. However, with the present threat to world peace, new tasks have been imposed upon us. The free nations are now combining to convert their resources into military strength to preserve the peace and defend our freedoms.

The splendid organization which has been developed under the Economic Cooperation Administration can make an important contributon in helping develop this strength. Accordingly, I intend to recommend to the Congress that ECA be maintained on a continuing basis to help carry out the programs essential to the security of the free world.

There is much to be done in Europe, in Asia, and in other parts of the world, to help the free countries build their military, economic, and spiritual defenses against aggression from without and subversion from within. One of our essential objectives is to develop, in cooperation with other free nations, an expanding world economy, the benefits of which can be shared by us all.

On this anniversary I extend to all of you my sincere thanks for what you have done. I am confident that in its new tasks the ECA will continue to make a vital contribution in helping to build the strength of the free world upon which security and freedom rest.

REMARKS BY MR. HARRIMAN

It is a great satisfaction for me to be here today with my old colleagues of the ECA. You men and women and your associates abroad have contributed so greatly to the success of the Marshall plan.

It is good to have with us Paul Hoffman, who gave us all such inspired leadership. And we are especially fortunate in the presence of the Foreign Minister of France, M. Robert Schuman. With his broad vision and human understanding, he has given effective leadership to the cause of European unity.

The Marshall plan will go down in history as a great accomplishment in cooperation among free nations and free men. On the material side, there have been outstanding achievements. But of even greater importance has been the development of the sense that men of many nations can work together for common purpose—for common welfare. I think it is no exaggeration to say that the strong bonds which today unite the nations of the North Atlantic community, would not exist had it not been for the successful experience of working together during these last 3 years under the European recovery program. This unity, this sense of interdependence in the North Atlantic community, is one of the greatest assets of the free world as a whole in its present struggle.

You men and women can take great satisfaction in the part that you have played in these events.

Suppression of the Newspaper La Prensa in Argentina

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. THOMAS C. HENNINGS, JR.

OF MISSOURI

IN THE SENATE OF THE UNITED STATES

Tuesday, April 3 (legislative day of Monday, March 26), 1951

Mr. HENNINGS. Mr. President, the St. Louis Post-Dispatch sent a member of its staff, Mr. Donald Grant, to Buenos Aires 2 weeks ago for the purpose of getting at first hand the story of the ruthless suppression of the great newspaper La Prensa. In a most notable instance of journalistic endeavor and high purpose, Mr. Grant went on to Montevideo and obtained an exclusive interview with Alberto Gainza Paz, editor of La Prensa. The interview was published in the Post-Dispatch on Sunday, April 1, and in the same issue there was an editorial which eloquently points up this breach of the freedom of the press as a test of freedom for everyone throughout our hemisphere.

I ask unanimous consent that this editorial be inserted in the Appendix of the RECORD.

Mr. President, in today's Washington Post, there is an editorial taking note of this work by the Post-Dispatch as a champion of freedom, and because of its parallel interest, I ask unanimous consent that it also be inserted in the Appendix of the RECORD.

There being no objection, the editorials were ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

[From the St. Louis Post-Dispatch of April 1, 1951]

A TEST FOR EVERYONE

A free press versus a gagged press.

The free way of life versus the slave way.

Freemen under their own consciences versus fear-stricken serfs under a tyrant's rule.

Editor Alberto Gainza Paz and the brave "little people" of Argentina versus Dictator Juan Domingo Perón and his ruthless police, thugs, and Fascist henchmen.

These are the issues in the struggle over the great Argentine newspaper, La Prensa, which the Post-Dispatch tells in full detail today in a report from Donald Grant at Montevideo.

They are issues of deep concern for everyone—whether he lives in Buenos Aires or in Washington or in St. Louis; issues for the United States Congress as well as for the Argentine Congress, for our State Department and for the conference of hemispheric foreign ministers now assembled in Washington.

Why does the suppression of a newspaper 5,000 miles to the south make all this difference in Washington and in St. Louis?

Because what happens to freedom in one nation among the Americas happens inevitably also to freedom in some measure in all American nations.

Because when liberty of the press is killed in Buenos Aires it is threatened in a hundred other places.

Because when the lights are extinguished in Argentina, it grows darker where those lights no longer spread their rays.

That is why the suppression of La Prensa makes a difference to us all.

The suppression of Argentina's great newspaper did not occur overnight. It has been coming on ever since Perón took power. Indeed, in 1945, when he was still Minister of War, he said: "The Government will not permit the opposition of the Argentine press."

And now a statement, which Peron is reliably reported to have written says: "The preparation of public opinion of a sovereign country is a part of the sovereignty that government exercises."

That is Peronism, naked and unashamed. It is one with Hitler's nazism, Mussolini's fascism, Franco's falangism, Stalin's communism.

Opposed to Peronism now stands little more than Gainza Paz's brave conviction that Argentineans will never give up their rights and that La Prensa must reappear, strengthened by the support of a people who love liberty and condemn injustice.

The United States is a land whose people remember John Peter Zenger's triumph over attempted suppression of the press in 1735, whose people count Elijah P. Lovejoy's assassination in 1837 a sacrifice on the altar of a free press.

A land with these historic traditions of a free press can no longer be content with the undue deference shown Peron by the State Department.

It is time to be as plain with Peron as he is ruthless with freedom. The executioner of La Prensa should have not another red cent of help from Washington so long as he continues his regime of dictatorial suppression. He should be cut off, and he should be told why.

As for the Conference of American Foreign Ministers in Washington—from Mexico and Brazil and Peru, from Cuba and Honduras and Chile and some 15 other nations—the issue of La Prensa is on their agenda whether they formally list it or not. They may try to ignore the issue, but they cannot strike it off. For it is written in first place and with ink that will not erase.

If the conferees from the Americas go home without coming to grips with this struggle between freedom and slavery, then it would have been better had they not come at all.

La Prensa, bound and gagged, its voice stopped, its editor in exile, raises high throughout the hemisphere a test of freedom for everyone.

The world is watching to see what we do.

[From the Washington Post of April 3, 1951]

LA PRENSA'S FUTURE

It was in the best traditions of a free press that the St. Louis Post-Dispatch, a exemplar of freedom in North America, sent a reporter, Donald Grant, to interview Alberto Gainza Paz, editor of La Prensa, a now beleaguered exemplar of the same freedom in South America. They talked of the ordeal through which Señor Gainza Paz and his great newspaper have passed under the ruthless dictatorship of Juan Peron. La Prensa is temporarily in eclipse. It defied the dictator in a land where now, as Mr. Crant reports, there is no law save that dictator's will.

But they talked also of La Prensa's future. "The Argentine people," said Gainza Paz, "are fully conscious of their rights to have truthful and complete information about events inside or outside the country, and to read the newspaper of their choice. * * * I have the conviction that Argentineans will never give up those rights or relinquish those principles and that La Prensa must reappear, strengthened by the support of a people who love liberty and condemn injustice."

This is, of course, the real meaning of freedom of the press—that it involves not a publisher's privilege but the right of the people to read. It is a right which may be overridden; but it can never be extinguished. All men who have faith in human freedom must share Gainza Paz's conviction that La Prensa will have a future as free and as devoted to the rights of Argentineans as its past has been.

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. THOMAS J. LANE

OF MASSACHUSETTS

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Tuesday, April 3, 1951

Mr. LANE. Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my remarks, I wish to include the following excellent editorial from a recent issue of the Revere Journal, Revere, Mass.:

HONOR TO RABBI AND WIFE

In a testimonal reception, Revere Jewry very properly and rightfully honors this Sunday its venerable spiritual leader, Rabbi Henry A. Landes, and his devoted wife, upon the completion of 30 years in the rabbinate. They unquestionably deserve the position of respect and affection they have in the hearts of their coreligionists here.

This tall, straight, and dignified figure, Rabbi Landes, familiar to everyone in the city for three decades, whose favorite recreation is taking long walks from his home to Lynn and back, can be seen daily talking to young or old in a democratic fashion on the highways, or he can always be relied upon to deliver the invocation or benediction at a public function in an impressive and significant manner. He is truly an integral part of this community, a builder of good will every day of the year.

Sacred Jewish writings relate that the Torah or Holy Law, is like a golden vessel, the more you scour and polish, the more it will glisten and reflect the face of him who looks at it. So with the words of the Torah, whenever you repeat them, they glisten and illumine one's face.

Rabbi Landes, eminent scholar and Talmudist, is so steeped in the knowledge of Jewish theology that he has won recognition in this field. His brilliant and enlightening Sabbath and holiday discourses are but a reflection of the many arduous years he has devoted to learning and mastering Hebrew sacred scripture. To him, the altar is not a pulpit to devote talks on plays or to give book reviews, it is a holy tabernacle where reverence to God is paid and from where truth about His goodness and mercy emanates.

There are thousands who have known this kindly gentleman as the minister who officiated at their wedding, who consoled them in the dark hour of bereavement, who led them in prayer at the synagogue, who taught them the Talmud or who interpreted Jewish canon law for them. They have watched him spend thirty fruitful years in Revere, commanding their respect and winning their affection because of his wisdom, learning and humaneness. He has always taken an interest in civic affairs and the entire city, regardless of race or religion, admires and respects him as a good and useful citizen. He has consistently maintained a fine relationship with the Catholic and Protestant clergy of Revere, and whenever cooperation was required of him on any civic or patriotic matter, he unhesitatingly gave it gladly.

His has always been the life of a holy man, since Rabbi Landes never had high ambitions of material gain and never sought the compensation of worldly aspirations. He consecrated his life to the service of God and to do His work among his people—the good shepherd tending to his faithful flock. A pleasant reward too is to see his son following in his footsteps as a rabbi.

Therefore, congratulations are extended to Rabbi Henry A. Landes and his good wife. As the Book of Proverbs states and is repeated in Jewish homes on the Sabbath eve, "A woman of valor, who can find? For her price is far above rubies." The good rabbi is fortunate indeed that his wife is the ideal helpmate, a gracious and charming lady, active in various local auxiliaries and a true mother and daughter in Israel.

May both of them enjoy future happiness and good health and continue their service to God, their congregation, their family of splendid children and country. May the messages of felicitation inspire Rabbi Landes to go on in his spiritual labors and receive God's blessings, praise and grace for divine work well done as a teacher and preacher in Israel. "Mazel Tov," Rabbi and Mrs. Landes.

Extracts From Address by Hon. James H. Duff, of Pennsylvania, at Annual Convention, Pennsylvania Federation of Labor, at York, Pa.

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. JAMES H. DUFF
OF PENNSYLVANIA
IN THE SENATE OF THE UNITED STATES
Tuesday, April 3 (legislative day of Monday, March 26), 1951

Mr. DUFF. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to have printed in the RECORD extracts from an address delivered by me at the annual convention of the Pennsylvania Federation of Labor at York, Pa., on Wednesday, March 28, 1951.

There being no objection, the extracts from the address were ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

America today is sitting on a volcano. No one knows when the eruption will come or if it will come, but with the international situation as it is today, certainly we face possible disaster unless as a nation there is an immediate realization of the dangers ahead. Surely this is no time for complacence and disinterest either in high places in Washington or anywhere among our citizens. We are confronted by a challenge for our survival as a Nation. To accept that challenge and to win the fight that that challenge implies we must have unity of purpose in America, the cooperation of labor and industry, the help of the farmer, the businessman and the workingman.

This struggle we are engaged in today on a world-wide basis is not the fight of big business, of labor, of small business, of the farmer, or of any individual or group. It is America's fight and we are all part of America. And to be effective against a relentless, godless foe we must be united instead of pulling in every conceivable direction.

We have to be prepared and we have to be prepared immediately and if we don't get prepared immediately we may be destroyed before we make up our minds that we are even willing to get ready. With the situation as it is, everyone of us ought to ask ourselves—what do we propose to do about it? This is a question that should be asked by every American, not on the basis of what is good for any part of American life, but on the basis of what is necessary to be done by every part of American life in order to preserve the way of life that we know as the American way and the way that is challenged today as it has never been challenged before.

With our country facing the most serious crisis in its history, many of our people are approaching the problem as if it could be debated leisurely and without urgency as to time. If Russia decides to attack, all this time will be lost that could have been used in preparation. Meanwhile, growing daily are the fears and apprehensions of our friends and allies abroad.

To meet the threat that faces us, nothing less than the best we all have to give, will be necessary. This means that every segment of America must make a contribution to the struggle against domination by communism.

Do we dare be lulled into the dangerous assumption that Russia won't attack? Can we afford to guess about Russia's plans? Do we want to be gobbled up by the black bear while we sleep?

Communism's ultimate goal is domination of the world. Not just Korea, not just Indochina, not just other peril points, but the whole world—the United States included.

For what purpose has Russia week by week, month by month, and year by year, since the end of World War II, regularly and systematically built up her army and navy and air force? And, at whom is this immensely great and vastly growing armed might of Russia aimed?

Russia, in her military preparedness, and without any further increase of her armed power, is already enormously ahead of all the free people of the world put together. That takes in the United States too.

Despite the tremendous disparity between Russian power on the one hand and the power of all the free people on the other hand, Russia still continues to build and build and build. The Russian budget for military expenditures for this year, 1951, has again reached another new high.

Certainly this mighty Russian military machine was not created as a result of fear by Russia of any of her immediate neighbors. Russia has already destroyed the governments of her close neighbors and dragged them back of the iron curtain. Surely this immense build-up of military power does not arise from fear of the immense hordes of Chinese to Russia's east. Red China has already joined the aims of Red Russia and is acting as the stooge and puppet of Russia right now against the United Nations in Korea.

This tremendous military might of Russia could not have been built from fear of her ancient foe, Germany. Because Eastern Germany has been completely sovietized by Russia since World War II and Western Germany is weak and divided. Furthermore, the Red Russian Army right now stands poised ready to strike in the very middle of Europe.

As for the rest of Western Europe, France, Italy, and England are mere pygmies compared with the giant size of Russian arms.

Thus in the 6 years intervening since World War II, Russia has brought all Asia to her side and has completely dominated more than half of Europe.

As the result of this tremendous realinement of forces by Russia, the United States stands today as the last great barrier against the domination of the whole world by Russian communism and Russian aims for world empire.

Therefore, it must be clear to everyone willing to stop, look, and listen that the express-train advance of the vast Russian military juggernaut is aimed right at the United States. No other conclusion makes sense.

All this being so, what will we do about it? It seems clear that it is imperative that we realize that we will have to go through a period of sparse and bitter living here in America. That to me is far better than another world holocaust, another war with its horrible destruction of life and property.

On the home front, no longer can there be the question of whether capital and labor can get together for the common good. They must get together. Every segment of our life must make its contribution.

If materials are to be allocated, if wages are to be fixed, if prices are to be frozen, the same thing must happen to profits. In other words, there is no part of our life that possibly can be freed from the necessity of making the contribution that is vitally necessary to build up our production and our preparation to the place where Russia will not dare attack us.

Then the administration must come to its senses on the Federal budget. This is no time to monkey around with costly experiments, with nonsensical expenditures, and with waste and boondoggling.

If we don't cut items of expenditures, other than defense, to the bone, the expenses are going to paralyze our whole productive mechanism. The Government now is taking a terrific wallop out of all income for taxes. The time has come to call a halt to wild, unnecessary spending. The time is here to eliminate all tax loopholes in the tax laws before new and heavier taxes are imposed.

The time has come for America to tighten its belt and to decide right now where we go from here.

If it is the purpose of Russia to attack us immediately, then we can forget about the argument for drafting 18-year-olds and for universal military training because everybody will be in the fight, since every able-bodied person will be necessary.

On the other hand, it may be the purpose of Russia to continue further the cold war which she has been carrying on for the past 5 years. It may be her purpose to put America to the enormous expense of getting ready for a fight which may not come for years. But whatever Russia's purpose is, the United States must be ready because Russia right now has a gun pointed at our head.

If the purpose of Russia is to carry on this cold war over a period of years, it is clear that America must protect herself by tightening up her economic policy and by a preparation program that is realistic for a long-term cold war on the part of Russia. The only possible solution to a cold war by Russia over a period of years is for universal military training.

The figures show that it cost Russia only $7 a year for the pay for a private in the Russian Army. The lowest grade pay in the American Army is $1,080 per year and it costs the United States $10,000 a year for every man that is fully equipped and actually in service in the field. With this tremendous difference between what it costs Russia and what it costs America, it is clear that this country cannot afford a standing army over a 5-, 10-, or 15-year period at $10,000 per soldier per year. Universal military training, and the reserve that such training makes possible, is the only answer, on an economic basis, for survival by America against the continuing cold war threat that Russia may continue over the next 20 years or even for a generation.

The problem is not whether America is to be a military nation; but whether we are to be prepared and to be prepared by a method that the economy of this country can sustain over a period of years.

This is a problem to which we must have the right answer. There can be no quibbling and no misunderstanding. We must be prepared and we must be prepared by methods that will not destroy our economy at the same time that it provides a preparation against attack.

Let us not forget that the productive capacity of America was as essential as our armed might in winning World War II. Our productive capacity as well as our armed might well be necessary to prevent world war III. I am sure that Stalin fears the productive capacity of this country more than he fears our atomic bombs. But to have that productive capacity we must have a sound economy. And we cannot have that sound economy by continuing preparation for war over a long number of years unless we have universal military training. That is something about which there is no doubt and there is no alternative. It isn't a question of whether or not we want universal military training. It is a matter that universal military training is an imperative necessity that confronts us.

The time is gone when we can pussyfoot or fool about the things that must be done. It is up to us to get down to brass tacks in all these problems. There are certain necessary and vital things that have to be done for the survival of this Nation. Everybody must understand what they are and everybody must make a contribution to the result. Communism is united. America must be united if we are to unite the free peoples elsewhere. And unless the free peoples of the world stand together, they will fall together, because it will take everything that we all have to defeat the tremendous power that communism has built in the endeavor to destroy the free peoples of today's world. That is how plain it is. No one has any excuse for failing to understand the seriousness of the challenge that faces us.

Oregon Senate Joint Memorial 1

OF
HON. HOMER D. ANGELL
OF OREGON
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES
Tuesday, April 3, 1951

Mr. ANGELL. Mr. Speaker, I include as part of my remarks Senate Joint Memorial 1 recently adopted by the Oregon Legislature memorializing the President and the Secretary of State, in any negotiations with reference to a peace treaty between the United States and Japan, to make adequate provision positively to insure that no Japanese fishermen or fishing vessels be permitted to enter or interfere with the fisheries of this Pacific coast which have been fished and developed by the fishermen of the United States.

Senate Joint Memorial 1

To the HONORABLE HARRY S. TRUMAN, PRESIDENT OF THE UNITED STATES:

We, your memorialists, the Senate and the House of Representatives of the State of Oregon, in legislative session assembled, respectfully represent and petition as follows:

Whereas grave disaster to the coastal fisheries of the State of Oregon as well as to the coastal fisheries of the entire Pacific coast of the United States and Canada would result if the Department of State of the United States should again allow Japanese nationals to enter North American fisheries as they had begun to do before World War II, and to permit the Japanese to do this would constitute one of the greatest threats to peaceful relations between Japan and the United States; and

Whereas fisheries constitute one of the basic industries of this State, and not only give employment to many thousands of fishermen and workers in shore plants but also contribute to other industries such as shipyards, supply houses, banks, insurance companies, and many other concerns; and

Whereas fisheries furnish to the people of the Northwest, as well as to millions of other people, great quantities of wholesome and palatable food and constitute an immense food resource which, by proper management, can be made to yield a constant supply of food in the future; Now, therefore, be it

Resolved by the Senate of the State of Oregon (the house of representatives jointly concurring therein), That the President of the United States be memorialized to direct the Secretary of State, in any negotiations with reference to a peace treaty between the United States and Japan, to make adequate provision positively to insure that no Japanese fishermen or fishing vessels be permitted to enter or interfere with the fisheries of this Pacific coast which have been fished and developed by the fishermen of the United States; be it further

Resolved, That the secretary of state of the State of Oregon be, and he hereby is, directed to send this joint memorial to the President of the United States, and to send copies thereof to the Secretary of State of the United States, to the President and the clerk of the United States Senate, to the Speaker and the Chief Clerk of the House of Representatives of the United States, and to each Senator and Representative in the Congress elected or appointed from the State of Oregon.

Adopted by the senate January 18, 1951.
ZYLPHA ZELL BURNS,
Chief Clerk of the Senate.
P. L. PATTERSON,
President of the Senate.
Adopted by the house March 9, 1951.

Speaker of the House.

The Forest of the Six Million

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. EMANUEL CELLER
OF NEW YORK
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES
Monday, April 2, 1951

Mr. CELLER. Mr. Speaker, the annals of history have recorded few parallels to the savagery practiced by the Nazi government on the defenseless and innocent Jewish men, women, and children of Europe. When the Second World War broke out in the fall of 1939, there were 9,000,000 Jews on the continent of Europe; when the war ended in 1945, there were 3,000,000 left. Six million Jews were tortured and done to death in the Nazi concentration camps and crematoria. No greater cruelty has been heaped on any people on the face of the earth within the memory of civilized men.

The world has recently shown a tendency to forget the German atrocities perpetrated upon the peoples of Europe and the 6,000,000 martyred Jews. Instead, the slogan has been given currency: "Let bygones be bygones." We have even forgotten what the Krupps and others did to convert Europe into a shambles. The Jewish people alone have not forgotten.

Out of Jerusalem comes a news story, so packed with drama as to thrill us all. It proves that there are still people on God's green earth who are determined to make sure that the memory of the 6,000,000 and what they fought for shall not perish from the land. To this end, they have established a living memorial which in its grandeur and eternity, may be said to approach closely the vastness of the world's and the Jewish people's tragedy in the loss of the 6,000,000. Here is the news item:

JERUSALEM, March 8.—An extraordinary ceremony, accompanied by tears and punctuated by lamentations, took place yesterday on the mountains overlooking Jerusalem, when the Jewish National Fund, in the presence of 10,000 men and women from the Jewish capital and of representatives of the Israel Government, the Jewish Agency, and 14 Jewish communities of Europe, Morocco and Yemen, planted the first trees of the Forest of Six Million which will occupy both sides of the 40-mile stretch of the Jerusalem-Tel Aviv corridor. The forest, when completed, will have 6,000,000 trees and will be known as the Forest of the Six Million, in commemoration of the 6,000,000 Jews who were done to death by Hitler.

The vast crowd that assembled on the mountain slopes at Kisarom in the Jerusalem corridor, broke into a loud lamentation when Joseph Weitz, representative of the Jewish National Fund, planted the first cypress saplings while the cantor intoned the El Mole Rachamim, invoking the mercy of God on the souls of the departed martyrs. Thousands of men, women and children, many of them close relatives of the martyred six million, wept hysterically as Chief Rabbi Isaac Halevi Herzog, following the cantor, pronounced the Kadish, the prayer for the dead, and David Ramaz, speaking in behalf of the Israel Government, raised his right hand, swearing that the State of Israel will never forget the six million and what was done to them and the whole Jewish people during the last World War. Berl Locker, in the name of the World Zionist Organization, took a similar oath. Isaac Gruenbaum, who for many years was Polish Jewry's outstanding Zionist leader and chief spokesman in the Polish Parliament, delivered the eulogy. He was forced to interrupt his address several times because his throat and voice were choked with tears.

Throughout the whole ceremony Israel airplanes circled high over the mountains and the Israel flag hung at half mast in front of the specially constructed speakers platform on the mountain slope.

The forest will be divided into 14 sections, each commemorating a Jewish community that was wiped out in the great mass murder that cost the lives of 6,000,000 Jews in Europe. The forest will be specially guarded by chosen representatives of the Yemenite Jewish community which is regarded as the oldest Jewish community in the world.

Dr. Harris J. Levine, president of the Jewish National Fund of America, in a message to the memorial assembly, expressed the deep feeling of solidarity with world Jewry, which animates the 5,000,000 Jews of the United States, and pledged that a special effort will be made to help in the establishment of the living memorial in Israel that will forever keep green the memory of our martyred six million.

Mr. Speaker, the Jewish National Fund of America, with offices at 41 East Forty-second Street, New York City, in response to the call from Jerusalem, has undertaken to have 5,000,000 trees planted by the 5,000,000 Jews of the United States in the Forest of the Six Million. It will endeavor to have each Jew in America plant at least one tree in the Forest of Six Million. The motto will be: "Plant a living tree for each martyred dead" and "We build as we mourn." Thus, through the forest, there will be built a living memorial to the 6,000,000—a green mansion in which shall dwell forever the spirits of the departed, giving life, health, and inspiration to all succeeding generations who will be building the land while gratefully and reverently remembering those who lived and worked and died for it.

The roots of the trees we plant will hold back rushing waters and will help erect land terraces. Its timbers will go into building of homes, barns, and factories; into making of chairs, sills, furniture, ships, railroad cars, vehicles, plows, boxes, and tools. The wood pulp will make newsprint and paper for books and fiber for textiles. In other words, they will revere the departed and the past and enrich the present and the future.

Extracts From Address by Hon. James H. Duff, of Pennsylvania, at Annual Dinner of the Amen Corner, Pittsburgh, Pa.

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. JAMES H. DUFF
OF PENNSYLVANIA
IN THE SENATE OF THE UNITED STATES
Tuesday, April 3 (legislative day of Monday, March 26), 1951

Mr. DUFF. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to have printed in the RECORD extracts from an address delivered by me at the annual dinner of the Amen Corner at the William Penn Hotel, Pittsburgh, Pa., on Saturday evening, March 31, 1951.

There being no objection, the extracts from the address were ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

The events of this new year, 1951, and particularly of the month of March ending today, have a startling significance for every American.

During the current week three American citizens have been found guilty of being traitors to the United States. Their treason was in exposing the secrets of atomic energy to Russia. Their treasonable act put the women and children of America on the firing line in the event of world war III, and in that event undoubtedly meant the loss of the lives of millions of their fellow American citizens.

Earlier this month a British jet bomber flew nonstop from an airfield in Ireland to an airfield in Canada in only 4 hours and 37 minutes. That flight was almost as meaningful to America as the discovery of this land by Columbus. It opened up America to contact with Europe in only half the time required for a fast express train to cross from one end of Pennsylvania to the other. However little we may relish the idea, it meant that whatever happens in Western Europe affects us here in the United States almost as if it happened in one of our adjoining States. Had we been at war with a nation controlling Western Europe, that jet bomber could have carried an atomic bomb to blast any of the cities on the eastern seaboard of the United States.

It is, therefore, clear that unless Western Europe is denied to the Russians the whole of the eastern United States is open to atomic bombing whenever world war III comes up. It also seems clear that it is not possible for the United States to abandon Western Europe and to retire within an impregnable fortress here in America, because that fortress would no longer be free from atomic bombing which is the most dangerous and devastating invention of human ingenuity.

The further significance to us here in America of these tremendous events is that the overwhelming proportion of the productive enterprise of the United States is located in a group of Eastern States immediately vulnerable to atomic attack from Western Europe. A Western Europe less than 5 hours away makes Western Europe our next door neighbor so far as concerns vast contact and liability to attack by atomic weapons.

During the past week the doors of a Federal prison closed upon Alger Hiss—an American who had acted as one of the chief advisers of the President of the United States at a conference with Russia and other diplomats at Yalta. It therefore appears that at a momentous conference with Russia, our own President had as one of his confidential advisers a prominent American who in fact at that very time was in league with the most vicious enemy this country ever had, because Alger Hiss was imprisoned after conviction of perjury for having denied under oath that he had ever been a Communist whereas it was proved that he was.

It is also clear therefore that Russia has penetrated successfully into the very highest secret circle of confidence in our Government and has carried away for her own use the secret of atomic energy—thereby not only shattering confidence and assurance of peace in the world, but also giving Russia the secret of the means of conquering the whole world unless we here in America arouse ourselves to the seriousness of our present danger.

The unparalleled productive capacity of the United States has largely developed as a result of the concentration of our industry in large units where production and assembly lines have completely revolutionized and fabulously increased all previous ideas of quantity and quality of production. Our ability to produce has made the United States the leader of the world of today. So long as our great concentration of industry were not open to attack by our enemies we were indeed invulnerable. But as the result of traitors making known to Russia our secrets of atomic energy, they have thereby sown the seeds of our own destruction. Atomic bombing can destroy our industry unless as a Nation we become fully and adequately prepared to defend ourselves.

Many Americans are saying frankly or indicating by their action that there is no need of urgency in our plans. They seem to mean: What is the use of being too serious until war actually starts? Of them it may be asked: What do they call what goes on in Korea? Latest official figures show that our losses in Korea now exceed 57,000. That is greater by more than 10,000 than all the losses of both the Northern and Southern armies in the Gettysburg campaign in the Civil War, which was the bloodiest campaign in American history on this continent.

General MacArthur this week called upon the Communist leader in Korea for a meeting to arrange for ending that war.

The reply dictated from Moscow was a scornful refusal. So that bloody fight goes on with no prospect of its termination. Everyone knows that the whole communistic campaign in Korea is directed by and through Russia. The fact is that Russia shows daily by her activities in Korea that she is willing to risk world war III right now.

Communism is united world-wide. The free nations of the world are not united either in aims or preparation.

The accumulation of events, particularly such as we have witnessed so far this week make it increasingly evident that communism as led by Russian imperialism means to dominate the whole world.

Only determined and united effort, with a common purpose and a common determination by the free people of today's world, can possibly stop this vast expansion of Russian power. It is up to all who believe in freedom to stand together. Unless we do and until we do there is no reason to believe that separately the free people of the world can successfully resist the constantly growing might of Russian military power.

The Stabilization Program Is Not Working for Wage Earners and White-Collar Workers

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. ARTHUR G. KLEIN
OF NEW YORK
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES
Thursday, February 15, 1951

Mr. KLEIN. Mr. Speaker, under leave, I am inserting a resolution on the failure of the stabilization program, under the inadequate National Production Act which we passed last year, to work for the benefit of the Americans who already are carrying the chief burden of the defense effort, as adopted by the Trade Union Council of the Liberal Party of New York.

Text of the resolution follows:

RESOLUTION ON NATIONAL POLICY ADOPTED BY THE DELEGATED CONFERENCE OF THE TRADE UNION COUNCIL OF THE LIBERAL PARTY, THURSDAY, FEBRUARY 15, 1951

In the present world crisis, the United States must forge a national unity to give strength and leadership to the free world.

This unity must be based on equality of sacrifice and an equal voice for all sections of the national economy who are called upon to make these sacrifices.

The use of our present national crisis to depress labor's standard of living while stepping up profits, to place the heaviest burdens of taxation on labor's shoulders, to deprive labor of an active voice in our economic affairs, is to weaken the entire fabric of our national unity.

So far, our national policy has failed to map a program that will protect labor's standards of work and living, that will tax those best able to pay, that will recognize labor's contributions by giving labor a proper voice.

Since the onset of fighting in Korea, the cost of living has gone up 8 percent in retail prices, according to BLS figures. Wholesale prices have gone up twice as much. Each day, these higher wholesale rates are translated into retail costs.

Wages, lagging behind prices even before the outbreak of the Korean fighting, have lagged even further in the subsequent months.

The stabilization program has, so far, stabilized wages only.

The most decisive item in the worker's budget, food, has escaped control. Those items selling below parity continue to rise because they are exempt by law. Those items selling above parity are controlled at the store but not at the farm, thereby making inevitable future price rises. This free item, food, constitutes 40 percent of the wage earning family budget.

In the over-all ceilings, the point where the freeze was established was the highest point in American history.

This conference of labor delegates believes that the present stabilization program is viciously discriminatory against all wage and salaried groups. It is not really a stabilization program at all. It is a wage freeze and a price rise.

This conference calls upon our National Government to take immediate steps:

1. To roll back prices to June 1950.

2. To place a tight ceiling on the prices of all items of popular consumption, including food.

3. To establish strong, effective rent control which will fully protect the tenants in our Nation.

4. To guide its policies by an effort to maintain the purchasing power of the dollar prior to Korea.

In the light of the foregoing, a tax program that falls most heavily on the wage-earning groups is adding insult to injury. At present, families earning $5,000 a year or less are paying the same taxes as they paid during World War II, while families earning $500,000 a year are paying $40,000 less in taxes.

This conference goes on record for a more equitable tax program.

We oppose any proposals for a national sales tax since it falls most heavily upon the lower income groups whose earnings are spent almost entirely on consumer goods.

We favor a program of taxation that will plug the present loopholes in the tax program, including measures to raise the excess-profits tax and to cover railroads, utilities, natural gas companies; to tighten the estate and gift tax; to tighten the tax on interest and dividends.

To speed our national production, to prevent new inequities in the distribution of our national income, to protect labor's rights in the allocation of manpower, to block black-marketing practices, to keep down the cost of living, this conference calls upon our national administration to give labor a voice in the top councils of our planning and administrative agencies. The present policy of manning such top agencies almost solely with representatives of big business not only threatens the living standards of millions of American families, but weakens the confidence of these same millions whose maximum efforts are required for our great national effort.

Labor's voice at the policy level is the first and greatest stem toward a multiplication of labor's power at the productive level.

RESOLUTION ON STATE RENT CONTROL ADOPTED AT THE SAME CONFERENCE

Now, therefore, be it

Resolved, That the Trade Union Council of the Liberal Party go on record to the following effect:

1. We insist that the State legislature immediately pass legislation amending the State rent-control law (a) to eliminate all provisions for rent increase on any ground except actual, proven out-of-pocket losses; (b) to grant no certificate of eviction except on the ground of a life or health hazard declared by a local government agency, or for the purpose of occupancy by the landlord himself, and then only after livable accommodations at a similar rental have been provided for the tenant; (c) to place under control all rental housing regardless of when built or converted.

2. Since the Liberal Party rent-control bill, introduced in this session of the legislature by Senator Mahoney and Assemblyman Roman anticipated the present situation with respect to the rent-control plan and provided in advance for making the objectionable features of the plan inoperative, we recommend passage of the Liberal Party bill.

3. We pledge ourselves to fight from tonight on until adjournment of this legislature to have the State rent-control law amended to give it teeth on behalf of tenant protection.

4. Unless the State rent-control law is amended by the current legislature to make it a completely effective rent-control statute which will fully protect the tenants of this State, we deem it necessary, as soon as Federal legislation has been passed establishing effective rent control for the Nation, that the Federal Government reassume control of rents in this State.

Inciting Racial Hatred

OF
HON. EMANUEL CELLER
OF NEW YORK
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Monday, April 2, 1951

Mr. CELLER. Mr. Speaker, I was very much disturbed to learn that a distinguished Member of the Senate inserted a telegram containing disparaging insinuations against Americans of Italian origin, in the record of a hearing. I think this was a grave error. The wire in question visited the sins of the few upon the many.

Italian-Americans need no defense from me or from anybody else. In my book one race is as good as another. We have no creed of superior or inferior races in America. Hitler tried to spread the doctrine of Herrenvolk—superior—and Slavenvolk—inferror or slave—and it took much sacrifice of blood and tragedy to nullify it. Unfortunately, there lingers in the minds of some that some races are superior to others, and in our immigration statutes, we do find a national-origin theory whereby preference is given to immigrants who are Aryan, thereby causing discrimination against the Latins and the Slavic peoples. This prejudice which makes it difficult for Italians seeking entry into this country, is the same kind of prejudice which animated the telegram in question.

I feel certain that when the matter is brought to the attention of the distinguished Senator, he will rectify his mistake. I have great respect for the Senator in question. I am sure he did not mean to imply any immoral conduct to the Italian people as a whole or to the Italian-Americans as a whole. However, I think it was most ill-advised to have inserted such remarks into the record of the hearings, and I take this opportunity to say so.

I should like to compliment the newspaper, Il Progresso Italo-Americano, for its stirring editorial which appeared in its March 28, 1951, issue. My esteemed colleague, Representative JOHN ROONEY, inserted this editorial in the April 2 issue of the RECORD.

Oregon Senate Joint Memorial 4

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. HOMER D. ANGELL
OF OREGON
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Tuesday, April 3, 1951

Mr. ANGELL. Mr. Speaker, I include as part of my remarks Senate Joint Memorial 4 recently adopted by the Oregon Legislature providing for memorializing the President and the Congress of the United States of America for the construction of timber access roads to and in public forests:

Senate Joint Memorial 4

To His Excellency, the Honorable President of the United States, and to the Honorable Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled:

We, your memorialists, the Forty-sixth Legislative Assembly of the State of Oregon, in legislative session assembled, most respectfully represent as follows:

Whereas the United States, acting through the Secretary of Agriculture and the Secretary of the Interior, manages 58 percent of the total forest land of the State of Oregon, which carries 70 percent of the currently merchantable timber; and

Whereas the allowable cut under sustained yield forest management on the public forests has by no means been reached; and

Whereas 87,000 citizens of Oregon are directly employed in the forest industries; and

Whereas the State of Oregon currently furnishes the people of the United States with more than a quarter of their annual lumber requirements, as well as important quantities of wood pulp, plywood, doors, shingles, and other forest products; and

Whereas if the present national emergency demands a high production of essential timber products for military use, the public forests in many instances are the only ones which can supply these needs: Now, therefore, be it

Resolved by the Senate of the State of Oregon (the house of representatives jointly concurring therein), That the Congress of the United States is respectfully memorialized to consider the merits of the proposal for the authorization of the construction of timber access roads to and in the public forests of the United States as outlined in House Joint Resolution 28 which has been introduced in the Eighty-second Congress, first session; be it further

Resolved, That the chief clerk of the senate be and she hereby is directed to transmit a copy of this memorial to the President and Vice President of the United States; to the Speaker of the House of Representatives, and to each Senator and Representative from Oregon in the Congress of the United States.

Adopted by the senate February 28, 1951.
ZYLPHA ZELL BURNS,
Chief Clerk of the Senate.
P. L. PATTERSON,
President of the Senate.
Adopted by the house March 5, 1951.
JOHN F. STEELHAMMER,
Speaker of the House.

Let's Stop Playing Into the Hands of Russia by Delaying Our Wheat to India

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. ARTHUR G. KLEIN
OF NEW YORK
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Thursday, February 15, 1951

Mr. KLEIN. Mr. Speaker, under leave, I am inserting in the RECORD two editorials from the New York Post and a signed column by Dr. Frank Kingdon from the same great newspaper.

All of these insertions say, in effect, that our delay in acting favorably on the authorization to furnish wheat to the starving millions of India is helpful to the propaganda war of the Soviet nations; and it is a brutal death sentence on thousands of helpless human beings whose only sin is in living in a country incapable of feeding all its people.

I hope sincerely that the administration will soon be able to send food to India out of our own wonderful bounty.

Text of the editorials follows:

[From the New York Post of March 12, 1951]

DEATH SENTENCE

Each day that the House Rules Committee delays action on emergency aid to famine-stricken India means the death of more helpless people whom our help could have saved.

[From the New York Post of March 22, 1951]

DANGER: MEN STARVING

A farmer's almanac of global crop conditions would provide ironic contrasts. Starving India reports that hurricanes have followed droughts in razing the subcontinent's maize and wheat fields. At the same moment the already overflowing wheat bowl of the American southwest offers predictions of a bumper crop. In the midst of this almost embarrassing United States plenty, Congress is indulging in sterile filibusters against the proposed $190,000,000 gift of grain to India. The House Rules Committee has shelved the emergency measure with a perverse conviction that starving stomachs can wait. The harrowing truth is that our legislators are talking both the grain measures and Indians to death. J. J. Singh, president of the India League of America, flatly denounces that at least one million of his countrymen will die from disease or starvation unless Congress swiftly approves the grant. Emergency help will do more than all the diplomatic maneuvers on record to win friends and influence nations in the Far East. Reports that United States inaction has driven a desperate New Delhi to ask Russia for grain emphasizes the folly of further delay. Are we actually waiting for the Kremlin to lead the way?

[From the New York Post of March 18, 1951]

TO BE FRANK

(By Dr. Frank Kingdon)

No more decisive test of our genuine faith in democracy has recently come to us than the question of sending food to India. The only argument against it is that Nehru does not slavishly follow our international policy. To starve a people for its government's independence is a denial of democratic principle. Every time we indulge in this kind of undemocratic arrogance we hand Russia and communism a diplomatic victory.

Our policy in Asia, apart from humanitarian considerations, should have one objective—to separate Asia from Moscow. Nobody would recognize this from our actions. We seem determined to drive the Asians into the arms of the Kremlin.

A few years ago some of us were advocating a $5,000,000,000 world-rehabilitation fund to feed and revive China, India, and other lands then suffering from want and ripe for development. We were lampooned as fabulous visionaries with the lunatic touch. Those $5,000,000,000 could have kept China away from Russia. The price we are now paying for not spending them is $40,000,000,000 as the minor item and the lives of American men as the major one.

We still seem to be in the hands of men determined to drive China more and more to Moscow. Nobody seems to be working at driving a wedge between the Chinese and Soviet Governments, which seems to me the obvious point at which to breach the Communist bloc. Maybe this is because officially we have written China off, or perhaps have decided the time is not ripe.

The one thing on which we can all agree is that we do not want to reproduce in India what occurred in China. Yet here we are on the verge of setting the same forces in motion. We are as good as saying that we are indifferent to India's need except as we can turn it into an instrument to dominate Indian policy. In the light of past experience and India's present mood this can result only in alienating India.

What I am now advocating has nothing to do with approval of Nehru's policies. I am not declaiming them. I am merely saying that we should go out of the business of recruiting Asians for Russia, and turn to the happier business of winning them to our side. It is not a difficult business. It simply requires that we sell democracy by practicing it.

As is always the case with democracy, the more hard-headed we are about serving it, the more humanitarian our action turns out to be. It is pleasantly humane to send aid to India; it is equally sound policy. The audience that will tensely watch and ardently judge our action will be not only India but all the Asian peoples recently freed from the servitude of colonies and now deciding with which half of the world their true interests lie. Insofar as we discover to them a way of life so rooted in human dignity that policy and ethics are naturally united, we shall appeal to both their practical sense and their unique spiritual genius.

It is unfortunate that mankind reserves for courage in military planning an admiration it does not accord boldness in pursuit of peace, but we have here an opportunity to demonstrate that a mature, free people dares to trust its own belief in the freedom of all peoples.

Barbarous Iraqi Action Against Jews Calls for State Department and United Nations Intervention

OF

HON. EMANUEL CELLER

OF NEW YORK

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Monday, April 2, 1951

Mr. CELLER. Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my remarks, I include a letter sent by me to the Honorable Dean Acheson, Secretary of State:

Hon. DEAN ACHESON,
Secretary of State,
Department of State,
Washington, D. C.

MY DEAR MR. SECRETARY: On March 10 in secret session, the Iraqi Majles (Chamber of Deputies) passed a decree with the approval of the Regency Council providing that all Jews who left Iraq for any reason whatsoever since 1948 must return within 60 days under penalty of confiscation of all their property. This decree applies equally to any and all Jews who left Iraq, temporarily or permanently, with or without passports. There are American citizens who are drastically affected by this decree. Property of American citizens who were nationals of Iraq will be forfeited to the state unless the owners return to Iraq by May 10. A custodian general has been appointed to be in control of all property of Jews who left Iraq. The new decree calls upon all officials in banks and other institutions to furnish the custodian general with information concerning the assets of all Jews affected.

This decree is a culmination of many others. An earlier decree provided that all Jews registered for immigration to Israel be denationalized. That decree was followed by another which froze the property of Jews scheduled for entrance into Israel. The latter decree, however, was made applicable to any Jew outside of Iraq and even Jews resident in the United States. In other words, it was applied to the property of Jews whether or not they went to Israel, United States, or any other country.

In the meanwhile, there are great disturbances in Bagdad and other cities in which Jews live, threatening their lives and property. Anti-Jewish feeling is again being whipped up to a fever point. The position of Jews in Iraq today is not unlike that of the Jews in Germany during the early days of Nazi control. The Government of Israel has protested, but to no avail.

A total of 104,000 Iraqi Jews had registered for transfer to Israel. Forty thousand have already been transferred, leaving 64,000 Iraqi Jews in a precarious state in Iraq. Those Jews who have managed to leave Iraq have been allowed to take with them just 90 cents. Many Iraqi Jews en route to Israel are consequently faced with starvation.

The decree of March 10 has placed the Jews who have left Iraq, some of them, as I have stated before, are in the United States, in a most precarious position. If they go back to Iraq within 60 days they face persecution or worse. If they do not go back they face absolute confiscation of their property.

Iraq is the recipient of United States aid. The Export-Import Bank allotted credits to her in the amount of $12,000,000 for agriculture and irrigation purposes. If this credit has not been completely drawn upon, I ask that any balances be canceled. Any country guilty of such barbarism should not be recipient of either our credit or our confidence. All point 4 aid should likewise be immediately withdrawn. The annulment of these harsh decrees should be the condition precedent for the reinstatement of these benefits from the United States.

The example set by Iraq might be followed by other Arab countries. The precedent is dangerous because the Jews are a helpless minority. They are that much more easily victimized. They cannot fight back. Hence the need for vigorous and summary action.

Moreover, the situation in Iraq concerning the treatment of Jews directly relates to articles 55 and 56 of the Charter of the United Nations.

Article 56 states: "All members pledge themselves to take joint and separate action in cooperation with the organization for the achievement of the purposes set forth in article 55."

Article 55 states that "United Nations shall promote (c) universal respect for, and observance of, human rights and fundamental freedoms for all without distinction as to race, sex, language, or religion."

The situation in Iraq with respect to Jews is likewise violative of the convention on genocide and a denial of the resolution adopted by the United Nations on its universal declaration of human rights.

Thus, I believe, it is imperative that this information be imparted to our representatives to the United Nations so that they in turn set this crucial matter before the entire United Nations.

These developments in Iraq must not be permitted to be dismissed as an internal affair only.

Respectfully yours,

EMANUEL CELLER.

A First-Hand Report About "The Men Russia Fears Most" and "The Greatest Single Deterrent to the Reds Starting a World War"—By Corey Ford

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. FRANK W. BOYKIN
OF ALABAMA
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES
Tuesday, April 3, 1951

Mr. BOYKIN. Mr. Speaker, the Sunday supplement to the Washington Star of last week carried an article, datelined "London," written by the internationally known writer on a veritable catalog of miscellaneous subjects, and aviator in World War II—Mr. Corey Ford.

This Week magazine, a Washington Star supplement, has the largest circulation of any Sunday supplement published. The editors of that magazine presented this article by Mr. Ford as a first-hand report on what they declared to be "The greatest single deterrent to the Reds starting another world war."

Mr. Ford's observations are both illuminating and thought-provoking. They have largely to do with the wonderful achievements of the United States Strategic Air Command. He quotes General Johnson as saying:

I wish the families could know the job that these men are doing, and I wish someone would tell them back home just how important it is.

Well, General Johnson, I want you to know that I and every other Member of the House of Representatives are alive to and thrill at the thought of the marvelous works that the Air Force Strategic Command is accomplishing in confining the Russian Bear to his lair. God bless you, General Johnson, and every member of your command, as well as all others who, in following our flag, are preserving—not alone the peace and security of our own country, but the peace and security of the world.

These few words are to tell you and your men that every true American is with them in spirit at each moment of every night and day.

Now, Mr. Speaker, in order to tell the folks back home the wonderful works that our Air Force is doing abroad—by way of the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD—a copy of which daily finds its way into the smallest hamlets of this land, I ask the unanimous consent of my colleagues to insert Corey Ford's article entitled "The Men That Russia Fears Most," into the RECORD.

That article is as follows:

THE MEN RUSSIA FEARS MOST—A FIRST-HAND REPORT ON OUR A-BOMB AIR CREWS—"THE GREATEST SINGLE DETERRENT" TO THE REDS' STARTING A WORLD WAR

(By Corey Ford)

LONDON.—I've recently come back from a visit to the men who hold the world in equilibrium today. The threat of their loaded bomb bays—so Winston Churchill has said—is the greatest single deterrent to a Russian advance over Europe.

They are the pilots who fly the big long-range bombers which are capable of delivering the atomic weapon against the enemy. Their picked unit of the United States Strategic Air Command, sent to Britain on what has been announced as a routine training mission, is maintaining the balance between a cold and a hot war.

You haven't heard much about them. Their planes are parked at isolated RAF fields in East Anglia, gassed and ready. While the great debate goes on at home, while some of our leaders demand that we withdraw to our own shores, and others insist that we fight everywhere at once, the pilots sit at the controls of their bombers, aware that the powerful retaliatory blow they could deliver is what keeps Stalin in check.

MOST POTENT THREAT OF ALL

That word "retaliatory" is important, basic to our strategy. The enemy knows that if he hits us, the Air Force will return the blow with interest; and thus he hesitates because he fears that most potent of all threats, an atomic counterattack by air.

You can spot the huge metal tails a mile away, as you drive north through the pleasant East Anglia countryside. They tower above the hawthorn hedges, above the distant barns and thatched cottages. Their curving silhouettes, against the English sky, are disturbingly reminiscent of a decade ago.

Things haven't changed much in Britain since you were here before. Our men still live in RAF billets, which are no more luxurious than they were back in 1943 and 1944. Austerity, plus an innate British distrust of modern heating, combine to keep the buildings icy cold. A lump of coal smoulders sullenly in the grate of the reading room, and airmen shiver in overcoats as they try to translate the English newspapers into English.

GAME OF DARTS AND A MOVIE

Winters are as miserable as ever. Snow and sleet glaze the runaways, and it's worth your life to ride a bicycle down to the line. There isn't much to do for recreation; a game of darts; a movie, maybe; an occasional train ride into London.

England hasn't changed, but the men have. Today's air force is older, for one thing. These are experienced veterans, with battle stars from Europe, Africa, the Pacific. They are sober, serious, disciplined, highly competent. Flying is their job; they've been doing it for years, and they are professionals now. Their conversation is as technical as a seminar at MIT. You guess that the people of this advance unit—hand-picked from Lt. Gen. Curtis E. LeMay's crack Strategic Air Command—are as effecient a group of trained airmen as exists in the world. "We're the cream of the crop," one of them told me. It's a good feeling for Americans to have about themselves, in times like these.

Week-ends in London are few and far between. Most of the pilots are married; family men. The pin-up girls that used to decorate their walls have been replaced by photographs of Junior. They save their money and send it home to their wives, still living at the group base back in California. "It's tough being a SAC wife," they reflect. "The gals never knew when we'll take off and be away for months." When the men were told, at the last moment, that they would not be home for Christmas, there was no time to mail their presents. Maj. Gen. Leon W. Johnson, hero of Ploesti and Congressional Medal of Honor winner, who is boss of the bombers in England, set up a special airplane to fly their gifts back to the States.

They are frankly homesick, but they are just as glad their families are not over here right now. They don't talk much about the war—a habit of men in combat theaters everywhere—but they all believe that it is coming. They have their own ideas of how it should be fought, of course. "We can't lick them on the ground. We'll have to rely on airpower—where the United States is strongest—rather than on manpower, where the enemy is sure to outnumber us."

They believe in airpower; they wouldn't be pilots if they didn't. Many of them personally saw Japan and Germany crumble under air attack, and they know the effectiveness of aerial bombardment. "We'll lose if we meet them on their own terms. We'll win if we use the technical skill in which America is unbeatable."

The toughest thing over here is the waiting, waiting for the somber English weather to clear. "I missed summer last year," is a sardonic crack, "I went to a double-feature that afternoon." Waiting to run another routine training flight, a prescribed 10-hour course that is as familiar by now as the way to bed. Waiting to get a letter from someone at home. Waiting to learn how much longer they're going to have to wait.

FIRST FLIGHT

There was a little excitement down around the maintainence hangar the day that we arrived. A group of pilots were sweating out an airplane that was making its first flight; their shouts of advice rose above the angry whine of the engine as it climbed. "Ease her back." "Hold that right rudder." "More back pressure, Joe."

We stepped into the hangar. A foot-long model plane was darting erratically right and left overhead, guided by the long wire control lines held in its owner's hand. Its nose rose higher, its air speed fell off until it seemed to hang on the prop, the snarl of the toy motor reached fever-pitch. Then the left wing stalled out, and the tiny ship dropped into a sharp turn.

"Forward, Joe." "Chop the gun and pull up." A mighty groan, as the airplane plunged toward the concrete floor. "Oh, no-o-o-o!"

MOCK SYMPATHY

The owner ran forward to pick up the wreck, ruefully examining the shattered prop and the split plastic wing. "Clobbered." The group shook their heads in mock sympathy. "Wonder what's the penalty for Class Twenty-Sixing an aircraft?" "I'm going to recommend to the Evaluation Board that they consider this one a case of pilot error."

"Ah, I can fix this thing up in an hour with a little Scotch tape," the owner shrugged. "You guys wait here."

"After all," he added as he headed for the ready room, "you got nothing else to do around here but wait."

And wait and wait. Morale is high, but waiting can eat into morale. Waiting is just as hard back home; the letters from their wives show that. General Johnson appreciates the problem. "I wish their families could know the job these men are doing," he said. "I wish somebody could tell them back there how important it is."

Well, this is to tell them. These bomber crews who wait in England are keeping the enemy waiting in Russia. At this moment in history, the threat of the terrible counterpunch they could throw from these East Anglia bases is what holds this teetering globe of ours in balance.

Famine (in India) Will Not Wait

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. JACOB K. JAVITS
OF NEW YORK
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES
Tuesday, March 13, 1951

Mr. JAVITS. Mr. Speaker, attached is an editorial from the New York Times of March 22, 1951, forcefully drawing attention to the fact that although the Foreign Affairs Committee favorably reported out the bill for food aid to India on March 5, it has not yet received the rule or been scheduled for consideration. The vital national interests of the United States which are involved in the enactment of this bill demand that it be debated and considered immediately after the House is through with the pending Selective Service Act. The above-mentioned editorial follows:

FAMINE WILL NOT WAIT

The danger of famine in India is approaching its critical stage. The most serious situation is in Bihar state, where winter crops have failed, but other areas are also threatened. The Indian Government is doing what it can, but is seriously limited by the basic food deficit in the country. It must look abroad for aid if the problem is to be met.

It is against this background that our own reaction to India's need for grain must be appraised. More than 5 weeks ago President Truman sent a specific message to Congress asking for immediate action on legislation to provide part of the food required if widespread famine is to be averted. Though bills to this effect were introduced, both in the House of Representatives and the Senate, little legislative progress has been made to date and only the Foreign Affairs Committee of the House has taken action. With Congress now about to begin its Easter recess, passage of the needed legislation cannot be expected before early April, if then.

Here surely is a record of procrastination in the face of great need. Whether the matter is viewed from the humanitarian point of view or from the need of India's friendship in the present great world struggle, the record to date is not one of which we can be proud. In view of the steady worsening of the situation, it may well be that American aid, if it is ever forthcoming, will be too late to avoid great suffering and substantial loss of life. The Indian Government has asked the Soviet Union for aid, too, but, so far, no reply has been received. It is not inconceivable that the Kremlin, ever sensitive to propaganda opportunities, will take the initiative and provide some grain before we ourselves get around to acting. In any case, the need for the prompt action is indisputable. Famine will not wait.

"Just as Sure as the Sun Rises in the East, Some Day the Poor Wretches Behind the Iron Curtain Will Demand Freedom, and They Will Find Freemen Everywhere Extending Them the Right Hand of Good Fellowship"—Dr. John R. Steelman

OF

HON. FRANK W. BOYKIN

OF ALABAMA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Tuesday, April 3, 1951

Mr. BOYKIN. Mr. Speaker, once again Dr. John R. Steelman, the Assistant to the President of the United States, has presented to the Nation's television audience several high Government officials in order to have them make report to the people of the United States on matters of deep concern and which are subject, to a greater or lesser degree, to the control of those appearing on the National Broadcasting Co.'s Sunday afternoon television program Battle Report, Washington.

Chief among these on this program were Maj. Gen. Ward H. Maris, Chief of Research and Development for the United States Army; the Honorable John Sherman Cooper, consultant to the Secretary of State; Mr. C. Vaughan Ferguson, Jr., officer in charge of Iranian affairs; Capt. Thomas U. Sisson, commanding officer of the U. S. S. Leyte; and Under Secretary of the Navy the Honorable Dan A. Kimball.

Mr. Speaker, each Sunday for more than 6 months past, Dr. Steelman has appeared in person, acting as a sort of monitor in selecting and presenting individuals whose current activities as Government officials make their individual reports of public interest.

On Sunday last, however, Dr. Steelman was not in the studio in person. He was with the President's party at Key West, Fla., assisting the President in the discharge of the many tasks that follow our Chief Executive wherever in the world he might go and for whatever reason that brought him there.

In this week's talk—by the use of audio and motion picture film—Dr. Steelman told briefly of what the Soviet radio has been recently saying about us. "Among the lies," he observes, "the Kremlin is spreading about our country, is one about our streets being filled with starving people, while a small group of so-called rulers live in luxury. The power-drunk despots in the Kremlin," Mr. Steelman went on to say, "are afraid to tell the truth—afraid to let their subject enjoy the freedom to live their own lives and think their own thoughts."

In his report to the people, General Maris told of the work of research and development of the United States Army, and spoke briefly of the tremendous improvements that have recently been wrought in the production of tanks, of antitank weapons, of defenses against hostile attacks from the air, and of the work that is being done in the development of guided missiles. "While," General Maris explained, "there is no guaranty of pushbutton warfare being just around the corner, it can be said that gratifying progress is being made in providing powerful and practical atomic weapons for tactical use by the ground forces."

Mr. Cooper, State Department adviser and consultant to the Secretary of State, talked briefly of the benefits that would accrue to our Nation if Congress were to enact legislation which would enable the dispatch of more troops to Europe, while C. Vaughan Ferguson, Jr., painted a graphic picture of the fantastic murder of the Premier of Iran, long distinguished by his friendship with the United States.

Mr. Ferguson detailed the importance of the friendship of Iran to the people of the United States, as well as the strategic value of that country to our own Armed Forces in the event of global warfare. He graphically pointed out our good fortune in having such freedom-loving people, as are the Iranians, on the front line of those who are battling against communistic forces of the world.

Capt. Thomas Sisson, of the United States Navy, told of the work of the United States Carrier Leyte and of the splendid record of its performance in Korean waters, while Under Secretary Dan C. Kimball high-lighted the story of the exploits of the Leyte, and spoke of the forthcoming documentary presentation of combat films now being made of naval operations during the second war period.

Mr. Speaker, the receipt in my office of more than 1,000 letters evidence the public interest in the splendid television program, Battle Report, Washington, as produced by Ted Ayers, one of NBC's ace producers, and carried out over the air on the coaxials each Sunday afternoon. It is because of that interest that I ask the unanimous consent of my colleagues to extend my remarks and include this program in the records of this day's proceedings.

What follows is the audio portion of Battle Report, Washington, delivered on the network of the National Broadcasting Co., on March 11, under the auspices of Dr. John R. Steelman.

BATTLE REPORT, WASHINGTON

Mr. BRINKLEY. As the enemy—losing 24,000 men in 3 days—reels before the new onslaught of our allied troops, NBC television again turns its cameras on the Nation's Capital for another film-documented battle report.

Washington, where the Senate this week—its eyes on the struggle between East and West—voted the 13-year-old draft and universal military training, while in Korea, where the struggle is hot, American jets spark an aerial offensive that sweeps the front as our troops surge across the Han River.

This is Dave Brinkley, filling in for your narrator, Bob McCormick, who yesterday left for a first-hand examination of the trouble zones of Europe in behalf of Battle Report—standing by to report to you today. Maj. Gen. Ward H. Maris, Chief of Research and Development for the Army; Adviser to the Secretary of State, John Sherman Cooper, just back from Western Europe; C. Vaughan Ferguson, the State's Department officer in charge of Iranian affairs; Capt. Thomas U. Sisson, commanding officer of the U. S. S. Leyte, and the Under Secretary of the Navy, Dan Kimball. Usually on Battle Report in person, but this week with President Truman at Key West, Fla., is Dr. John R. Steelman, helping the President with the work he must carry with him. Today, he reaches you by way of sound-on-film. The Assistant to the President, Dr. John R. Steelman.

Dr. STEELMAN. During the past few days I have been getting reports upon what the Soviet radio is saying about us and about themselves. It is the same old story every day. The Soviet Union is pictured as a land of plenty, filled with happy, laughing people. The men in the Kremlin have appointed themselves as champions of peace. We, on the other hand, are called warmongers. Our streets are supposed to be filled with starving people, while a small group of so-called rulers live in luxury.

Obviously, the broadcasters make no effort to tell the truth. It cannot be because they do not know the facts, because they are available to all. Free nations do not operate behind an iron curtain.

There can be but one reason why these falsehoods are preached to the pitiable people who have been ensnared in the tyrants' the Mohammedan Bible—a mosque is a sacred ground and sanctuary from all acts of violence. But as the crowd closed in behind the Premier, a young man rushed forward, whipped a pistol from his coat, and fired point blank at Premier Ali Razmara. The Premier, a friend of the United States, was killed instantly. The murderer was a fanatic, with no Communist connections. There have been some demonstrations and signs of unrest. The situation is serious, but the Persians have been in trouble before.

A glance at the map shows why Iran is always in the thick of trouble. The country is a triangular area wedged in between the Arabian peninsula, southern Asia, and Russia on the north. It is almost two and a half times the size of the State of Texas. It has a thousand-mile border along the iron curtain. It lies across the ancient land and sea routes from Europe to the Far East. It possesses some of the world's richest oil fields.

During the last war Iran was occupied by Russia. British and American supply troops came in later. Billions of dollars of war equipment were shipped into Russia via Iran. Roosevelt, Churchill, and Stalin held an important conference in Tehran, the capital of Iran, in 1943.

After the war the Russians refused to live up to their agreements and leave the country. They established an independent regime in Azerbaijan, the rich northwestern province along the Russian border. Iranian officials were arrested. Landowners were killed. Banks were nationalized. However, Iranians do not scare easily. They have been fighting the Russians off and on for 200 years. They appealed for help to the United Nations. World opinion rallied behind the UN. Iran ordered her troops into the northern provinces. Russia backed down. Since then Iran has turned more and more to the United States for help.

In 1949 the Shah paid a formal visit to the United States. Recently most of our newspapers carried pictures and stories of the Shah's wedding. On Wednesday the Premier was assassinated. The Shah immediately appointed one of his elder advisers as Acting Premier. He and the Shah face many problems. First, of course, are the Russians. In recent months the Russians have changed their policy toward Iran. They have ceased their efforts at intimidation. They profess to be friendly to the Iranians.

Second, Iran is trying to raise the living standards of its people. The country is potentially rich but underdeveloped. The United States is helping with this development program. The first point 4 program in the world was signed with Iran. We have extended loans for agricultural development and road building. We have sent military aid. We have offered to provide technicians and to train Iranian students in our own schools and colleges. We will continue to support the Shah and his Government in every practical way.

Much depends on the people of Iran. They are hard working; they are individuals; they abhor the Communist doctrine; they have been invaded many times since the days of Cyrus the Great. But they have never been subjugated. We are fortunate in having such freedom-loving people on the front line of the non-Communist world.

Mr. BRINKLEY. Norfolk, Va., where the Navy takes out of mothballs and puts into service again another 45,000 tons of sea power—the U. S. S. Wisconsin. In retirement since 1948 and the third battleship of its class now in operation, the Wisconsin will soon stand ready to add its weight to the enviable record the Navy is blasting almost daily off the Korean shore. Here, as seen by our cameramen, is the Navy in thundering action there.

First carrier back from Korean waters is the famed U. S. S. Leyte, shown arriving at San Diego. To tell you of her dramatic dash from the Mediterranean in time for the battle of the Yalu River—as well as something of her other engagements—we focus our cameras now on the Leyte's commander, Capt. Thomas U. Sisson.

Captain SISSON. In April of last year it was my privilege to be ordered as commanding officer of the U. S. S. Leyte. Shortly afterward we sailed for the Mediterranean. Our air group of over 80 planes consisted of Grumman Panther jet fighters, Vought Corsair fighters, and Douglas Skyraider dive bombers.

We continued intensive training to bring ourselves to maximum combat readiness.

We were in Italy when the Korean War began. We then visited France, Greece, and Turkey and saw first-hand the depressing effect the early Korean reverses had upon the morale of those countries.

Another carrier relieved us while at Beirut, Lebanon, and we received dispatch orders to proceed at best speed to Korea. The 18,500 miles from the eastern end of the Mediterranean through the Panama Canal to Korea were covered at an average speed of 23 knots. This is a record sustained high-speed run for any ship. We arrived in Korea shortly after the Inchon landing. Our air group then aided in covering the advance to the Yalu, bombed the Yalu River bridges, covered the marines in their magnificent fighting from Chosin Reservoir to the sea at Hungnam and continued to cover the Army in their resistance to the Chinese invaders through the beginning of the present skillful offensive.

Although we in the Leyte are glad that it is our turn to come home, we feel the important thing is to win the war in Korea, as everything we hold sacred is at stake there. We feel that we are winning that bitter war by the spirit and determination of the men in the fighting, and we know their spirit will be matched by equal determination at home not to yield. We must give them the moral and material support they need to finish the war quickly. It can be done. We do not want the sacrifice of the four fine officers that our Air Group lost to have been made in vain, and I want to pay tribute to them now. Lt. Cmdr. Ralph M. Bagwell, of South Carolina, shot down and captured; Lt. (Junior grade) Ronald R. Batson, of New Jersey, shot down and missing; Ensign Jesse L. Brown, of Mississippi; and Ensign George W. Wagner, of Indiana, both killed in action. I am happy to state that we lost no enlisted men in the Korean operation.

The military lesson in Korea is a reemphasis on the importance of balanced forces working together, the kind of unity that is provided only by the will to work together to a common worthy end. The Leyte is proud to have been able to come from the Mediterranean on the other side of the world and contribute her share in that effort.

Mr. BRINKLEY. Here with some more pertinent facts on the Leyte, as well as an announcement of importance concerning a new and exciting series on the Navy you'll be seeing on NBC television in the future, is the Under Secretary of the Navy, Dan A. Kimball.

Mr. KIMBALL. I'm glad to have the opportunity to add a line or two to the Leyte story. Captain Sisson has spoken with the usual modesty which I have come to regard as the characteristic of the professional naval officer. There are some additional facts which I think you all should know.

During 4 months in Korean waters, the Leyte was in port only 2 weeks. Of the time she spent at sea, there were only 4 days when the Leyte did not conduct combat operations. During the combat period, there were more than 4,000 operational take-offs from her flight deck. These figures, and the pictures you have just seen, speak for themselves.

Leyte was but one of the vessels flying the flags of United Nations members in Korean waters. These ships are engaged in a great combined naval operation in support of the free world's resistance to Communist aggression and expansion. On the sea, just as on the land, the United Nations defense is a united effort.

Daily in Korea, just as they did during the Second World War, combat photographers risk their lives to bring to the American public action pictures such as you have seen this afternoon. In the months to come, the television audience is going to have an unparalleled chance to see a great documentary presentation of combat films made of naval operations during the second-war period.

The Navy is happy to cooperate with NBC in the preparation of this naval history. Navy and NBC technicians are preparing to screen literally hundreds of thousands of feet of Navy and Marine Corps combat film to pick out the very best for incorporation into this series. Much of our film for various reasons, including security, has never before been shown.

I want to commend the National Broadcasting Co., on behalf of the Navy, for the enterprise they have shown in planning this series.

Peace in the Pacific

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. ALEXANDER WILEY
OF WISCONSIN
IN THE SENATE OF THE UNITED STATES

Tuesday, April 3 (legislative day of Monday, March 26), 1951

Mr. WILEY. Mr. President, I have before me one of the major addresses of recent times made by a distinguished spokesman on American foreign policy. I refer to an address delivered by the Honorable John Foster Dulles, in Los Angeles, Calif., last Saturday, March 31, at the fiftieth anniversary dinner of Whittier College.

Mr. Dulles addressed himself to one of the major issues coming up in the near future—the peace treaty with the Japanese Government. No man who has reviewed the tremendous economic, political, and social problems tied up with that treaty, for example, the single issue of reparations alone, can fail to appreciate the tremendous primary job which has been done by our former colleague in the Senate, Mr. Dulles. I believe that the features which he indicated he feels should be in the treaty will be of interest to my colleagues, and so I ask unanimous consent that the text of his address be printed in the Appendix of the RECORD.

There being no objection, the address was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

I am grateful to Whittier College for giving me this opportunity to make a progress report on Peace in the Pacific. That subject is, I suppose, of particular interest to web. It is cowardice. The power-drunk despots in the Kremlin are afraid to tell the truth—they are afraid to let their subjects enjoy the freedom to live their own lives and think their own thoughts.

But history teaches us that men cannot be enslaved forever. In the mind of every man is the desire to seek happiness in his own way. Without freedom he cannot do it. Propaganda is no substitute. Just as sure as the sun rises in the east, some day the poor wretches behind the iron curtain will demand freedom—and they will find freemen everywhere extending them the right hand of good fellowship.

Mr. BRINKLEY. An army may move on its stomach, as someone once said, but how fast and how successfully it moves depends a great deal upon the equipment with which it fights. Guns, tanks, trucks, jeeps, bombs, bazookas, mortars—these and other fighting stuff like them, go a long way toward fixing an army's pace, its fire-power and Sunday punch. Thus, not only in men, but in machines—war machines—must the strength of a nation be measured. Behind the steadily increasing variety of war equipment with which our soldiers are armed—equipment ranked the best in the world—is a story of constant research and the testing of new weapons. To tell us how it looks from the inside, we bring you now the Chief of Research and Development for the Army, Maj. Gen. Ward H. Maris.

Major General MARIS. History abounds with magic and simple recipes for insuring national security or victory in warfare. To one Civil War general, it was just a matter of "gittin' thar fustest with the mostest men." A dozen years ago, it was the Maginot line. Nineteen hundred and forty-five produced "atom-bomb-itis"—the assured conviction that the atom bomb, supplemented by a vast complex of mysterious pushbutton devices, is all that would be needed.

Failure to achieve a quick and easy victory over the Communist armies in Korea has been a severe shock to the adherents of this sublime faith in a single key to victory.

Also, questions have been raised: What is wrong with American weapons and equipment? Has the Army made any improvements?

When World War II ended, there existed a vast supply of the then current weapons and equipment. We know that this material was of proven effectiveness; but we also knew that improvements and revolutionary developments could, and indeed must, be accomplished.

On the recommendation of our scientific advisers, the limited funds available to the Army for research and development were devoted to a balanced plan which included: First, basic research over a period of years to replenish the reservoir of good ideas which had been used up by our wartime agencies, such as the Office of Scientific Research and Development; second, correction of known deficiencies in existing equipment and improvement of its design; third, development of components for completely new facilities of weapons and equipment; and finally, development of unconventional items of warfare, the majority of which were necessarily on a long-term basis because of their complexity and high cost.

From this research and development program, came a steady stream of advances. In many cases models of new items have existed for months. Placing these models into mass production, however, could not be started until money became available with which to pay for them.

Only during the last few months, under the impetus of a shooting war, have we been given funds to start mass production. It is primarily for this reason—rather than lack of research and development—that the Army has been forced to rely largely on World War II material.

I would like nothing better than to be able to give you the details of the hundreds of active research and development projects, but I know you will understand why I can mention only a few.

Antitank weapons: The key here is ammunition, for it is ammunition that kills the tank. With many outstanding developments in this field already or soon to be available, the infantryman, the tanker, and the artilleryman, will have the means to stop and kill any known enemy tank.

Tanks: Here we have developed a family of tanks for all possible missions. After World War II, because of limited funds, development in this costly field was devoted to component parts, such as engines, transmissions, and fire control. The valuable fruits of this decision are now being realized in the greatly superior characteristics and performance of our new tanks. The Walker Bulldog, our new light-gun tank now in production, mounts a gun with greater armor penetration than the 85-millimeter gun of the Russian T34 medium tank. Our new heavy-gun tank incorporates radical innovations in design and will mount a weapon which will destroy any known enemy tank at combat ranges. The first models of our Patton medium-gun tank family have creditably undergone their baptism of fire in Korea. Later models will be much improved.

Here is another payoff in our postwar research program: Now in production for distribution to our combat divisions is a complete new signal communications system, embodying all of the latest advances in the electronics field.

For defense against hostile air, great improvements have been made in fire control which will enable our antiaircraft to engage modern high-speed airplanes.

Further means of increasing our effectiveness against hostile air will be provided by guided missiles, which are being pushed on an all-out basis.

Other guided missiles are also being developed for tactical use by front-line commanders against ground targets.

With no guarantee of pushbutton warfare being around the corner it can be said that gratifying progress is being made in providing powerful and practical atomic weapons for tactical use by the ground forces.

All this effort, of which I have mentioned only a small part, is pointed to just one thing—the best possible support for the combat soldier—the man who finally wins the war.

Mr. BRINKLEY. To remind those of us who need reminding that the defense of freedom in Korea is a joint enterprise which we carry on with our UN allies, here are scenes of a British brigade in action somewhere along the Korean front. Fighting side by side with Turk mountain fighters, Greek Evizones, Aussies and Anzacs from Australia and New Zealand, they are daily throwing themselves into battle with the same courage that marked their victories in World War II.

Far from the sound of battle, however—though very much related to it—are the talks of the Big Four deputies that continue in Paris. It is from the Europe with which they are primarily concerned—Western Europe—that our next guest has but recently returned. Here to report to you on what he saw and heard there is the former Senator from Kentucky and former United States delegate to the U. N., John Sherman Cooper, consultant to the Secretary of State.

Mr. COOPER. A great debate is now taking place in the Nation and in Congress upon the question of sending additional troops to Europe. It may be a debate much larger than that single issue—it may decide how important we think the defense of Western Europe is to the defense of the United States.

I am sure that the opposition to sending troops to Europe is based upon the fear that our partners in the North Atlantic Treaty organization will not do their full share in the defense of Western Europe, or, as it has been bluntly said, they do not possess the will to fight. It is to these ends that I want to talk briefly, basing my remarks and conclusions upon my observations and conversations with many people upon a recent trip to Western Europe. Twice last year upon returning from Europe I had to report that, in my opinion, the efforts that were being made by our partners were inadequate and timorous and led to the conclusion that they did not have confidence that Western Europe could be defended.

At the conclusion of this trip I was happy to report that you could see there a growing determination and effort, which could lead into adequate defense for Europe. You may ask me for my facts upon which I base that conclusion. First, I am certain that the governments of Europe have made a decision that Europe can be defended and that their countries must participate fully in that defense. A year ago that was not true—they still believed then that it was possible to carry on their domestic programs without diminutions. Today, as our country has made the decision, their governments have made the decision that defense is prior.

Second, they are taking action to carry that decision into effect in terms of money, men, and production. In the United Kingdom the defense budget has been increased three times since Korea; in France by 50 percent, and in Italy by 50 percent. In all of those countries and in all the countries in Europe forces are being increased, are being trained, and are being equipped. Production is not yet enough, but at least in the United Kingdom an adequate program is under way. Most important, it is easy to note there the growing confidence of the people of Europe that Europe must be defended, that it can be defended, and that they must support the efforts of their government.

I would like to say this—that the indispensable element in the building of a defense in Western Europe is the confidence of the people that it can be built, and the requisite of that confidence, the most important requisite, is their belief that the United States will participate fully in that defense, not only in the air or on the sea but also upon the ground. Unless that effort is made, it is possible that this movement which is now taking place and growing in Europe could and would fail.

Mr. BRINKLEY. In Iran—so recently jubilant over the wedding of their Shah Mohammed Pahlevi—this has been a week of sorry bloodshed. Premier Ali Razamara, friend of the west, was brutally assassinated, and only the day before yesterday, leaflets threatening the life of the Shah himself were distributed throughout Tehran, as crowds of leftist peace-partisans—apparently Communist inspired—demonstrated before the United States Embassy with cries of "Death to MacArthur."

As a tanker refuels a naval vessel on the Mediterranean with Iranian oil, facts now begin to reveal that behind the trouble lies the question of the nationalization of the British-owned Anglo-Iranian Oil Co., which controls oil resources vital to the west and coveted by Russia. For a full report on this situation, we turn now to the State Department's officer in charge of Iranian affairs, C. Vaughan Ferguson, Jr.

Mr. FERGUSON. One morning last week the Premier of Iran or Persia entered the courtyard of a mosque in Tehran to attend a funeral service. According to the Koran—

Since the arrangements for peace and security in the Pacific will in part be outside of the peace treaty and since the whole problem is not yet fully explored, we consider that any presently suggested treaty provisions are to be supplemented in the light of the outcome of the promising exchanges of views which are now taking place, and to which we attach the utmost importance. No one should assume that the United States takes this problem lightly or that we shall accept a solution that will be illusory.

REPARATIONS

As regards reparations, the United States does not question the inherent justice of the proposition that Japan should make good the damage done to others by its aggression. Reparation is, however, not merely a matter of what is just, but of what is economically practicable, without disastrous consequences. We have closely examined this problem. Considerable industrial machinery has already been removed from Japan and given to countries having reparation claims. Also, there is substantial Japanese property within allied countries which, as indicated, should be applicable to the satisfaction of claims. It is, however, not easy to see the possibility of Japan's providing future reparation out of her remaining capital assets or as a surplus from her current economic activity over coming years.

One of the gravest problems which confronts Japan, and it equally concerns the reparation creditors, is whether Japan, deprived of its formerly-owned sources of raw material and with a population of eighty-five million on four relatively small and barren islands, can maintain the standard of living and employment necessary to prevent widespread social unrest. This, if it occurred, would inevitably give rise to dangerous expansionist and explosive tendencies, which Japan's Communist neighbors would joyously exploit.

The United States, to prevent social and economic unrest within Japan since the occupation began, has advanced about $2,000,000,000 for relief and economic assistance. That is a realistic measure of how seriously the United States views this problem and its responsibility as principal occupying power. However, the United States is not prepared, after the occupation ends, to continue indefinitely such economic relief. Neither is it willing in effect to pay Japanese reparations by putting into Japan what reparation creditors would take out. The United States considers indeed that its postwar advances have a certain priority status.

We doubt that it is practicable to get the essential over-all and long-range results which are sought if the treaty also seeks to extract reparation payments other than in terms of the Japanese assets already received from Japan or within the territory of the Allied Powers. However, the United States has not closed its mind on this subject, and it is, with an open mind, actively exchanging views with countries which were most grievously damaged by Japanese aggression.

ECONOMIC DISABILITIES

Some suggestions have been made as to imposing upon the Japanese economic disabilities, as, for example, requiring a dismantling of a part of Japan's industrial plant, particularly her shipbuilding capacity. As experience in Germany has shown, such provisions cannot be carried out without arousing great public bitterness. If the peace treaty required the first postwar Japanese Government physically to decimate Japan's industrial equipment, it would impose an almost inhuman burden, and the consequences would almost surely be against the best interests of the Allied Powers.

FISHERIES

It has been suggested, particularly along the Pacific coast, that the treaty of peace might itself attempt permanently to regulate the problem of Japanese participation in high-seas fisheries. To attempt that would almost surely postpone indefinitely both the conclusion of peace and the obtaining of the results which are desired.

There is, I believe, a considerable possibility of agreement between the United States and Japanese fishing interests. However, the treaty of peace is not a treaty merely between the United States and Japan; it is a treaty which we hope will be signed by all of the 53 Allies. Most of these nations have their own fishing problems and their own theories of solution, which differ widely. No quick results can be won by attempting to make the peace treaty into a universal convention on high-seas fishing.

When I was in Japan, the Prime Minister advised me that the Japanese Government stood ready to negotiate fisheries agreements as soon as peace restores to Japan the possibility of independent sovereign action. He said that in the meantime the Japanese Government would prohibit Japanese nationals and Japanese vessels from going into conserved fisheries in all waters, and he mentioned specifically those off the coasts of the United States, Canada, and Alaska.

The Japanese now see the importance of avoiding practices which in the past brought Japan much ill will, and if we can hold to our tentative timetable, there can, I believe, be an early and equitable settlement of this thorny problem.

A PEACE OF RECONCILIATION

From the foregoing it can be seen that the Japanese peace settlement we seek, while it would confirm the cut-back of Japan's territory to her home islands, would contemplate that Japan would be a sovereign and sustaining member of the free world. She would contribute in due course to collective security in accordance with her means, but without developing armament which could be an offensive threat. Also, from an economic standpoint, Japan would be expected to get along without such subsidies as the United States has been providing during the occupation. On the other hand, Japan would be restored to a position of equality, free of burdensome and discriminatory conditions. In essence, the peace would be one of reconciliation.

That is not the kind of a peace which victors usually grant to a vanquished nation which has committed armed aggression on a vast scale. It is not surprising that some, made bitter and distrusting by Japan's past conduct, would like to impose upon Japan continuing burdens and restrictions. Some of these, taken separately, seem to have justification and perhaps no one of them alone would be of decisive historical significance. In the aggregate, however, they would fundamentally change the character of the peace settlement.

The major objective of any Japanese peace treaty is to bring the Japanese people hereafter to live with others as good neighbors. That does not require that the Japanese people should be pampered. It does mean that the victors should not take advantage of Japan's present helpless state to impose, for the future, unequal condition. It means that the peace settlement should restore the vanquished to a position of dignity and equality among the nations.

The peace would be a peace of trust, not because the past justifies trust, but because the act of extending trust usually evokes an effort to merit trust. It would be a peace of opportunity, in that it would afford the Japanese people the same opportunity to develop peacefully their domestic economy and their international relations as are enjoyed by most of the other free nations of the world.

UNITED STATES RESPONSIBILITY

In proposing that kind of a peace, the United States assumes a serious responsibility, for the results cannot be guaranteed. We have, however, a duty to exercise our best judgment as to the kind of peace which will endure. Circumstances have made our duty inescapable.

In the great war in the Pacific, we had valiant allies who, through long, hard years, poured out life and treasure according to their means. But the United States possessed most of the means required for victory in the Pacific. The United States has carried the responsibility of occupation, and the accomplishments of General MacArthur as Supreme Commander represent a moral investment to which his countrymen cannot honorably be indifferent. The United States has contributed the economic aid which has prevented the post-war misery which would have exposed Japan to capture by communism. The United States is the member of the free world which possesses large present and prospective military power in the western Pacific, and today we are the principal contributor to the United Nations effort in Korea, which fends off danger to Japan, to our Pacific allies, as well as to ourselves.

These are some of the circumstances which require the United States to exercise an initiative for peace; to do so while there is still time, and to shape that initiative with all of the wisdom and all of the vision that is available. For a misjudgment as to timing or as to substance, can bring incalculable disaster to all mankind.

The United States does not consider that it has any monopoly of responsibility, nor any monopoly of experience, wisdom and enlightenment that are required. We have no desire to "go it alone" nor have we the slightest thought of dictating. We continuously have sought and shall seek the views of others and, indeed, our present suggestions are a composite, not deriving from any single source. They reflect the ideas of many, and the United Kingdom and Australia are two important sources of actual language that we accept. However, in the last analysis, the United States cannot, in justice to our own people, or indeed to others, become cosponsor of a peace settlement which in our judgment, made after ample consideration without arrogance and in humbleness of spirit, would throw unnecessary and intolerable burdens of a military or economic character upon the United States, and jeopardize the lasting peace that the war was fought to win.

NO VETO

Happily, the exchange of views which have taken place have, with one exception, been altogether cordial and no basic disagreements have developed. The Government of the Soviet Union is, perhaps, an exception. For three months its representative joined with us in full and frank discussions. But now that a peace treaty with Japan seems actually to be in the offing, the Soviet leaders seem to have taken fright. The Soviet government has publicly announced that it will not resume discussions with us.

When peace is far off, the Russian leaders speak lovingly of peace. But when peace comes near, they shun peace like the plague.

We continue to hope that the Soviet leaders will join in a treaty of peace which would cost them nothing and which would start a relaxing of tensions which would be felt all around the globe. We are ready to give scrupulously full consideration to any views they may express. We shall steadily urge that they join in the Japanese peace.

Fortunately, however, Soviet participation is not indispensable. The Soviet Union has no legal power to veto. It has no moral due-bills, for its vast takings in Manchuria, Port Arthur, Dairen, Sakhalin, and the Americans who live on our west coast. Actually, peace in the Pacific is equally important to all of us, for danger and effort can no longer be localized.

Two principal postwar goals of the Soviet Communists are Japan and Germany. If Russia's rulers could exploit the industrial and human potential of either Japan or Germany, it would be a sad day for peace. That would involve such a shift in the balance of world power that these new imperialists might calculate that they could start a general war with good prospect of success. They know that Japan, even alone, was able seriously to menace the free world in the Pacific and they imagine vast possibilities out of a combination, under their direction, of the Asiatic power of Russia, China, and Japan.

Fortunately, the Japanese people do not want that combination, which would make them the front line of a new aggression which in the end would mean disaster far greater than that which they have already suffered. They are in a mood to reject militarism in all of its aspects, and they want fellowship with the nations which genuinely seek peace through collective security in accordance with the principles of the United Nations. Thus there is the opportunity to make a Japanese peace which will not only end the old war, but give new strength and hope to those who strive to prevent another war.

To achieve that kind of peace is the President's mandate to the Mission which I have the honor to head and President Truman, Secretary Acheson, and Secretary Marshall are each of them giving this effort their close personal attention, to the end that this great goal shall be achieved.

Since our mission was established last January we have had a busy time. All or some of us have been to Japan, the Philippines, Australia, New Zealand, and England. We have consulted in Washington with ambassadors of other nations and also with the many in the executive and legislative branches of our Government whose wisdom, judgment, and special knowledge can be helpful. The Foreign Relations Committee of the Senate, its Far Eastern Subcommittee, and the Foreign Affairs Committee of the House have extended the utmost cooperation. As a result of all this we have seen the possibility of formulating peace terms which should command general support here at home, which should involve no insoluble differences with our allies, and which should be acceptable to Japan, which we consider has now earned the right to be consulted.

So, this week, we have begun to discuss, with our allies principally concerned in the Pacific war, actual texts which might be incorporated in an eventual treaty. These texts are still working papers, tentative and suggestive only.

We contemplate a simple document, limited to the essentials of peace.

PREAMBLE

Our present thought is to have a preamble to the treaty which would afford the Japanese people the opportunity to express their intentions as to matters which are important, but which for one reason or another do not lend themselves to absolute contractual undertakings.

For example, Japan might indicate its intention to apply for membership in the United Nations. There is no doubt about the reality of that intention, but we think that Japan's application for membership, when it comes, should bear the unmistakable imprint of Japan's own desire, without the slightest taint of external compulsion. Similarly, the Japanese may want to express their intention to carry forward the new ideals as to human rights and like matters which are largely embodied in Japanese legislation under the occupation and which are the subject of the United Nationals Universal Declaration of Human Rights. They may want to declare their intention, in public and private trade and commerce, to conform to internationally accepted fair practices.

Japan's intentions in these respects are vitally important and go to the heart of our future relations. But except as these matters have already been spelled out in international conventions which Japan could and would adopt, they do not lend themselves to peace treaty obligations, which should only be such as can be precisely formulated so that the parties will clearly know just what are their right and duties.

TERRITORY

The treaty proper would prescribe the territory over which the Japanese will hereafter be sovereign. It is contemplated, generally speaking, that Japan's sovereignty should be limited in accordance with the agreed surrender terms. That would mean sovereignty over the 4 home islands and minor adjacent islands. There would be a renunciation by Japan of all rights, titles, and claims to Korea, Formosa, the Pescadores and the Antarctic area. Also the treaty might contemplate that in the Ryukyu and Bonin Islands there could be United Nations trusteeship and continuing United States administrative responsibility.

The South Sakhalin and Kurile Islands were allotted to Russia at Yalta and are actually in Russian possession. Any peace treaty validation of Russia's title should, we suggest, be dependent upon Russia's becoming a party to that treaty.

SECURITY

The security of Japan itself should, we think, be worked out through individual and collective self-defense arrangements authorized by the United Nations Charter. Thus the peace treaty itself need only affirm that, upon the coming into force of the peace, Japan would in fact possess what the Charter of the United Nations refers to as the inherent right of sovereign nations in these respects.

COMMERCIAL

As regards commercial arrangements, we do not think that the treaty of peace should itself attempt to define what should be the future permanent relations between the Allies and Japan. These might better be left for subsequent negotiation between a free Japan and other friendly nations. However, to prevent confusion and to minimize discrimination immediately following the coming into force of the treaty, Japan might, for such a period as 3 years, agree to accord most-favored-nation treatment to the Allied Powers, except that Japan would not, in any matter, be required to extend more favorable treatment than is accorded it. Similarly, as regards civil air-traffic rights, Japan might for 3 years, and pending the conclusion of civil air-transport agreements, grant the Allied Powers not less favorable conditions than those prevailing at the time of the coming into force of the treaty.

PROPERTY AND CLAIMS

With respect to property and claims, the treaty of peace might give the Allied Powers the right generally to vest, retain, and dispose of Japanese property within their territory, while Japan should return prewar allied property in Japan and validate prewar claims belonging to Allied Powers and their nationals.

The foregoing matters can, we believe, now be dealt with with considerable precision. There are others which are still subject to exploration and development.

JAPAN'S SECURITY

Since Japan is now thoroughly disarmed and materially and legally unable now to maintain armed forces, there is need for provisional security measures. Accordingly, with the authority of the President, and following conversations with committees of Congress, I stated publicly in Japan that, if the Japanese wanted it, the United States would sympathetically consider the retention of United States Armed Forces in and about Japan, so that the coming into force of a treaty of peace would not leave Japan a vacuum of power and, as such, an easy prey to such aggression as has already shown itself in nearby Korea. This suggestion of mine was warmly welcomed by the Japanese Government and the people generally, so that it is now in order to study the implementation of such an arrangement.

Since Japan is an island, its security is strongly influenced by sea and air power, power which the United States is in a position to exercise in the Pacific. The defense of Japan need not require, either now from the United States or ultimately from Japan, as large ground forces as might be thought to be necessary if Japan had common land boundaries with militaristic powers.

PACIFIC SECURITY

Bound up with the problem of Japan's security is the broader problem of security in the Pacific. Japan should hereafter make some contribution of its own to security, but this should never be the pretext for militarism that could be an aggressive threat. Thus, the problem has a dual aspect.

No nation able to make a dependable contribution to security should get a free ride. In our Senate the Vandenberg resolution has laid down, for the United States, the basic proposition that collective security arrangements should be based upon "continuous and effective self-help and mutual aid." The United Nations Charter also establishes that all peace-loving states should stand ready to contribute armed forces, assistance, and facilities for the purpose of maintaining international peace and security. That is one aspect of the problem. The other side of the problem is that Japan should never again develop armament which could be an offensive threat or serve other than to promote peace and security in accordance with the purposes and principles of the United Nations Charter. The peace we seek is one which will for all time liberate Japan's neighbors and indeed the Japanese people from the nightmare of militarism.

When we were in Canberra, Australia, our mission had significant discussions on this subject with the Governments of Australia and New Zealand. They made convincingly clear the attitude of their peoples on this subject. Now we are working actively to find the ways to secure the desired results.

We believe that out of our discussions, which are now well advanced, there will emerge a series of arrangements which on the one hand will enable the Japanese to make their own indispensable contribution to preventing their nation's being forced into the service of the new imperialism that ominously threatens from the mainland, and which on the other hand will effectively assure that there will be no unbridled rearmament which could become an offensive threat.

The United States is able, and daily growing more able, to exert a mighty influence for peace and to make peace in the Pacific more secure than it has ever been before. We can see the way to remove the pall of fear which results from Japan's past conduct and from the present Communist menace. But that is not a task which we would or should undertake single-handed and alone. In the Pacific, as elsewhere, security is a cooperative enterprise. Those who wish to cooperate for security can share the protection of immense deterrent power which, in the words of the United Nations Charter, "shall not be used; save in the common interest."

Kuriles repay it a thousandfold for its 6 days of nominal belligerency. Japan, unlike Germany and Austria, is not divided by zones of occupation.

In relation to Japan there is the opportunity to show which of the Allies of World War II now have the genuine will for peace. There is the opportunity for them to make a peace so righteous that the example will hearten and uplift men everywhere. That is the opportunity; and to its challenge we are determined worthily to respond.

Memorandum on Acceleration

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. WILLIAM BENTON
OF CONNECTICUT
IN THE SENATE OF THE UNITED STATES
Monday, April 2 (legislative day of Monday, March 26), 1951

Mr. BENTON. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to have printed in the Appendix of the RECORD the memorandum on acceleration prepared by President A. Whitney Griswold, of Yale University; also President Griswold's lead article in the current Atlantic Monthly, dealing with the same subject.

I should like to point out the special emphasis which Dr. Griswold puts on the need for political and cultural leaders, as well as military leaders, engineers, doctors and other scientifically trained personnel. He is wholly right in stressing that the defense effort is as much political and cultural as it is military, and I am pleased that he has seen fit to quote General Bradley in this area, an area in which I have personally been greatly interested over a long period of years. Dr. Griswold sounds an important warning when he stresses that "high standards and fundamental values should not be sacrificed, but invoked and applied more vigorously than ever in all fields of learning".

Mr. President, I commend these important papers to the Congress and to the administrative officers in the Defense Department and elsewhere who are now responsible for the development of policies on our manpower and its most productive utilization for the long term as well as the short term interests of the American people.

I am informed by the Public Printer that the manuscript is estimated to make approximately three pages of the RECORD, at a cost of $246.

There being no objection, the memorandum and article were ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

MEMORANDUM ON ACCELERATION

(By A. Whitney Griswold, president, Yale University)

I. BASIC ASSUMPTION

A prolonged period of warfare with ever-present danger of global war, creating exceptional demands for trained manpower of all kinds and requiring a sustained effort to meet those demands.

II. OBJECTIVES

1. Engineers, doctors, and other scientifically trained personnel sufficient in number and quality to satisfy both our civilian and our military needs.

2. Political, cultural, and military leaders sufficient in number and quality to ensure the success of our defense effort and the continued progress of our civilization.

3. This twofold objective is implicit in a defense effort which is as much political and cultural as it is military, and of which General Bradley recently said, "Fundamentally, the United States is competing at this time for the hearts and minds of men in Europe and Asia." If this effort is to succeed we must give the fullest possible scope and the most effective possible representation to our free culture and our free society.

III. MEANS

1. The principal means of accomplishing these objectives is higher education; hence our colleges and universities have an essential mission to perform in the national interest—

(a) They must carry on the scientific research that may hold our security and our lives in the balance.

(b) They must maintain the flow of doctors, engineers, scientists, and officers essential to the Armed Forces.

(c) They must plant the seeds of higher education for a free society in the minds of young men at whatever time and in whatever circumstances the colleges may have them in their charge.[1]

2. These considerations call for the most effective possible utilization of our higher educational resources. High standards and fundamental values should not be sacrificed but invoked and applied more vigorously than ever in all fields of learning.

IV. METHODS

1. To accommodate both groups of students, that is, (a) those who elect to take a year of college before military service, then return to college; and, (b) those who prefer to render their military service before entering college, some form of acceleration is indicated. Young men having to budget 4 years for college plus 2 or 3 to military service before entering upon (or, in the case of professional candidates, even beginning to prepare for) their chosen careers, should be given the opportunity to shorten the duration of their studies and apprenticeship commensurately (a) with the educational standards cited above, and (b) with their own ability.

2. Acceleration in the form of a continuous cycle of 48-week academic years consisting of three 16-week terms each (permitting four normal academic years to be crammed into 28 months) is not consistent with the above standards and does not serve the essential purposes set forth in this memorandum. We tried this scheme in the last war and found it a failure. It exhausted the faculty and fed the students knowledge faster than they could absorb it. It resulted in an all around lowering of standards and cheapening of products. Education, particularly at the college level, is as much a process of maturing as it is of learning. Centuries of experience have proved that this process, applied to the basic arts and sciences of our liberal-arts curriculum, cannot be hurried. A bachelor of arts awarded for four normal academic years crammed into 28 months is a bachelor of arts awarded for quantitative achievement or servitude. It is like awarding a prize to the artist who paints the most pictures instead of the artist who paints the best.

Periodic breaks in the routine of teaching and learning are absolutely essential to both teacher and student. The teacher needs freedom from the classroom to carry on the research and writing that sustain his teaching. The student needs the same freedom to digest what he has absorbed in lectures and discussions; to do the independent work essential to the learning process; to perform the outside labors that—in an ever increasing majority of cases—help pay his way through college; to recruit his intellectual energies. These breaks in routine are as vital to the educational process as any other integral part of it.

3. The only kind of acceleration consistent with the standards, purposes, and conception of the national interest herein set forth is acceleration in the sense of economy, discipline, and qualitative improvements. Both the example of British and European secondary schools and the experience of our own colleges and universities indicate the 8 years consumed in secondary school and college might be reduced to 7 without impairing standards. Acceleration in this form calls for—

(1) Elimination of waste motion all along the line.

(2) Strengthening the secondary-school curricula in both substance and discipline.

(3) Eliminating redundancy, jargon, "gut courses," and excessive extra-curricular activities from the colleges.

V. CONCLUSION

1. As things stand a college student normally spends 44 months (from October of his freshman year to June of his senior year) in acquiring a bachelor of arts or equivalent degree.

2. If the above procedures were set in motion this period could be reduced to 32 months, as follows:

(a) three normal academic years of two 16-week (approximate) semesters each plus,

(b) 2 summer terms (at the end of freshman and sophomore years, respectively) of 8 weeks each, with the possible addition of an optional 8-week summer term for entering freshmen.[2]

3. The 8-week summer terms should be used for intensive work in such subjects (e. g. foreign languages, elementary mathematics[3]) as—

(a) Lend themselves to intensive treatment; and

(b) Afford a contrast with the regular term's work.

4. Acceleration of this type would result in educational improvements of immediate benefits to our defense effort and of lasting value to our society.

SURVIVAL IS NOT ENOUGH

(By Whitney Griswold)

I

Communist aggression in Asia has scored one tactical success not commonly recognized as such. It has struck a body blow at American higher education. Barely recovered from the disruptions of the Second World War, our colleges and universities are once more called upon to sacrifice their students, faculties, and curricula to military necessity. No one knows how great these sacrifices may be: The colleges may be confronted with the worst financial crisis in their history. If the lives of many private institutions be threatened, our public institutions will suffer and our whole educational system will be the poorer. If the long-run objective of communism is to destroy our free society at its source, the farther we go toward stripping our colleges of students, dismissing their teachers, and accelerating their curricula, the nearer the Communists will have got to achieving that objective.

[1] It is assumed here that even with an 18-year draft, many younger men will enter college before being called up; that this will remain a matter of individual choice; and that the colleges will therefore find themselves responsible for a preinduction as well as a postservice undergraduate program.

[2] Colleges operating on the quarter system could accomplish approximately the same results in three full-length and one short quarters.

[3] They might also be used by ROTC units for intensive work, especially outdoor training, which they have to conduct at reduced pace during the regular academic terms.

Such desperate measures can be justified in the name of national survival. We will fight to survive, and we will fight before our backs are to the wall, for our security and our principles. All this is clear in our history, our character, and our present actions. Our college students and professors share this destiny with their countrymen in every walk of life. They could not escape it if they wished to, and they do not wish to. But they have a mission in society, and the question is how much of that mission they can sacrifice without again losing the peace and perhaps even losing the war.

In the emergency, we talk of college education as a nonessential and an expendable. While we lavish our ingenuity and resources on the weapons of war, we neglect and even handicap the men who will use them. This is a high price to pay for survival. And what price survival if we become a headless monster?

Our colleges and universities are not ivory towers. They are wellsprings of humanistic and scientific learning and of the spirit that puts that learning to use in the cause of freedom. Their long-run value to our arts and sciences, to our whole ideal of a free society and a free culture, is hardly open to question.

And in the emergency? Never in the whole history of warfare has the strength of armies depended to such on their soldiers—especially their officers—articles of faith as it does today. What else has transformed the sleeping peasantry of Russia and China into great military machines? What has muffled the Voice of America and inhibited our efforts to preserve world peace, but the impression we have given other people that, for all our wealth, generosity, and efficiency, we are "light half-believers in our casual creeds"? Cromwell's maxim, in obedience to which he made himself one of the world's great military geniuses, should be engraved on the walls of the Pentagon: "I had rather have a plain russet-coated captain who knows what he fights for and loves what he knows than what you call 'a gentleman' and is nothing else." The greatest source—greater than any other in our society and greater than all others put together—of American captains who know what they fight for and love what they know is our colleges and universities. The greatest, indeed, the exclusive, source of scientific learning and personnel necessary to sustain those captains in modern warfare is our colleges and universities. We tamper with that source at our peril. There is more identity between our long-run cultural interests and our short-run military interest than there is conflict.

II

How short will the run be? Local Korean wars may continue indefinitely. The first frightful spasm of global war may resolve itself into an interminable war of the worlds. This is not a situation we can dispose of by dropping everything for the duration and picking up where we left off, as though we were knocking off for lunch. The only safe assumption is a long pull, and the only proper goal at the end of it is victory, not survival. We seek neither triumph nor conquest but a fulfillment of the moral purposes that moved us to make the effort in the first place. This must be a sustained effort. It cannot even begin if it counts the days and gambles on the duration. The very nature of the effort places the highest premium we have ever placed on our educational system. It rules out education as usual, not for the reasons usually given, but because education as usual is not good enough. It calls on us to educate not fewer citizens but more, not less well but better.

This is the greatest irony of all: That the circumstances calling for the greatest educational effort in our history should be so hostile to that effort. Just 3 years ago, President Truman's Commission on Higher Education, declaring that "the future of our civilization depends on the direction education takes, not just in the distant future, but in the days immediately ahead," fixed our goal at a college population of 4,600,000 by 1960. This would have meant 2,500,000 men and women enrolled in the thirteenth and fourteenth grades, 1,500,000 in the fifteenth and sixteenth, and 600,000 above the sixteenth. Based on an inventory of our needs, resources, and native ability as reflected in Army general classification tests, this figure was given as the minimum necessary to fulfill our social ideals and maintain our economic and cultural progress. In addition to this quantitative responsibility, the commission charged our colleges and universities with qualitative improvements of all kinds, particularly those which will make clear the ethical values and the concept of human relations upon which our political system rests.

The report of the commission makes wistful reading today. Out of a total college population of around 2,300,000, we now have about 1,500,000 men in our colleges and universities—grades 13 through 16. Of these we expect to graduate approximately 380,000 this June. As these words are written, we are debating a military service law that would reduce the total male enrollment to 950,000 next year, 665,000 the year after, and 643,000 in 1954–55. If the law should be enacted, our graduating classes would drop proportionately from 380,000 this year to 81,000 in 1955. If the ratio of college men to women that obtained in 1940 be applied to the Truman Commission's goal, it would give us a total male enrollment (grades 13 through 16) in 1960 of 2,400,000. The total predicted for 1960 if the present bill is passed is 732,000. The needs of our society are to this measure as 24 is to 7.

In the long run, if this ratio is maintained, it means a staggering setback to our cultural development—to our arts, our sciences, and our polity. Among the tables published by the Truman Commission there is a column of figures entitled "Lost Leadership." The figures represent the men and women who have the capacity for higher education, and from whom our society urgently needs the benefits of higher education, yet who, for one reason or another, do not receive it. In 1947 the commission put our wastage of these precious human resources at 2,383,000, a figure it expected to decline to 1,296,000 by 1960 if prevailing trends continued, and to zero, or thereabouts, if the commission's recommendations were put into practice.

Think of the wastage if we pursue our present plans. And think of the consequences. We are not, at the moment, producing enough doctors for the Armed Forces or enough engineers for industry. Yet in Russia, if we can credit the evidence offered by the director of the office of scientific personnel of the National Research Council in his recent testimony to the Senate Subcommittee on Preparedness, medical, scientific, and technological institutes are full and their enrollment is increasing. The same is true of the Russian pedagogical institutions, where the Soviet version of knowledge is propounded. From 1943 to 1948 Russia is said to have graduated 150,000 engineers and 350,000 engineering assistants of the technical institute grade, and these numbers are on the increase; while our own estimated total for the next 5 years is only 118,000. Numbers deceive, and Russian statistics are unreliable. We have Allied engineers to swell our total, while Russia must provide for her satellites. Russia's pedagogical institutes can be outmatched by an honest—and a thriving—program of the liberal arts. An army which knows that its leaders dare to trust it with the truth holds an advantage for which no dialectical substitute has yet been found. But this is not the point. The point is that the Communist dictatorship, the military colossus now threatening to bestride the world, appears to be making use of higher education as a strategic asset, while the democratic leader of the free world does not.

What can be done to redress the balance in our favor? So many plans, involving such complicated arithmetic, have been proposed to Congress that it is impossible to predict which one, or which combination, will prevail. All fall and most of the winter these plans have kept our colleges in confusion and students in suspense. At the moment of writing, the debate between the advocates of an 18-year and a 19-year draft seems to be heading for the compromise of an 18½-year draft, a compromise that makes little sense save as a compromise.

As indicated by other nations' military service laws, it seems universally accepted that the best fighting years of a man's life come between the ages of 18 and 26; and, as indicated by the ages of our outstanding amateur and professional athletes, splitting the difference by 6 months one way or the other is specious. One thing seems certain. Before these words appear in print we shall have adopted a policy—whether universal military service and training, or a new application of selective service, or both—that will require some form of military duty of all young men; that will cause serious reductions in our college population for the next few years; and that will interrupt the normal process of higher education for an indefinite time to come. This is the prospect we must bank on and try to make the most of in the light of the emergency and in the light of the world we hope to live in when the emergency is over.

As to the first point, that all young men be held responsible for some form of military duty, there can be little argument. A policy that spells out this biological fact does no more than make specific and regular what has always been implicit. The Yale News has spoken forcefully on the subject. In a recent editorial it pointed out that just about everybody had testified at the universal military service and training hearings "except the very people whose futures are being decided." As for the latter:

We would submit that the vast majority of 18-year-olds would answer more or less as follows:

1. They are prepared to serve their country in the Armed Forces.

2. They can see no major importance in the age differential between men 18 and those 19.

3. They bitterly resent their mothers' pleas that they are to young to serve.

4. They would prefer to have it definite that they serve right after high school rather than go to college uncertain of their stay there.

The obligation of military service is accepted. The overwhelming desire of the men who will do the fighting is not deferment but a uniform policy on which they can all count and make plans.

But how and when shall that obligation be discharged? It is here that we run into the debate that has occupied so much of our educators' and military experts' time during the past few months. The debate has been at least temporarily resolved by the new law. But as long as our young men retain any freedom of choice as to when they will enter the armed forces whether immediately upon completion of high school or later, after a year or two of college—and until we have repaired the deficits of educated manpower previously cited, we shall still face unfinished business and unanswered questions. We must answer these questions scrupulously from the standpoint of the national interest. What would be the purely educational consequences—to the students themselves and to their teachers—if everyone signed up for military service before entering college?

I can think of at least three good ones. First, it would promise us more mature students when they eventually entered college; and as every teacher knows, and our returning veterans proved, education is as much a process of maturation as it is of learning and instruction. Second, it would send us students free of indentures, able to lay their plans and choose their courses without the distraction of military or specialized training requirements. Third, after the initial two or 3 year gap had been closed, it would restore our student enrollment to its normal level. This last argument is the weakest because it assumes that as many men would enter college after military service as would have done so directly from high school. This assumption rests on two others: namely, that military circumstances will permit them to return, and that their desire to do so will not have diminished. Given a favorable military situation, a liberal plan of tuition scholarships, and our experience with the veterans of the last war, this whole set of assumptions is tenable.

Opposing precollege service are two serious considerations. The first is the interruption in the flow of doctors, engineers, and other scientific personnel, which many experts in these fields believe would be disastrous. This can be prevented by selecting students and assigning them to specialized college training after 3 or 4 months of basic military training. A more serious consideration is the maturity of high-school graduates as compared with men who have completed at least 1 year of college. If the Cromwellian maxim is sound, the odds are in favor of the college men as against an army of schoolboys. The former should be a more stable, more resourceful, and more purposeful fighting force both in action and in training.

If the American high school took its students as far as its British or European counterparts, we might dismiss this consideration. But it does not. On the contrary, the graduate of a British public school or a French lycée is ready to enter our college sophomore year, and I have known some to enter our junior year. It may be that the intellectual apparatus of these young men—particularly the Europeans—has been developed beyond their years. Nevertheless, they have had better discipline and, by definition, more higher education than our high-school graduates. The Russian military service law now in force defers high-school students until they graduate or reach the age of 20—the level of our college sophomores. The basic assumption underlying this whole discussion is that we are in for a long pull, in which we stand to win or lose, not only as soldiers but as representatives of a particular civilization. To send our young men abroad in either capacity before they fully comprehend that mission is to neglect one of the most essential phases of their training.

IV

On the whole, with more than a million men becoming 18 each year, I think we can leave the choice of military service before or after entering college with those whose ages permit them to exercise it. Some will prefer to get it over with at once, others to take a year of college. The more freedom of choice we can preserve in these Spartan times the better. But we have no choice whatsoever in what we must do for these young men. Whether they are called at 18 or 18½ or 19, as high-school graduates or as college freshmen, we must give them the richest educational experience of which we are capable before they go, and the greatest educational opportunities of which we are capable when they come back. Only thus can we put in the field an army that knows what it fights for and loves what it knows, the present soldiers and the future scholars.

This is the prime responsibility of American higher education in the emergency. Apart from preserving the higher learning that for 2,000 years has instructed and illuminated western civilization, apart from the scientific research that may hold our lives and our national security in the balance, alone and distinct and urgent, is the intellectual and spiritual fate of the men of fighting age today who will be tomorrow's philosophers and statesmen. They are our best hope of survival. What do we propose to do for them?

One of the first answers on everyone's lips is "acceleration." In the terms in which it is generally understood, I think this is a poor answer. These terms contemplate a round-the-clock, three-term cycle that crowds four normal academic years into less than three calendar years and keeps on revolving until the faculty collapses, the students revolt, or the emergency ends, with the odds favoring the demise of the faculty. Here we have another expression of our naïveté as to the nature and purpose of education. Our colleges and universities may be driven to accelerate by financial necessity, by the terms of our military service law, by ROTC contracts, or some other force majeure. I do not know a single member of the teaching profession who has anything good to say for it on its merits. Our purpose is not to save our students from the draft or salvage their tuitions or get them as far as we can up the 4-year ladder before they are called to duty. Our purpose is to give them a sense of what they are fighting for, a mature introduction to the higher learning of their civilization in the fullness of its humanistic wisdom and scientific genius, and a desire that will survive the drudgery of military service to come back and carry that civilization forward.

We cannot accomplish this purpose by accelerating. I think we would come nearer to it if we gave our students fewer courses and let them take their time with their studies. When I described acceleration recently to a distinguished French colleague, a member of the Collège de France whose ancestors have been teachers since the eighteenth century, he shook his head sadly and said: "Knowledge without culture. Knowledge without pleasure. Absorption without digestion." "Followed by regurgitation," I prompted. "I hope so," he replied; "that at least would show that the students were healthy." To keep our fields fertile we practice crop rotation. Shall we do less for our minds? To speed up our basic courses in the arts and sciences for this long-drawn time of trouble promises nothing but intellectual erosion and academic dust bowls. No one suggests that we take our summers off to loaf. Our faculties need them for the research and writing that sustains their teaching through the academic year. To our self-supporting students (a great majority in the Nation) they are an economic necessity. Our ROTC units might use them to intensify both the course work and outdoor training which they have to conduct at a minimum during the academic year. Students deferred for specialized nonmilitary training could make similar use of them. For these two groups, for students not yet called up, and ultimately for those returning from service, I would be willing to compromise on an 8-week summer term of intensive work in such subjects (for example, foreign languages or elementary mathematics) as lend themselves to intensive treatment and afford a contrast with the regular term's work. But as a matter of principle, I would far rather award a BA degree for three rich, unhurried years than for four lean ones run off against a stop watch.

In the long run it may be necessary to shorten the time consumed in the eight grades of high school and college. If students have to budget 2 or more years to military service they may very well become impatient with the 4-year college curriculum. I do not see why we should not make it possible for them to earn their B. A. degrees in 3 years, whether consecutive or interrupted by military service. But there is one fundamental condition precedent. To accomplish this purpose, without cheapening the B. A., means jacking up our standards of secondary education. We cannot give a 3-year B. A. to students who are inadequately prepared for it. Even with the 4-year degree, as every college admissions office knows, our secondary-school performance is very uneven in this respect. At the best our secondary schools are as good as any in the world, and with a few curricular extensions and revisions could easily carry their students as far as any. At the worst their students are ill-prepared for a 4-year B. A., and the worst greatly depresses the average. The result is that the best-trained students mark time as college freshmen while their less-favored classmates catch up, and they all enter sophomore year from scratch. To "accelerate" by eliminating this redundancy and waste motion would accomplish an educational reform long overdue in the United States. The emergency gives us a powerful incentive to attempt it.

The only reason why the worst American secondary schools should not be as good as the best is our indifference, our failure to comprehend the purpose of education. This is what tolerates the politics, incompetence, and miserably inadequate teachers' salaries that prolong the adolescence of the American youth and send him off to college with a child's mind in a man's body. Here is an area of war effort in which our colleges and universities could cooperate with our secondary schools to the mutual advantage of both and the incalculable advantage of the Nation. Here, conceivably, is a mission for our college teachers temporarily unemployed by military service legislation. Matching grants of public and private funds in support of this mission, properly defined and administered, would be a direct investment in the future of our political institutions and our culture.

V

There are many things our colleges and universities might do to improve the educational advantages of the men going off to war and the opportunities awaiting them on their return. They could run pilot plants to test and perfect the curricula of our twelfth and thirteenth grades, an experiment that might offer immediate benefits to the students and colleges concerned and have far-reaching consequences for our entire educational system. It would almost surely reveal more effective methods of accelerating—that is, by eliminating waste and treating boys like men instead of men like boys—than trying to pour 4 quarts into a 3-quart bottle. They, the colleges and universities—both on their own and in cooperation with the United States Armed Forces Institute—might offer extension courses for men on military service. This might have many advantages. It would keep track of students who had left after a year of college. It would help sustain their momentum. It might enable them to anticipate a course or two. At the very least it would offer an improvement on the Army's educational comics. Both projects—the pilot plants and the extension courses—would have the practical advantages of providing employment for the faculty and income for the college.

This is a time for self-inspection and self-improvement, for which opportunities exist on every campus. Far be it from me to say what others should do: I am too busy with the mote in my own eye. But I seem to see a country which wants better of its educational system, and deserves better of it, than it gets. Wherefore the discrepancy? Because, and here I return to my theme, we do not understand its purpose. We still think of it as a luxury and a privilege, when in reality it is a necessity and an obligation. We still (too often and too many of us) confuse it with other things, with politics, with business, with athletic sports. Once we see it clearly, how it all hangs together, from the primary school to the graduate school, and serves its purpose, in Jefferson's phrase, as "the most legitimate engine of government," I am convinced that we will speedily find ways for higher education to serve us in the emergency. We will find ways to rescue our colleges and universities from their financial difficulties and enlist them in the common cause. To doubt our ability to afford this is to doubt our reason. In 1947, the year of the Truman Commission's Report, we spent $1,005,000,000 on higher education in the United States. Last year we spent slightly over $1,000,000,000 on television sets. Five years ago nobody owned a television set. This is brand-new money, spent on a new toy, having nothing to do with the emergency, our security, or our survival, but only with our pleasure. It tends to prove—does it not?—that we can always find the money for what we want if we want it badly enough.

I would argue from this that we can easily afford to finance our mixed system of public and private higher education as an essential industry in the emergency and an essential key to the survival and progress of our civilization. But the will must precede the plans. That is why I would say to the planners and accelerators what Thoreau urged his preacher to say to his well-intentioned, nervous, action-starved, news-hungry neighbors: "Pause! Avast! Why so seeming fast, but deadly slow?"

Saving Taxpayers' Money

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. KENNETH B. KEATING
OF NEW YORK
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Tuesday, April 3, 1951

Mr. KEATING. Mr. Speaker, the Rochester (N. Y.) Times-Union in editorial comment has hit the nail squarely on the head as to what we must do in Congress in order to effect really extensive budget reductions and increase the take-home pay for wage earners. We can make cuts here and there in appropriation bills and, of course, should do so where extravagances stick out like a sore thumb. But the only way a sufficient reduction will be brought about which will really hit pay dirt is through the elimination of services, activities, and functions which cannot measure up to the test of essentiality in these times of necessarily increased defense expenditures.

We have endeavored to point the way to at least one method by which this problem can be approached systematically and courageously. Those of us who have sponsored the bill to breathe life into the Hoover Commission have no particular pride of authorship. But we do urge, I believe justifiably, that if anyone has a better plan to meet this extremely urgent problem, they should come up with it. The important thing is not how the job is done, but that it be done.

Under leave to extend my remarks, I include two editorials from the Rochester (N. Y.) Times-Union. The editorials follow:

SAVING TAXPAYERS' MONEY

Secretary of Commerce Charles Sawyer at a recent meeting of the Ohio Newspaper Association asked the help of newspaper publishers on what he called a troublesome problem—"the problem of saving money, specifically the taxpayers' money."

He pointed out that trimming here and there is not enough, that real economy must rest on dropping functions and services that the Federal Government now performs. This is certainly true.

Then the Secretary suggests that instead of making general statements about Government economy, the publishers might draw up a list of specific activities which they think could be eliminated.

"The President," he said, "on several occasions has asked for specific recommendations of activities which can be eliminated."

We cannot believe that Secretary Sawyer has kept very close to the problem of economy in Government or has watched very closely the President's attitude toward cutting Government down to size. The problem hasn't been troublesome enough in the right quarters.

The fact is that any number of carefully considered lists of nonessential activities of Government have been made.

A year ago the Committee for Economic Development, of which Marion Folsom, of Rochester, is chairman, carried out a thorough research project and came up with a list of specific proposals for balancing the budget. Nothing happened.

Senator DOUGLAS, Democrat, Illinois, also prepared a list.

Senator BYRD, who as head of the joint committee on executive expenditures has watched Federal spending more closely than any other man, had a list last year and has a new one this year.

Representative KENNETH KEATING and 10 other Members of the House have bills to recall the Hoover Commission to point out what activities, in view of our new world situation and the gigantic increase in defense spending, are nonessential.

Instead of going around the country asking for suggestions, it would seem more appropriate to get to work on the sound suggestions that have already been made.

CUTTING AGAIN

The House is back at a familiar point. It is tweeking the noses of "those bureaucrats downtown" by slicing a bit here and there off appropriation bills.

The first three items in the Treasury and Post Office bill each took cuts totaling $898,000, with deeper cuts pending.

Readers of this newspaper will know that these and even deeper cuts will be applauded here.

But the fact is that they don't mean a thing.

So long as the Treasury and Post Office—or other departments—are required by Congress to perform certain functions and services, they will be performed no matter what cost Congress sets in the appropriation bills. If the cost is greater than the allowance in the bill, the department will come back for a deficiency appropriation—and get it.

Congress can make real cuts in appropriations only by trimming the functions and services. It cannot win a reputation for economy by merely whittling appropriations now and passing deficiency appropriations later.

Representatives KENNETH KEATING and 10 other Representatives have a bill before the House to recall the Hoover Commission to guide Congress in listing the functions and services that in this emergency are nonessential.

This is the way to wipe the slate clean. Support of this bill and compliance with the Commission's recommendations will separate the sheep from the goats on the economy issue. Until then, shaving a little here and there is sound and fury, signifying practically nothing.

Senate Concurrent Resolution, General Assembly, State of Iowa

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. CHARLES B. HOEVEN
OF IOWA
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Tuesday, April 3, 1951

Mr. HOEVEN. Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my remarks in the RECORD, I attach herewith Senate Concurrent Resolution 13, as adopted by the Senate and House of the Fifty-fourth General Assembly of Iowa on March 16, 1951:

"Senate Concurrent Resolution 13

"Whereas the Secretary of Agriculture of the United States has by arbitrary abuse of authority forced on the potato growers of northern Iowa unwanted marketing agreements by the use of an illegal if not fraudulent referendum reminiscent of the methods of dictator governments; and

"Whereas Secretary of Agriculture Charles F. Brannan in the administration of the notorious and infamous potato program is seeking to act as a potato czar in 12 Iowa counties and to govern the marketing practices of northern Iowa farmers without their consent or approval; and

"Whereas this purpose has been shown specifically in the case of Harold McKinley, of St. Ansgar, Iowa, and is threatened in relation to the other potato growers of 12 Iowa counties; and

"Whereas Brannan is trying to force these Iowa growers to market only those potatoes which meet his approval under regulations against which the Iowa growers voted overwhelmingly, 24 to 1; and

"Whereas Brannan then overcame this overwhelming and disapproving majority by blanketing the Iowa counties into a voting area which contained four other States and part of a fifth; and

"Whereas the resulting district was a political sham and a shameless example of gerrymandering which destroyed the right of Iowa farmers to determine how they shall be governed and how they shall market their own produce; and

"Whereas they were forced into an area where they were subjected to the domination of the would-be potato czar and must accept his choices as their representatives and must observe his regulations over their business; and

"Whereas he has created discrimination between these growers and their neighbors outside the artificial boundaries which he set; and

"Whereas he will cause them severe business losses as well as the sacrifice of their liberties unless corrective action is taken; and

"Whereas the methods of coercion employed by the United States Secretary of Agriculture in the above instance can be applied to the growers of other agricultural products and can also be used to curb free competition in industry; and

"Whereas the practice of government by administrative directives if unchecked can result in loss of opportunity and the basic freedoms on which this country was founded; and

"Whereas just government derives its powers from the consent of the governed: Now, therefore, be it

"Resolved by the Senate of the Fifty-fourth General Assembly of the State of Iowa (the house concurring), That the Congress of the United States give serious consideration to the passage of appropriate legislation specifically limiting the Secretary of Agriculture in the use of directives; be it further

"Resolved, That Congress give earnest consideration to the proposition that the lawmaking power is constitutionally an exclusive prerogative of legislative bodies and Congress should take immediate steps to thwart every encroachment on that power; be it further

"Resolved, That the secretary of state is hereby directed to forward copies of this resolution to the President of the United States, to the President of the Senate and the Speaker of the House in Congress, and to each Member of the Iowa delegations in the Congress of the United States, under seal of his office.

"X. T. PRENTIS."

We, W. H. Nicholas, Lieutenant Governor of Iowa, and Carroll A. Lane, secretary of the senate, hereby certify that the above and foregoing resolution was adopted by the Senate and House of the Fifty-fourth General Assembly of Iowa.

W. H. NICHOLAS,
Lieutenant Governor of Iowa.
CARROLL A. LANE,
Secretary of the Senate.

Rebuke Should Hit Higher

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. KENNETH B. KEATING
OF NEW YORK
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES
Tuesday, April 3, 1951

Mr. KEATING. Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my remarks, I include an editorial from the New York World Telegram. The editorial follows:

REBUKE SHOULD HIT HIGHER

Natural and proper aftermath of the Hiss trial and conviction, which the United States Supreme Court refused to review, is the bill introduced again by Representative KENNETH B. KEATING of this State which would forbid the appearance of Supreme Court Justices as character witnesses.

The public was shocked by seeing Justices Felix Frankfurter and Stanley Reed take the stand for Alger Hiss at his first trial. It also became more evident than ever that judges who let themselves act as character witnesses in a given case risk impairing their judicial dignity.

Congress would do well to extend the prohibition to cover all Federal judges. States could and should follow the example in their own courts.

However, in the case of Hiss who stands convicted as a conspicuous liar, not to say sly, it's a pity prohibition or rebuke can't rise even higher than mere judges to reach President Truman, who pooh-poohed the Hiss affair as only a "red herring," also to reach Secretary of State Acheson who still says he will "never turn his back on Hiss."

National and International Problems

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. LAURIE C. BATTLE
OF ALABAMA
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES
Tuesday, April 3, 1951

Mr. BATTLE. Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my remarks I am including a letter from a very dear friend whose comments refer to a questionnaire which she filled out with intelligence and foresight. Her letter expresses deep concern about our national and international problems which is shared by thinking people in Jefferson County and all over our country. The completed questionnaire illustrates how constructive and helpful housewives can be in world affairs today.

BIRMINGHAM, ALA., March 21, 1951.

DEAR LAURIE: Far be it from me to know all the answers to the world's problems. These questions are certainly "scorchers." I can understand now why it takes so long for our Government to decide on a problem, with so many in it and for all of them to make up their minds, and arrive at one definite solution.

I will bet I have worried over these questions and given them more serious thought and consideration than the President himself, and the paper has not been stuck back in a drawer somewhere either. I have had it out in plain view; so, every time I passed by it, I would give the subjects more thought.

We have talked and argued them among ourselves, and when we had company we would discuss them. When I go out I discuss them with friends, but this poor, feeble mind of mine gets more puzzled and complicated to arrive at definite answers or put my opinions down in the form of yes or no.

I realize we think we know all the answers about how to run a government, in bickering back and forth at home among ourselves, but when it comes to the test of our opinion being used in the final decision of such strategic values as you are required to make, my over-all knowledge is quite limited and I have only a meager conception of all the issues involved.

For example, who am I to say whether 18-year olds should be drafted, or veterans, or fathers, with a flat yes or no and no "if's" or "and's" or "but's"?

Laurie, we leave it up to you. Paul and I feel you can properly handle the situation. No matter what the question, we have full confidence in you and much sympathy for you. We feel that you are doing a fine job.

That was a wonderful speech. Best regards to the family and office personnel.

Sincerely,

LULU SMITH.
Mrs. Paul V. Smith.

Minks and Winks

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. KENNETH B. KEATING
OF NEW YORK
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES
Tuesday, April 3, 1951

Mr. KEATING. Mr. Speaker, an editorial writer from the Detroit (Mich.) Free Press has offered an explanation, reasonable though perhaps inaccurate, why the Secretary of Agriculture was recently disturbed by the insertion in a Washington newspaper of an advertisement announcing the recovery of a natural pastel mink coat.

If the lady in the pink mink has been the cause of sounding the death knell of the Brannan plan for regimenting the farmers and socializing agriculture, perhaps her $9,500 mink coat has not been as expensive for the taxpayers as was originally assumed when the shocking revelation about her adornment was made before a Senate committee.

Under leave to extend my remarks, I include below the comments of the editorial writer in question:

MINKS AND WINKS

Everything is confusion between Washington and Key West. New York Congressman KEATING says on the radio that the President has fired the now famous Lady in the Pink Mink (a swell title for a musical). The President, at Key West, angrily denies it. KEATING answers that she was, too, fired but the President got mad because it became known and reestablished her as the confidential secretary of his confidential secretary, which makes it very confidential indeed.

Dropping the gal with the royal pastel mink ($8,450) has never been considered, Key West says. The charge is that this coat was paid for by Joe Rosenbaum, fast moving lobbyist and lawyer, along with commissions, to obtain White House influence on questionable RFC loans.

It is easy to understand Mr. Truman's embarrassing position. If he fires her he confesses to error; and others must follow, like the toppling of a row of dominoes. If he makes no such move to clean house (White House) the stench continues.

Worst of all, practical jokers are moving in on the affair. In Saturday's Washington Star a liner ad advertised as found—Natural pastel mink coat, recovered at 1600 Pennsylvania Avenue NW.—the White House. The telephone number of Secretary of Agriculture Charles Brannan was used. He denounces it as the work of a cruel, sadistic, damned fool.

But you can never tell about these things. Maybe the liner was inserted by a disgusted taxpayer who thinks all wasteful spending comes under some Brannan plan.

Letter From J. D. Garrard, of Birmingham, Ala.

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. LAURIE C. BATTLE
OF ALABAMA
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES
Tuesday, April 3, 1951

Mr. BATTLE. Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my remarks in the Appendix of the RECORD, I am including a letter from Mr. J. D. Garrard, of Birmingham, Ala. As Mr. Garrard points out, he is one of the many taxpayers who are carrying the load which is getting heavier and heavier. I am calling his letter to the attention of the Members of the House of Representatives at this time, as he has requested me to do.

The letter follows:

BIRMINGHAM, ALA., March 12, 1951.
Congressman LAURIE BATTLE,
House of Representatives,
Washington, D. C.

DEAR LAURIE: I've written you many times, but I get so mad before I finish the letters that I burn them.

The utter disregard that the Congress as well as the White House has for the taxpayers' money, the pampering of labor leaders, the planned high cost of living by the so-called wise men in the White House, the potato, butter, and eggs mess, higher and higher taxes to be spent more and more freely are a few of the things that make me mad.

In yesterday's paper I saw a little item that said the refurnishing of the House of Representatives cost $2,667,000. I paid more tax this year than I ever have before, but it would take me more than 3,000 years to pay the refurnishing bill for a place for you to sit in. Are the halls paved in gold? How could that much money be honestly spent just for refurnishing this building? How much of it bought mink coats or deep freezers, etc.? You know somebody got filthy rich on that deal. Why don't you investigate before instead of after the money is wasted? I can't have anything to compare with this House of Representatives' furnishings and there are millions of taxpayers in the same fix, and although they may not write and tell you, I bet they don't like it any more than I do.

I think the elected Representatives of the people should be more careful how they spend the taxpayers' money than they are of their own, and I am darn tired of the Congress giving billions of dollars to every nation that asks for it. You know it's my money that you are giving away, and my vote for you doesn't give you the right to give Britain billions of dollars to become a Socialist form of government or to keep Franco in power in Spain. I am not an isolationist. I am a taxpayer and I'm getting tired of being pushed around by Mr. Atlee or some other foreigner with his hand out.

If you don't get this, you can say "Well he burned that one, too."

Sincerely,
J. D. GARRARD.

P. S.—Please read this on the House floor.

Letter From a GI

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. LAURIE C. BATTLE
OF ALABAMA
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES
Tuesday, April 3, 1951

Mr. BATTLE. Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my remarks, I am including a letter from a grateful GI who is thanking our Government for helping him. His constructive approach to the solution of our difficult problems is commendable.

The letter follows:

BIRMINGHAM, ALA., February 28, 1951.
Congressman LAURIE C. BATTLE,
Federal Building,
Birmingham, Ala.

DEAR MR. BATTLE: I want to first thank the Government through you for my education on the GI bill. I think that this benefit was the best that could have been given a veteran.

As a very scared but uninformed citizen I would like to add my opinions to the many you undoubtedly already received.

It seems to me that we stand to lose to Russia by either of two ways, military invasion or economic disorder.

The present draft laws should take care of the next couple of years, but I've heard the experts are worrying about the next 10 years. It is my understanding that the present draftee is released to the Reserves when he finishes his duty. Maybe this would be a good time to set up a system similar to that of the Swiss. They stayed out of two world wars. I have heard that all physically qualified men are required to serve in a form of active reserve without pay. Of course, any such system for this country would require a lot of modification but the basic idea ought to be sound. Think of all the available manpower and brains that would be on tap for such occasions as the present. Also the interest of the general public would tend to keep the military in better shape during peacetime. Yes, I'm in the active Reserves (Navy) and I still think it's a good idea.

As for economics I know very little about it. We spend a powerful lot of money both at home and abroad and have little to show for it. The national debt can hardly be written on one sheet of paper. We pay the farmers to keep prices up and have price control to keep them down. Advocate competition and pay the airlines and others to keep them in business. Try to regulate or "antitrust" large firms out of business. Something is wrong but I don't know the answer, either.

Looks like we might do with more and better publicity for the United States in Europe and also on this side of the world. We need all the friends we can get.

I'm also against any Firearms Registration Act and for the statehood of Alaska and Hawaii.

Yours very truly,
MAFUS R. BIRD.

Radio Network Monopoly Suppresses Broadcasting of Kefauver Crime Committee Hearings

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. HARRY R. SHEPPARD
OF CALIFORNIA
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES
Wednesday, April 4, 1951

Mr. SHEPPARD. Mr. Speaker, on several previous occasions I have pointed out to this Congress the monopolistic and restraint of trade practices which the four major broadcasting networks—the National Broadcasting Co., the American Broadcasting Co., the Columbia Broadcasting System, and the Mutual Broadcasting System—are conducting in the important field of radio broadcasting and the serious effect of these practices on the economy of the radio industry and, most of all, the serious effect on the radio listening public.

Last week the American Broadcasting Co. saw fit to prevent hundreds of thousands of listeners from hearing the most important public service broadcast in some time, that of the Kefauver crime committee hearings.

I believe the best way to explain this situation is to read an announcement made over radio station WSAY in Rochester, N. Y., relative to this station's effort to bring to the thousands of Rochester radio listeners the broadcast of these crime hearings, and the refusal of the American Broadcasting Co. to allow this station to broadcast them.

In addition to this announcement, I wish to submit, as reported to me, the telephone conversations between Gordon P. Brown, the owner of WSAY in Rochester, N. Y., and the officials of the American Broadcasting Co., telephone conversations of Mr. Brown and his sales manager, Mr. Kelley, with the local ABC radio station outlet, copy of a complaint filed by Mr. Brown with the Federal Communications Commission regarding this serious situation, and copy of rebroadcast permission as requested of these networks by Mr. Brown's radio station WSAY:

WSAY ANNOUNCEMENT

WSAY wishes to bring you, the Rochester radio listeners, this important message. On March 21 the only available broadcast of the Kefauver crime committee hearings which Rochesterians could hear were those which were broadcast on television. WSAY on this date requested permission of the ABC network to rebroadcast these important hearings so that the hundreds of thousands of radio listeners in the city could hear these vital broadcasts. On this date the ABC network refused WSAY permission to rebroadcast these hearings and promptly arranged with the local ABC outlet to broadcast them by delayed recording. Yet, in spite of this, some of the most important portions of these hearings were lost to the Rochester listeners, particularly all of that portion of the hearings broadcast in New York City. Because of ABC's refusal to allow WSAY to rebroadcast important radio programs and to rebroadcast the Kefauver crime committee hearings, the Rochester radio listeners have been deprived of many vital portions of these hearings, as well as other important radio programs. WSAY for years has made it a point to attempt to bring to its listeners many of the important radio programs broadcast but has been thwarted throughout these years by the refusal of the networks to allow this station to do so. WSAY believes that it is high time that such restraint of broadcasting be stopped and is making formal complaint to the FCC regarding this practice of the networks, which has gone on over a period of years. WSAY suggests that you, the listeners, immediately send a postal card or letter to Senator TOBEY, Senate Office Building, Washington, D. C. I am sure that when the Senators are informed of this situation they will take immediate steps to correct the further restraint of radio programing, by the radio networks, to the Rochester listeners. Don't forget, write Senator TOBEY today, Senate Office Building, Washington, D. C. Tell him you want him to look into the withholding of important radio programs from the Rochester listeners by the various networks.

Remember, WSAY is exclusively Rochester owned and operated, and is not in any way controlled by the networks or owned by interests outside of Rochester.

TELEPHONE CONVERSATION BETWEEN GORDON P. BROWN, OF RADIO STATION WSAY, AND DON SHAW, OF ABC, WEDNESDAY, MARCH 21, 1951

Mr. BROWN. This is Mr. Brown at radio station WSAY. We have been checking on television broadcasts of hearings in New York and find no AM station is broadcasting it.

Mr. SHAW. I know just what you are going to ask me, and before you ask me I am going to say that the answer is "No!"

We have had this come up in several cases. [Mr. Shaw stated that in all these cases the requests could not be granted as it could not be granted to WSAY because "our own station in Rochester would be in our hair in 5 minutes. This would be violating the territorial rights of our own stations."]

Mr. BROWN. How come you're not putting it on your AM network?

Mr. SHAW. We have had so many problems. [Mr. Shaw continued to explain the problems arising during the broadcasting by TV of the Senate hearing.] Our TV station in Columbus had requests from two stations. [Mr. Shaw continued to explain that carrying the audio portion of these hearings by the AM stations on their network "would lose too much commercial time. In television we did not have this problem."]

(Mr. Brown asked if this was then the complete situation.) I will ask our director of AM stations and get a final answer.

(Mr. Brown asked if he could hold on while Mr. Shaw got a definite answer.)

(Mr. Shaw replied that yes, the AM station's relation man was with him.)

(There was a pause of 3 minutes while they apparently discussed the situation together in New York before answering us on the phone.)

Mr. WEILEY. This is Mr. Weiley. We are limited in offering you the audio feed of the Senate investigations primarily for two reasons; our own stations would have priority rights on it; second, we might run into A. T. & T. trouble over franchises, and that would involve legal complications. It is a very interesting subject and one which should be delved into more thoroughly.

(At this point the conversation was concluded.)

TELEPHONE CONVERSATION BETWEEN FRED RIPLEY, OF WARC, AND ROBERT KELLEY, OF WSAY, WEDNESDAY, MARCH 21, 1951

Mr. KELLEY. Bob Kelley speaking. I want to find out are you duplicating any of this Kefauver committee thing on AM?

Mr. RIPLEY. No.

Mr. KELLEY. You're not, huh?

Mr. RIPLEY. No.

Mr. KELLEY. I was just wondering if it was going out on AM.

Mr. RIPLEY. I think if it were we would carry it. However, we haven't been offered any yet. We would certainly carry it. They have got an awful ride on TV. We haven't been offered any, but if we are, I think we will carry it.

Mr. KELLEY. Have you asked for it at all?

Mr. RIPLEY. The network has been trying to line up something, but they haven't been successful as yet.

TELEPHONE CONVERSATION BETWEEN FRED RIPLEY, OF WARC, AND CORDON P. BROWN, OF WSAY, MARCH 22, 1951

Mr. BROWN. Are you people going to carry the Kefauver committee hearings?

Mr. RIPLEY. There is no doubt we will if it comes through.

Mr. BROWN. Naturally you have first choice on them. You can broadcast them off of WHAM-TV. If you are going to do this, naturally we won't.

Mr. RIPLEY. We haven't even considered rebroadcasting them off WHAM-TV.

Mr. BROWN. There is a chance that the network itself would do something. As I understand, they aren't going to offer it because their commercial schedule is rather high. We want to give you first opportunity, but if you don't want it——

Mr. RIPLEY. Give me a chance to talk to Sam.

Mr. BROWN. I talked to them and they said the first chance was up to you.

Mr. RIPLEY. We have been trying to get an O. K. on the network. I think we are going to get permission, and if we can, we are going to carry it. I expect clearances by tomorrow. Going right to headquarters, they haven't given anybody in the country permission for doing it yet.

Mr. BROWN. If you can get permission, you are going to do it? We wanted to check; how can they refuse you permission?

Mr. RIPLEY. I think they will O. K. it.

SUPPLEMENT TO REQUEST FOR RECONSIDERATION AND SETTING ASIDE OF FCC ACTION

Re license renewal of ABC owned and operated Stations WENR, WENR-TV, Chicago; KA-4442, KA-4443, area, Chicago; KGO, KGO FM, San Francisco; KA-441, area, San Francisco; WJZ and Auk, New York; KA-4444, KA-4445, area, New York, N. Y.; KA-4180, KA-4440, area, Los Angeles; WXYZ-TV, Detroit, KA-4865, KA-3136, area, Detroit. FCC Public Release No. 60781, March 27, 1951.)

As supplement to my request for reconsideration in setting aside the F. C. C. action regarding the renewal of the ABC owned and operated stations, I submit the following additional objection herewith:

Rochester, N. Y., has four network affiliated AM stations, my independent station WSAY, and one daytime independent station, also one television station WHAM-TV. A great deal of interest has developed in the broadcast of the Kefauver committee crime hearings in New York City. We desired to broadcast the audio portion of these hearings so that people without television sets in the Rochester area could hear them. We requested permission of ABC to rebroadcast the audio portion of the TV broadcast of these hearings, and we telephoned Mr. Donald Shaw of TV station relations of ABC in New York City. He referred me to Mr. Weiley of AM station relations of ABC in New York City. I learned from Mr. Shaw that several other requests have been made throughout the United States to rebroadcast these hearings on AM stations, but all were refused.

Mr. Shaw stated that the AM ABC network and affiliated stations could not carry these broadcasts because of their large amount of commercial programs. Mr. Shaw turned me over to Mr. Weiley who gave the following excuses for being unable to allow me permission to rebroadcast the Government hearings. We quote Mr. Weiley: "This is Mr. Weiley. We are limited in offering you the audio feed of the Senate investigations primarily for two reasons; our own stations would have priority rights on it; second we might run into A. T. & T. trouble over franchises, and that would involve legal complications. It is a very interesting subject and one which should be delved into more thoroughly."

Because the local ABC AM outlet was not broadcasting the audio portion of the TV broadcast of these hearings, the majority of the people of Rochester who own only AM sets were unable to hear this most important broadcast of Mr. Kefauver and Mr. Tobey's investigating committee, particularly the part most interesting to Rochester listeners, that portion conducted in New York City.

After being refused permission to rebroadcast these programs by ABC in New York City, I telephoned the local ABC outlet, WARC, in Rochester, N. Y., who advised me according to the enclosed transcript of my conversation with WARC's manager, Mr. Fred Ripley. It is quite apparent from this conversation that WARC had not intended to rebroadcast the audio portion of the TV broadcast of these programs, but they were waiting for the ABC audio network to place it on the regular AM lines.

If WSAY had had blanket permission to rebroadcast these Government hearings, the listeners of Rochester, N. Y., would not have been deprived of the most important part of the testimony that which was conducted in New York City. There is no doubt that the fact that WSAY, in an aggressive effort to bring this Kefauver program to the Rochester listeners on AM radio, finally forced ABC to feed the program to its affiliate, WARC, in Rochester. The rebroadcast of the audio portion of the TV program of the Kefauver committee crime hearings would have been picked up from WHAM-TV.

WSAY has consistently requested permission (per attached mimeographed request) of the ABC owned and operated stations whose licenses are involved in this proceeding. Attached hereto in addition to the copies of my conversation with WARC's manager Mr. Fred Ripley, are copies of my telephone conversation with the officials of the ABC network.

It is imperative that the ABC license renewals involved herein not be granted until such time as the ABC network realizes that blanket permission to rebroadcast must be given in instances where they do not own the property rights of the programs to be rebroadcast.

I am confident that further investigation by the FCC in this matter will disclose the fact that many communities throughout the United States were deprived of this important broadcast because of the undue restrictions and misinterpretations of the rebroadcast rule by the ABC network. This is quite apparent from the conversation which I had with the ABC officials.

I urgently request that your Commission consider this as a supplement to my request for reconsideration in setting aside of FCC action, filed with you on March 13 regarding the license renewal of ABC owned and operated stations; and that your Commission give careful study to the problems involved and request that the ABC network cease such misinterpretation of the rebroadcast rule, as well as such restraint of rebroadcasting, and that your Commission not renew the licenses of the ABC owned and operated stations until such a time as they discontinue the practices mentioned above.

GORDON P. BROWN,
Radio Station WSAY, Rochester, N. Y.
MARCH 29, 1951.

REBROADCAST PERMISSION AS IT PERTAINS TO FCC RULE 3.191 (d)

We hereby grant blanket permission to Station WSAY to rebroadcast the programs of those sponsors desiring them so rebroadcast by WSAY; and which sponsors are using Station ——— as the originating station for their programs. It is expressly understood that the above blanket permission for rebroadcasting is only for the purpose as it may apply to section 3.191 (d) of the FCC rules and regulations as quoted below; and that nothing in this blanket permission to rebroadcast shall give permission to radio station WSAY for such rebroadcasting as it shall pertain to any program, talent, or any other rights of the program which ——— does not control; nor shall WSAY rebroadcast the program without the express authority and permission of the sponsors, which originate their programs over Station ———.

SECTION 3.191 (D) OF THE FCC RULES AND REGULATIONS

"No licensee of a standard or high-frequency broadcast station shall rebroadcast the program of any other class of United States radio station without written authority having first been obtained from the Commission upon application accompanied by written consent or certification of consent of the licensee of the station originating the program."

Mr. Speaker, it is irony personified that the Senate of these United States entrusted the proceedings of its chambers and gave permission to the American Broadcasting Co. to broadcast these most important crime committee hearings only to find that this radio chain violated this trust of free speech given it by the Senate by suppressing the free broacasting of the public Senate hearings in many communities of this country; and not only this, but the American Broacasting Co. proceeded to make a commercial radio program out of the public hearings of the Senate investigators and their witnesses.

Mind you, my fellow Congressmen, not only did the American Broadcasting Co. withhold the free broacast of this hearing to radio listeners, but this network made a commercial program of these hearings and sold the proceedings of these Government public hearings to Time magazine for its sponsorship. I quote a paragraph from an article titled "Kefauvercasts Prove a Real Tele Bargain," from page 15 of the March 31 issue of the trade paper Billboard, carrying a date line New York, March 24:

ABC-TV PANS OUT

The one outfit to come out ahead on the hearings was ABC–TV which sold the proceedings to Time magazine. The only cancellations suffered by ABC-TV were spot announcements, since the one night the hearings were carried by ABC-TV fell into open time. ABC-TV isn't revealing the deal it made with Time, but it's known that the magazine bought the event at bargain rates.

The American Broadcasting Co. has violated the confidence and trust of the Senate. As licensee of numerous radio broadcasting and TV stations, it has violated its public trust and service obligations and, further, this radio chain has violated the requirement under the licenses which it holds to be "a public interest, convenience, and necessity."

It is high time that the practices of restraint of trade, the restriction of broadcasting and rebroadcasting of radio programs be stopped by these radio chains; and I wish to ask that the Department of Justice, the Federal Trade Commission, and the Federal Communications Commission take immediate action against these radio chains to protect the free radio of this country, and, also, that this Congress favorably consider H. R. 73 and H. R. 10, bills designed to prevent such suppression of radio broadcasting.

A New Direction to World Peace—Help the Russians Get Rid of Stalin

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. CHARLES J. KERSTEN
OF WISCONSIN
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Wednesday, April 4, 1951

Mr. KERSTEN of Wisconsin. Mr. Speaker, I wish to include in my remarks a resolution introduced by me yesterday, the purpose of which is to give a new direction to our foreign policy: an alliance between the American people and the Russian people and other peoples of the Russian Union to help their liberation from their present Communist enslavement. The resolution recently introduced in the Senate and in the House known as the McMahon reso'ution, in my opinion, is defective, faulty, and dangerous inasmuch as it seeks to have us enter into an agreement with Stalin. Agreements with Stalin abandons the peoples he has enslaved. Herewith is the text of the resolution introduced by me yesterday:

Whereas the American people have long accepted the basic principles set forth in the American Declaration of Independence of 1776 in the following words: "* * * that all men are created equal, that they are endowed by their Creator with certain unalienable Rights, that among these are Life, Liberty, and the pursuit of Happiness. That to secure these rights, Governments are instituted among Men,—deriving their just powers from the consent of the governed, That whenever any Form of Government becomes destructive of these ends, it is the Right of the People to alter or to abolish it, and to institute new Government, laying its foundation on such principles and organizing its powers in such form, as to them shall seem most likely to effect their Safety and Happiness."; and

Whereas the American people believe these principles are universal and apply to all men, everywhere, at all times and under all forms of government; and

Whereas these principles flow from certain essential truths, among which are—

That the Creator is the Author of every human being and the Source of his rights and that neither the state nor any other human agency has jurisdiction to exploit any human being or violate his rights;

That the state is a servant to mankind and not its master and may not pervert its administrative and police powers so as to make of them a weapon to violate human rights or to terrorize the people;

That there is a brotherhood of all men but only under the Fatherhood of God; and

Whereas communism wears a humanitarian cloak and poses as the messiah of social justice but in reality has given rise to the most reactionary regime of our time based on barbarism and slavery as a result of its immoral doctrine founded in malice setting man against man, class against class, and all men against God; and

Whereas communism thrusts itself beyond civil government and political philosophy, claiming the whole man, denying all spiritual values, denying his inalienable rights, and seeking to transform all human beings created by God in His Image into soulless biolcgical units, to be fitted into a military and economic machine designed for world revolution; and

Whereas communism, although not native to Russia, was adopted by a small, ruthless Bolshevik minority which by treachery, deceit, brutal force, and terror subverted and destroyed the freedom gained by the Russian people and other peoples within the former Russian Empire in their democratic revolution of February 1917; and

Whereas communism after coming to power in Russia succeeded until recently by means of false propaganda, deceit, police-state methods, and hermetically sealed frontiers, in keeping the non-Soviet world largely ignorant of the plight of the peoples within the Soviet Union and, in turn, keeping the peoples within the Soviet Union in ignorance of the true nature of conditions existing outside its borders and particularly of conditions in the democratic world; and

Whereas communism has taken the lives of tens of millions of human beings in the Soviet Union, including a vast number of the members of its own armed forces (other than in the late war), and has enslaved the peoples by robbing peasants of their farms and transforming them into landless agricultural robots; by chaining workers to their factories and transforming them into homeless industrial robots; by depriving intellectuals of freedom of creative work and thought and transforming them into voiceless ideological robots; by submitting vast numbers from all classes, both men and women; old and young, workers (industrial and white collar), peasants, and intellectuals, to the subhuman conditions of concentration camps in uninhabitable areas and transforming them into a nameless host of more than 15,000,000 state slaves; by the uprooting and dispersal of minority groups; by practicing genocide upon national groups within the Soviet Union and making of the Soviet Union a burial ground of nations; and

Whereas communism is in the process of destroying the institution of the family in the Soviet Union by an enforced collective way of life, by inordinate control and indoctrination of the children, and by setting members of the same family against one another through fear and terror; and

Whereas communism is in the process of destroying religion in the Soviet Union by fostering atheism, by ridiculing and persecuting the sincere religious expression of the people, by perverting religious instincts in the hearts of the young, by murdering the representatives of religion, by destruction of places of worship and the abolition of religious institutions, by tolerating only religious services subservient to the state, and by deifying the leader of the Red regime; and

Whereas communism by force and deceit has transformed into a tool of international aggression, the Soviet Army, conscripted of peace-loving peasants, workers, and intellectuals whose true anti-Communist sentiment has been demonstrated by numerous revolts (such as: 1921—the revolt of the Baltic Fleet at Kronstadt led by Petritchenko; 1937—the plan to overthrow the Communist regime led by Marshal Tukhachevsky, head of all the Soviet armed forces, resulting in the "purge" of four of the five Soviet Army marshals, 390 generals, and over 30,000 other Soviet Army officers; 1943-45—movement involving an anti-Communist army of liberation of over 800,000 soldiers led by General Vlassov), the same army whose patriotic spirit was manifested in the victorious march from Stalingrad to Berlin in the gallant defense of their homeland; and

Whereas communism by making false and appealing promises, in an atmosphere of ideological black-out in the Soviet Union, perverts the patriotic fervor of a certain number of young idealists, who have a genuine desire to serve their people, and exploits it for an antihuman conspiracy; and

Whereas communism in order to extend still further its tyranny concentrates its efforts on promoting artificial hostile feelings between the friendly and peace-loving peoples within the Soviet Union and the people of the United States and of other free nations whose basic aspirations as human beings are identical, and who have no real conflicting interests; and

Whereas communism not satisfied with the exploitation of millions of people in the Soviet Union has already forced Marxist-Stalinist tyranny on the once free and independent nations of Latvia, Lithuania, Estonia, Poland, Rumania, Bulgaria, Hungary, Albania, Czechoslovakia, and also parts of Germany and Austria, and initially on Yugoslavia which still follows the Communist ideology, and in the words of the United States Supreme Court Justice Jackson in the recent case of American Communication Association v. Douds (339 U. S. at p. 429), "The international police state has crept over Eastern Europe by deception, coercion, coup d'état, and terrorism and assassination."; and communism has conquered China and is in the process of attempting to subjugate Korea, Tibet, Indochina, and Malaya, and seeks eventually to enslave freemen everywhere; and

Whereas agreements made by any one or more of the free nations with the Communist regime that now enslaves the peoples within the Soviet Union strengthen materially and morally the position of said regime, weaken the resistance to Communist tyranny, and dim the hopes of the people for liberation; such agreements with said regime being used by it only to its advantage for the purposes of accumulating additional strength and to the disadvantage of every other country seeking honorably to compose differences with it; it being one of the prime techniques of communism to disregard truth and honor and to ignore agreements whenever opportune; and

Whereas, in contrast to the treacherous fifth column that operate in the free countries of the world to enslave them to international communism, there exists in Russia a potential force for freedom composed of the great majority of the peoples of Russia who yearn for liberty, which force, if activated by the encouragement and positive aid of the free peoples of the world, will enable them to liberate themselves and overthrow the Communist tyranny and help place mankind on the path of peace instead of plunging it into the holocaust of a third world war; and

Whereas past tragic mistakes in the policies of certain of the free nations, including that of the United States, toward the Communist regime in the Soviet Union and a failure fully to understand the true nature, extent, and the enormity of its aggressive designs have substantially contributed toward placing said Communist regime in a position where it now is a clear and present danger to world peace and the free progress of mankind compelling the United States and other free nations again to undertake a vast program of armament expenditures; and

Whereas, while we rearm with reluctance and would prefer to devote our energies to peace, we are determined to defend our freedom; and

Whereas rearmament alone coupled with an attempt to compose differences with the Communist regime by treaties and agreements leaving undisturbed said regime and its present enormous conquests of aggression will over a period of years, place a crushing burden of armaments upon the free world that eventually could well, of itself, destroy freedom; and such agreements and treaties would tend to stabilize said regime in its conquests and give a benediction to a way of life that has declared war on all human nature under its control; and

Whereas the world cannot long continue to exist half slave and half free: Now, therefore, be it

Resolved by the House of Representatives (the Senate concurring), That the Congress of the United States hereby reaffirms the historic friendship of the American people with the Russian people and the other peoples within the Soviet Union between whom there are innumerable ties of kinship and concerning whose mutual aspirations for democracy, liberty, and justice there has always been an alliance. That alliance was symbolized in 1917, when the Russian people and other peoples of the Russian Empire had freed themselves from the autocracy of the czars but before they were enslaved by the Bolsheviks, by the words of President Wilson in behalf of the American people to the peoples of Russia: "Here is a fit partner for a league of honor."

SEC. 2. The Congress of the United States, on behalf of the American people, solemnly pledges that the common struggle against communism in which this Nation, together with other free nations, is now engaged, is not directed against those who have been misled by communism through no fault of their own but against those who have misled them; that those who have unwittingly served the small clique in control of the Communist regime or in countries captive to it should not fear vengeance, provided they break off with communism; and that the American people recognize the right of the peoples of Russia and of the countries now held captive by said Communist regime to bring to justice their oppressors who are leading them into another world war that will mean the destruction of many more millions of lives and of many cities, homes, and the countryside within the Soviet Union.

SEC. 3. (a) The Congress of the United States hereby expresses the firm conviction of the American people that the peoples within the Soviet Union have the right of self-determination (including the right of any of the nations within the Soviet Union to choose its own form of government and also the right to form a free federation) based on the free expression of popular will, namely, that no nation can be deprived of territory by force and that no nation can keep territory by force, and, by free election, to be governed by their own consent.

(b) It is further expressed to be the firm conviction of the American people that the Russian people and the other peoples within the Soviet Union have the right to the basic freedoms for which they have long struggled and for which in World War II they together with other people, shed their blood, among which freedoms are—

(1) the right of peasants to their own land, to work it as they see fit, and to dispose of the fruits of their labor as they see fit;

(2) the right of workers to select freely the type and place of their employment, and to obtain equitable wages and decent working hours and conditions through the organization of their own truly independent trade-unions;

(3) the right of intellectuals to freedom of scientific and artistic creation, to freedom of cultural intercourse with the whole world, and to establishment of educational, scientific, and cultural institutions, independent of State control;

(4) the right of political prisoners of all classes to immediate liberation and aid in rehabilitation;

(5) the freedom of religion, of speech, of thought, and of the press, and freedom of each national group to use its own language;

(6) the right of the people peaceably to assemble, to be secure in their persons, houses, papers, and effects, against unreasonable searches and seizures;

(7) the right of the people to life, liberty, and private ownership of property; the right of an accused to a speedy and public trial in accordance with principles of law and justice;

(8) the freedom of movement within the country and of travel abroad and upon the high seas, together with the freedom to engage in commerce and pursuits of private enterprise and in all peaceful activities;

(9) the freedom of families from the Communist way of life and from undue state interference and control, and of parents to the education of their own children;

(10) the freedom of the Armed Forces to defend the legitimate interests of the Russian people and the other peoples within the Soviet Union, the right and obligation of the Armed Forces to protect the people from the Communist tyranny, and the freedom of the Armed Forces from being used and augmented by the Communist tyranny into an aggressive force both against its own people and against peaceful nations.

SEC. 4. To give meaning to their historic friendship for the Russian people and the other peoples within the Soviet Union, the Congress of the United States hereby expresses the strong hope of the American people for an early liberation of the Russian people and the other peoples within the Soviet Union from their 33-year-long Communist enslavement. To assist in bringing about that liberation at the earliest possible date, the President of the United States is hereby requested—

(1) to make no further agreement and no commitments to the present Soviet regime that would tend in any way to maintain, stabilize, or further extend its power over the enslaved peoples of the Soviet Union;

(2) to formulate a new and stronger foreign policy which, among other things, recognizes the essentially evil nature of the Communist regime bent on the destruction of the United States and of the free world and distinguished between said regime and the Russian people and other peoples of the Soviet Union;

(3) to explore the methods whereby our representatives in the United Nations may urge that body to assist the Russian people and other peoples within the Soviet Union to obtain liberation from their present enslavement and exchange for their present representation in the United Nations a true representation that can work for, rather than obstruct and undermine the efforts of all peoples of the world, for the first time in human history, effectively to lay down a true foundation for lasting peace and the undisturbed permanent coexistence of peoples;

(4) to explore the methods whereby the American people through their Government, and by private means with Government assistance and otherwise may offer material aid and moral support to active fighters now struggling for the liberation of the Russian people and other peoples within the Soviet Union and people in other Communist-dominated countries.

Anniversary of the North Atlantic Pact

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. MELVIN PRICE
OF ILLINOIS
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES
Wednesday, April 4, 1951

Mr. PRICE. Mr. Speaker, today is the second anniversary of the signing of the North Atlantic Pact here in Washington by the ministers of the 12 original members.

The signing of this pact was a high light in the struggle of the free nations against the forces of slavery.

It is appropriate that we should be discussing here on this floor the question of the draft and universal military training while we celebrate this important anniversary.

The United States is a key nation in the pact. Our strength or weakness may well make or break the pact. An integral part of our strength will be the provisions for a strong draft bill accompanied by a program to provide universal military training.

The free nations took heart when the North Atlantic Pact was brought into being. They saw our Nation take its place on the battle line against possible Communist aggression.

They are now celebrating this anniversary in the free capitals in Europe. During their celebration they will have their eyes on our capital. They will be watching the outcome of our debate on strengthening our Nation.

Will we turn our back on the free nations on this anniversary? Will we make this anniversary a period of rejoicing, a period in which to reflect on the meaning of the strength and solidarity of the free nations, or will we leave the celebration to the masters of the Kremlin and turn our backs on our friends and allies? The answer is ours to make by writing a strong draft and universal military training program.

Under leave to extend my remarks, I include the following statement by the President on the occasion of the second anniversary of the signing of the North Atlantic Treaty:

STATEMENT BY THE PRESIDENT ON THE SECOND ANNIVERSARY OF THE NORTH ATLANTIC TREATY

On the second birthday of the North Atlantic Treaty it is appropriate that we take stock of our progress.

The most encouraging fact which stands out today is that Europe is stronger and in a better position to defend itself than it was a year ago.

This stems from the determination of the free peoples of Europe to help themselves. Their determination as well as their strength has been increased by the assistance which we have been able to give them. Even more important, our joint efforts have acquired greater effectiveness through the establishment of General Eisenhower's unified command. For the first time in history there exists in peace an integrated international force whose object is to maintain peace through strength. Six years ago General Eisenhower led such a force to victory, but we devoutly pray that our present course of action will succeed and maintain peace without war.

The armed forces of the North Atlantic Treaty countries will grow more rapidly in the future as stepped-up training and production programs begin to bear fruit. An enormous military production program is under way in the United States, and our allies, despite limited facilities and resources, have already more than doubled their rate of military production.

Just as important as the forces which we are building together is the spirit of cooperation and joint effort which has been greatly strengthened. This is a solid achievement which will bring rewards of happiness and prosperity to our peoples long after the passing of the present emergency.

The events of the past 2 years have proved beyond question the wisdom of the course we adopted in signing the North Atlantic Treaty. Developments since the war have made it more clear than ever before that no nation can find safety behind its own frontiers—that the only security lies in collective security.

While we have reason to take pride in our accomplishments, we cannot forget that the road ahead is still long and hard. The people of the United States and the people of Europe must accept heavy burdens, with both determination and patience. I am confident that we will march forward together, with speed and vigor. Above all, I feel certain that we will not relax the great effort which is now under way.

Hon. Adolph J. Sabath

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. LOUIS B. HELLER
OF NEW YORK
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES
Wednesday, February 28, 1951

Mr. HELLER. Mr. Speaker, our distinguished colleague, the Honorable ADOLPH SABATH, has today attained the venerable age of four score and five. Few mortal men are privileged to reach this advanced age, and fewer still have attained such an incomparable record of achievement and service to our Nation as did our colleague whom we are honoring today.

His long and distinguished service in Congress, his inspiring leadership, and his courageous efforts to serve the best interests of our country and the American people have unquestionably earned for him the recognition as an elder statesman in the best and most noble tradition. He is a man of deep convictions and a great believer in human rights and humanitarian principles. Throughout his long service in this House, which extends over a period of nearly four and a half decades, he has constantly championed and supported all liberal and constructive legislation.

On this occasion, it is worth while recalling that Judge SABATH came to this country as an immigrant boy from Bohemia—present-day Czechoslovakia—and that largely by hard work and his own ability reached great heights as a national figure and an outstanding American. Today, he is almost an institution in himself, well-beloved by the people and revered by his colleagues in Congress.

It is my fervent wish, as we extend our congratulations and affection to ADOLPH SABATH on this day, that the good Lord will continue to spare him and to give him many long years so that our country may have the benefit of his wisdom and leadership.

Hon. John A. O'Donnell

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. HARRY P. O'NEILL
OF PENNSYLVANIA
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES
Wednesday, April 4, 1951

Mr. O'NEILL. Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my remarks in the RECORD, I wish to include the following:

I am pleased to have an opportunity to place into this permanent CONGRESSIONAL RECORD a simple statement of praise for my friend, neighbor, and able Commissioner, the Honorable John A. O'Donnell, just retiring as Commissioner of the Philippine War Damage Commission by reason of the termination of the Commission according to law and upon the completion of its functions.

John A. O'Donnell, formerly of Scranton, Pa., and now of Washington, D. C., has served this particular Commission with distinction, and it is my privilege to so note the same in our CONGRESSIONAL RECORD, and to add that his work has not in any manner deviated from his background of work as a young man, as that career throughout his life to this point had every indication of ability and clean success.

I am happy to note that this Commission concluded its affairs most successfully and returned to the Treasury over $1,600,000 out of its administrative funds. This respect for Federal funds and careful use of the same indicates a serious regard for his trust and speaks more than words for his ability as an administrator.

For a man in his middle forties, educated at the University of Scranton, Harvard, and Georgetown, John O'Donnell has had progressively important assignments. Labor adviser at NRA, serious responsibility at ICC in the Division of Motor Carriers, private in the Army to the rank of major in World War II. Important work with General Erskine in the reemployment agency after the war and in the function responsible for the return of our men to their work after the victory of War II. Then his assignment to the Philippine Commission.

Handling $400,000,000 for claims with but two other associates and in a far-away country, and doing the same with the complete praise of all concerned is an accomplishment. Receiving claims and making awards is difficult work, and when it is done in the aftermath of war and in a foreign country, and done with praise, seem to call for reiteration of the praise.

I am pleased to learn and note that in the presentation of the materials for appropriations before our appropriate Committee on Appropriations during the past year that the same committee was expressive in its commendations of the work of the Commission and its high regard for the purposes for which this Congress allotted taxpayers' money.

That the Commission completed its work a month earlier than its allotted terms seems to but accumulate praise for this Commission and this Commissioner.

The people from my district, the Tenth District of Pennsylvania, I am certain, join with me in wishing John A. O'Donnell Godspeed along the path of his fine career.

Much Distortion in Look Article

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. WINGATE H. LUCAS
OF TEXAS
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES
Wednesday, April 4, 1951

Mr. LUCAS. Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my remarks in the RECORD, I include the following article by Peter Molyneaux from the Dallas Morning News:

MUCH DISTORTION IN LOOK ARTICLE
(By Peter Molyneaux)

In the current issue of Look magazine, there is a deliberately slanted distortion of the truth about Mexican-Americans in Texas. It occupies eight of the magazine's large pages and is illustrated with 26 photographs, many of which obviously were specially posed. It is headed "Texas' forgotten people: A million and a half Mexican-Americans live on little more than hope." And it opens with the following paragraphs:

"Texas tub thumpers enjoy shouting about the State's bumper crop of millionaires. But there is an awkward silence where conversation veers to the subject of the million and a half Texans of Mexican descent who comprise the Mexican problem. The silence becomes eloquent when the facts of the Mexican problem are known. The truth is simply this: Nowhere else in America is a group of people so downtrodden and defenseless, and nowhere are human dignity and life held in such low regard.

"This charge carries the crushing authority of Texas' own health statistics:

"Each year, 31 out of every 100,000 Anglo-American Texans die of tuberculosis; during the same year, 209 out of every 100,000 Latins (the Texan name for Mexican-Americans) die of the disease."

This lead gives a fair idea of the whole article, of its viciously biased tone, its bogus holier-than-thou indignation, and its facts.

The first fact it cites, the crushing authority of which is supposed to support its sensational charges, simply isn't a fact at all.

It just isn't true that 209 out of every 100,000 Mexican-Americans in Texas die of tuberculosis every year.

If it were true it would mean that every year 3,135 Mexican-Americans in Texas die of tuberculosis. If there are a million and a half Mexican-Americans in the State, that's 15 units of 100,000, and 15 times 209 is 3,135.

There are not 3,135 deaths from tuberculosis among Mexican-Americans in Texas in a year.

There are not 3,135 deaths from tuberculosis in a year among all of the 7,700,000 people in Texas, Anglo-Americans, and Negroes included.

If the figures of the Look article were correct, and if we assumed that the rate of 31 in 100,000 applied to Negroes as well as Anglo-Americans, the total of deaths from tuberculosis in Texas in a year would be more than 5,000. The actual annual average is about 2,700.

If Look's figures were correct, the death rate from tuberculosis in Texas would be about 65.6 to the 100,000. The 1948 report of the United States Public Health Service shows that the real rate was 35.7 per 100,000.

This isn't something to brag about, but the actual rate is much lower than in many other States and lower than the rate in New York, where Look's editorial offices are located.

In this connection, it is pertinent to point out that Texans do not have to apologize for either the State's present death rate generally or the progress they have made in lowering it. The magazine Look is published in Des Moines, Iowa, and a comparison of the death rates of Iowa and Texas has some point here.

In 1937, for example, the death rate from all causes in Iowa was 10.4 per 1,000 population, while that of Texas was 10.6 per 1,000. There were then 12 States in the Union having lower death rates than Iowa and 16 States with lower rates than Texas.

In 1947 the death rate in Iowa was 10.2 per 1,000, but that of Texas had been reduced to 8.8 per 1,000. The number of States with lower death rates than Iowa increased from 12 in 1937 to 27 in 1948, whereas the number of States with lower death rates than Texas had declined from 16 in 1937 to only 3 in 1947.

But the point to all this is that the first fact on which the sensational charges of the Look article is based is such a groundless and outrageous exaggeration and such a deliberate distortion of the truth that it completely discredits the whole article.

The very title of the article is untrue. Far from the Mexican-Americans in Texas being a forgotten people, they are a people very much on the mind of the State's leaders, and for some time they have been the concern of the State government itself. The good-neighbor commission, created by the Texas Legislature several years ago, and of which Neville G. Penrose, Fort Worth oilman, is chairman, is making genuine progress in improving their lot and opportunities and in bringing about better relations between them and the Anglo-American population. And last year, under the forthright leadership of Gov. Allan Shivers, a council for the study of human relations was established for the express purpose of determining ways and means of improving the relationship between the English-speaking and Spanish-speaking peoples of Texas."

Chairman Penrose puts it this way: "The people of Texas, working hand in hand with our closest neighbors, south of the Rio Grande, are rapidly curing a series of conditions which none of us in this generation had a hand in creating. We inherited them. Intelligent leadership and an enlightened people are determined that posterity will live in a cordial, hospitable atmosphere as neighbors and friends."

End of a Debate

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. EDITH NOURSE ROGERS
OF MASSACHUSETTS
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES
Wednesday, April 4, 1951

Mrs. ROGERS of Massachusetts. Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my remarks in the RECORD, I include the following editorial from the Boston Herald of April 2, 1951:

END OF A DEBATE

After weeks of debate the Senate gets down to cases today on the issue of troops to Europe. Under a unanimous-consent agreement, entered into March 21, the Chamber will remain in continuous session until it has disposed of Senate Resolution 99 and all the complicated amendments and counter proposals that go with it.

This action comes none too soon. What began as the great debate has degenerated into a rather pointless family squabble. The public has become bored and our allies in Europe have become restless and confused.

It is considered a foregone conclusion that the Senate will end by giving its approval both to General Eisenhower's appointment as NATO supreme commander and to the assignment of American troops which has already been made to that command. The great question mark is whether it will insist on including some language implying the obligation of the President to consult Congress on future troop commitments.

We sincerely hope that the resolution which finally emerges will be the minimum one affirming Senate backing for the commitments already made. That will have the optimum effect abroad. And it is seriously to be doubted whether any action the Senate takes now will sway domestic thinking on the constitutional questions involved.

The vital thing at the moment is to demonstrate that, whatever our differences at home, we are united in our determination to oppose Communist aggression wherever it may threaten.

With all due respect to the advocates of a tough resolution, it has sometimes looked as if they had forgotten that fact. They have seemed to hold the cold war between Russia and the west as of less importance than the cold war between the White House and Capitol Hill.

In their embittered attacks on the President they have accused him of usurping congressional functions through an enlargement of his constitutional duties as Commander in Chief of the Armed Forces. To the outside observer, however, it has been no less apparent that they were attempting to read into their own constitutional powers of providing for the common defense and of declaring war most of the command functions of the President.

The Constitution deliberately provided for a division of the defense function between the Executive and the legislature. And the function can be effectively carried out only as a collaboration. We believe the President is exercising his proper authority in allocating troops to Europe under the Atlantic Treaty and that Congress would make a fatal error if it attempted by law to claim the function.

This is by no means to say that the President has acted intelligently in antagonizing Congress and failing to keep it informed. Indeed, one of the important goods the great debate can still achieve is to convince both Congress and the President of the need for a better working partnership on all defense matters.

But no resolution the Senate passes today can compel this cooperation. The need is to show a united front abroad—and then quietly build on it at home.

Dr. Edward A. Fitzpatrick, President of Mount Mary College, Speaks Eloquently of the Firm Basis for Human Rights

OF

HON. CHARLES J. KERSTEN

OF WISCONSIN

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Monday, April 2, 1951

Mr. KERSTEN of Wisconsin. Mr. Speaker, the political philosophy set forth in the American Declaration of Independence and our constitutional Bill of Rights that is based on that philosophy together with the whole Constitution of the United States itself should not be changed or altered by means other than those provided in the Constitution. Particularly, they should not be altered or changed in any way because of treaties or by virtue of our association with other nations in the UN or by Senate action upon the proposed UN Covenant for Human Rights.

Human rights have a divine origin and they therefore are unassailable by human agency. They have not a governmental or treaty origin. If they did have a governmental or treaty origin they would be subject to change with change in government or treaty. I wish to include in my remarks the very eloquent speech on human rights recently given by Dr. Edward A. Fitzpatrick, president of Mount Mary College of Milwaukee before the National Catholic Educational Association at Cleveland, Ohio, on March 30 last:

HUMAN RIGHTS AND EDUCATION

(By Edward A. Fitzpatrick)

I

Human rights are words to conjure with. It is a term heard everywhere. It has too often the magic of unthinking acceptance and wide circulation. It has become a shibboleth, a kind of password among some of the vocal and articulate persons in public discussion, which somehow sheds a beneficence over everything else they say. It is used to sharpen tensions as well as to point the way to better human relations. In the contemporary discussion it is chameleon in character serving the evil purposes of many who pharasaically enough invoke it in destroying human rights and at times to the accompaniment of noisy tom-toms, it becomes a kind of political incantation.

The constitution of the U. S. S. R.

To take only one example: The constitution of the United Soviet Socialist Republics promises to its people many rights, including a right to rest and leisure. It guarantees in article 125 the rights of free speech, of a free press, freedom of assembly, including the holding of mass meetings, and freedom of street processions and demonstrations, and then the remarkable provision is added:

"These civil rights are ensured by placing at the disposal of the working people and their organizations printing presses, stocks of paper, public buildings, the streets, communication facilities, and other material requisites for the exercise of these rights."

One did not know that the paradisal highway to Siberia was so broad. Nor will we fail to find similar chameleon double talk in our own country in respectable educational association. The real repository of human rights is not the constitution of the state but the daily life of the people.

II

Human rights in the Declaration of Independence

An American discussion will naturally start from the statement of the Declaration of Independence and we should never tire of repeating the memorable phrases of the Declaration:

"We declare these truths to be self evident that all men are created equal, that they are endowed by their Creator with certain unalienable rights, that among these are life, liberty, and the pursuit of happiness, that to secure these rights governments are instituted among men deriving their just powers from the consent of the governed."

Nor should we overlook the right declared immediately after this:

"Whenever any form of government becomes destructive of these ends, it is the right of the people to alter or abolish it, and to institute a new government laying its foundation on such principle and organizing its powers in such form as to them shall most likely effect their safety and happiness."

The Constitution of the United States was submitted to the people for ratification without a Bill of Rights. The argument that the document was an over-all protection was not acceptable, hence the insistence in many States for a specific statement of rights, constitute the Bill of Rights of the first 10 amendments.

The French declaration of human rights

During the French Revolution the words of our Declaration resounded and were studied. The French, too, wanted to formulate the rights of man, so in the early 1790's there were two formulations by the National Assembly and one by Robespierre that are similar on some points in our own Declaration. The 1791 National Assembly made a declaration of rights of man and citizen:

"Considering that ignorance, forgetfulness, or contempt of the rights of man are the sole causes of the public miseries and of the corruption of governments, have resolved to set forth in a solemn declaration the natural, inalienable, and sacred rights of man, in order that this declaration, being ever present to all the members of the social body, may unceasingly remind them of their rights and their duties." (Great Expressions of Human Rights, R. M. MacIver, p. 255.)

The first two declarations made as all of them were, as the document states, "in the presence and under the auspices of the Supreme Being," are:

"1. Men are born and remain free and equal in rights. Social distinctions can be based only upon public utility.

"2. The aim of every political association is the preservation of the natural and imprescriptible (note the word) rights of man. These rights are liberty, property, security, and resistance to oppression" (p. 255).

In the constitution of 1793 this is repeated. We shall add here an interesting definition of liberty:

"Liberty is the power that belongs to man to do whatever is not injurious to the rights of others; it has nature for its principle, justice for its rule, law for its defense; its moral limit is in this maxim: 'Do not do to another that which you do not wish should be done to you'" (p. 263).

The nature of human rights

As stated in our own Declaration these rights are part of the very nature of man—they are his nature, stamped as it were in his mind and heart and conscience. They are not man-made, nor conferred by governments, but from the Great Lawgiver, the Maker of the universe and all that is in it, the Creator of man, God Himself. This is the meaning of the Declaration that these human rights are endowed by the Creator. The French very properly call them sacred.

Eternal vigilance needed

The French definition of these rights as imprescriptible as well as inalienable gives special emphasis to another idea that these rights are "independent of law or custom" and cannot be "justly taken away." This is in addition to the fact that the individual cannot give up these rights. And they cannot be surrendered or lost so as to deny them to posterity. But governments which are so often made the guarantors and protectors of these natural, sacred, imprescriptible, and inalienable rights of man are often the instrument of their restriction, their denial, even their destruction. Eternal vigilance is always the price of liberty.

One of the things we ought to be on our guard against is a confusion of these broad human rights—inherent, imprescriptible, inalienable—belonging to man because of his existence, his dignity, his place in the Creation, whatever sanction confirms them; and political and civil, and even social and economic rights which grow out of the particular human conventions, social contracts, constitutions which give form to a political or economic society. The former are rights which are inviolable by absolute monarch, fuehrer, or other dictator or democratic majority. The latter are matters of agreements among men—deriving their just powers from the consent of the governed.

III

Definition of rights and duties

Unfortunately the whole discussion is a strange confusion of rights and obligations, without any clear distinction between rights and correlative obligations, nor is there any clear conception of duty or duties. A right, as Cahill says, is defined as a "moral power which a person has and which other persons are bound to respect, to do something to retain something, or exact something from another."

A duty is "a moral obligation of doing or not doing something."

Surely there should be no confusion as to rights and duties, but there is, and a good deal of the contemporary moral topsy turviness and the spiritual chaos is due to that confusion.

Education as right and duty

Education is not in the area of rights, it is in the area of duty. It is in the area of free will which man may or may not do to achieve his purpose, ultimate and mundane. It is in the area of compulsion which the state says the individual must have in the interest of the common welfare; and beyond it an area of social opportunities. There is a minimum, too, of knowledge which the church says is necessary for salvation. Education is in the area of parental obligation and decision both in the natural law, in the civil law, and in the canon law to determine what education the child shall receive and what use will be made of the social opportunities, including those of the church and state, to help the child secure an education. There is an education that is regimentation and indoctrination, but the only genuine education is self-education utilizing self-activity by means of self direction for the supreme end of life in Heaven and of life on the earth.

United States Senate should reject covenant of human rights

May I digress to say that declarations or covenants of human rights should always remain as statements of aspiration and not presented as treaties. While the proposed covenant to be considered by the United States Senate does not include all the universal declaration of rights, omitting the social and economic, it should nevertheless be rejected by the Senate even if it be, in large part, a statement of rights that are protected in the United States now. This is not the method of making laws or constitutional changes for the American people. If there is any possibility of its passage a rider such as this should be attached:

"No provision of this agreement (not a treaty) shall in any way affect or change the laws of the United States or of any State or the Constitution of the United States or of any State unless each specific proposal has followed the regular procedure for making laws or amending the Constitution of the United States or of the States. Such declaration shall have no force or effect in any court of law or equity in the United States in any suit whatever."[1]

IV

The foundation of human rights

But many people even in our own Nation do not accept the religious and metaphysical basis and sanction of human rights and we know that the belief in the natural law has fluctuated during the centuries. In the history of man's struggle for liberty, we have a common basis of agreement. Those who do not accept the religious sanction must substitute a sanction of social expediency—a not too secure basis, or it becomes as in Russia, a right conferred by the state, not proclaimed or declared by the people, and consequently as insecure and fluctuating as governments themselves—with its not infrequent usurping executive, subservient legislature, and spineless judiciary. This while the human rights may be defined in the same language their foundation may be as in one case, the rock, and in the other case, sand. Though the protection of such rights in constitutions of states as well is a little more secure than statutory provisions; they may be denied or destroyed and are not inalienable, imprescriptible, or sacred. But they will be determined for individuals in a particular social order, however, by some combination of the constitution, the laws, the police powers and equity as interpreted by judicial opinion.

Human rights and the nature of man

Closely related to these rights will be the process of making them real, the process of not merely having them, but enjoying them. Consequently education, not public education, not private education, but education of the individual, helping him to realize the source, sanction, and content of these rights is essential if these rights are to be enjoyed. In other words, the opportunity and the means for the development of the whole man—physical, intellectual, moral, and spiritual—for a fullness and abundance of life worthy of his higher potentialities, the individual there must have education. But education is not a right; it is useful, if the right kind, to enable man to save these rights and to achieve their purpose in helping man achieve his humanity.

Education as a right is discussed in the Constitution of the Union of Soviet Socialist Republics; in chapter 10 we read:

"Citizens of the U. S. S. R. have the right to education.

"This right is insured by universal, compulsory elementary education; by education, including higher education, being free of charge; by the system of state stipends for the overwhelming majority of students in the universities and colleges; by instruction in schools being conducted in the native language, and by the organization in the factories, state farms, machine and tractor stations and collective farms of free vocational, technical, and agronomic training for the working people." (Article 121, Constitution of Union of Soviet Socialist Republics, p. 103.)

Education in universal declaration of human rights

A somewhat similar statement on the relation of education and human rights is contained in the Universal Declaration of Human Rights of the United Nations. In article 26, we read:

"(1) Everyone has the right to education. Education shall be free, at least in the elementary and fundamental stages. Elementary education shall be compulsory. Technical and professional education shall be made generally available and higher education shall be equally accessible to all on the basis of merit.

"(2) Education shall be directed to the full development of the human personality and to the strengthening of respect for human rights and fundamental freedoms. It shall promote understanding, tolerance, and friendship among all nations, racial or religious groups, and shall further the activities of the United Nations for the maintenance of peace.

"(3) Parents have a prior right to choose the kind of education that shall be given to their children."

A Catholic declaration of human rights

The NCWC submitted a draft of a declaration of human rights to the Human Rights Commission of the United Nations. These included many rights. Those relating to education included among the rights of human persons the right to religious formation through education and association; the right to education suitable for the maintenance and development of man's dignity as a human person.

Under the rights of the family was the right to educate the children.

And under the domestic rights of states the right to require that its people receive an education suitable for citizenship.

The rights listed above are in no sense human rights in the basic sense, nor are they rights that can be made secure by government except the parental right stated. Besides this confusion as to the meaning of the word rights, the so-called rights themselves are too vague—unenforceable in law or binding on others because of this vagueness. The rights of parents (rather than of the family) should have been more broadly stated in view of the incompetence, unwillingness, impracticability of parents to carry on the actual education of their children, or their readiness to delegate it.

VI

Learning about human rights

Educational facilities at every level within the capacity of the student must provide opportunity to learn the truths about human rights.

The widest diffusion of the knowledge of the existence of such rights, a fuller meaning of them than the repetition of the phrases of the declaration should be a part of all education in the United States whether publicly or privately supported.

The character of the Government

A clear inference from this point is that we must teach the essential character of government rather than the numerous inert facts about it so often taught in schools. The basic truths we should teach about government will be indicated shortly. We must emphasize it as a means, not an end in itself. The social aims of the preamble to the Constitution must be emphasized. They are the direct objectives of our political life and they are phases of man's effort to achieve the conditions of the fulfillment and enrichment of man's nature and his destiny. This is the purpose of all social machinery including government, and of all social structures as well.

We do not need to go abroad to see government become a Frankenstein. We have only to look at our own country in the last quarter of a century. And if we see, or want to see, how easy it is done we should note in World War II the nonchalance with which the Congress of the United States voted extraordinary war powers to the President. This was practically an abdication of legislative power. We have not learned certain basic lessons of political life.

1. Government exists for the welfare of the governed.

A government of laws rather than a government of men.

3. A really independent judiciary (no packed supreme courts) with a high sense of their function as protectors of individual rights.

4. The greater safeguards are in decentralization rather than in centralization, with control of power kept near the point where it is exercised.

5. Greater emphasis on legislatures rather than executive branch of the Government which on the national level would make Tehrans, Yaltas, and Potsdams impossible without legislative approval.

6. Maintenance of greater independence and sharper separation of governmental powers: executive, judicial, and legislative.

7. Public administration devoted exclusively to a faithful execution of the laws.

8. That governmental power is in its nature, limited—not totalitarian—not despotic—not tyrannical.

9. The revolutionary right when government becomes destructive of its proper ends, to alter or abolish it and institute a new government, laying its new foundation on such principles and organizing its powers in such form as to them shall seem most likely to effect their safety and happiness.

10. Public officials are public servants.

This statement emphasizes the importance of the eternal vigilance needed if human rights are not only to be possessed but to be enjoyed and it points to our first relation of human rights to education. They are a continual challenge and opportunity to education.

If a right, what kind of education?

The grave problem that exists where education is declared to be a right is what education? In the United States as defined by the United States Supreme Court, basing its decision on the natural law, this education is not necessarily an education taught by public teachers, an education which stand-

[1] Inspired by the approval of the twenty-second amendment to the Constitution of the United States another amendment should be formulated embodying the substance of this statement. It should also delete in article VI of the Constitution of the United States the phrase, "and all treaties made, or which shall be made, under the authority of the United States."

ardizes the children. The high duty of defining this education is in those who nurture him and direct his destiny. The language of the Oregon decision is as follows:

"As often heretofore pointed out, rights guaranteed by the Constitution may not be abridged by legislation which has no reasonable relation to some purpose within the competency of the State. The fundamental theory of liberty upon which all governments in this union repose excludes any general power of the State to standardize its children by forcing them to accept instruction from public teachers only. The child is not the mere creature of the State; those who nurture him and direct his destiny have the right, coupled with the high duty, to recognize and prepare him for additional obligations."

The kind of education implied in human rights

Education itself is not a right. It cannot be conferred, nor can it be taken away from an individual, nor can it be claimed. All that society or government can do is to provide the opportunities for education, create what Lester Ward called an educational environment. Then the spirit listing where it will may get an education. There is in the old meaning of the word a mystery of education. Different people in the same situation react in widely different ways. For some a situation may be a matter of indifference, for others it may cataclysmically affect their whole life by giving it new direction. Regimentation and uniformity are no parts of effective education. Education for totalitarian regimes, even if some were beneficent would be an evil; only in the freedom of the human spirit can there be real education. Therefore in our schools if education recognizing the existence of human right will conform to certain conditions:

1. It will emphasize learning instead of teaching.
2. It will provide the opportunity for self-activity, self-direction, and self-control.
3. It will provide for diversity of talent, interest, and experience.
4. It will recognize a moral order of the universe of which the school is a part.
5. In Catholic schools it will recognize the giver of human rights, Creator, Father, and the providence of God. In other schools they will give expression to the faith that is in them regarding the universe.
6. It will recognize the dignity of each person without any adjective and make available all educational facilities to each person according to his capacity, his preparation, and training.

Human rights and a liberal education

In the conception of human rights of man, independent of government—inherent, inalienable, imprescriptible, and sacred, we have a basis for a liberal education which has only been rarely averted to, if at all. It is this dignity of man, maker of governments and of school systems, that a liberal education takes account of as its central object and to the fulfillment of whose purposes it is principally concerned. It is the human being achieving his humanity in the community with other human beings by self-mastery, self-direction and self-control that makes education liberal. This is anterior and superior to all his vocations and activities in which he participates in the community. Even these are judged by the degrees to which they enrich human personality by this self activity.

VII

Political and civil rights

There are certain other rights—called political and civil rights—which grow out of the nature of our society and Government, both man-made. They are reinforcements of the basic human rights and grow out of a recognition of the dignity of man. They differ in their scope and their protection in different societies and basing their just powers on the consent of the governed. In our contemporary education three issues are closely related to these political and civic rights. They relate to so-called student rights, to discrimination and to academic freedom.

The school and social responsibility

One of the most significant characteristics of education, particularly in colleges, is a new self-consciousness on the part of students, a new assertion of their rights or what they conceive to be their rights, and a desire to participate in administration, helping to decide the condition of their educational destiny.

There is increasing recognition on the part of education administrators and of teachers of the central place of students in the educational process, and a consequent new emphasis on learning in place of the old emphasis on teaching.

Students on the college level have proposed a student bill of rights. Intrinsically this is a good thing, but instead of being merely imitative of the great documents of political liberty and repeating loudly the weasel words of contemporary discussion they should study the purposes of the institution of which they are a part, and relate these rights to the purposes of the organization. Some will be intrinsic, others will be granted as experience shows the students ready for them. I have elsewhere given my conception of a student bill of rights so will not say more at this time.

Discrimination in schools

I fear a good deal of the discussion of discrimination in education was evilly inspired and was designed to promote tension rather than to alleviate it. There is no justification for discrimination against human beings on any of the grounds so prevalent in our society. The remedy must come as an educative process rather than by social mandate or legislative act. We must learn to live together by living together—as the thoughts of men are widened with the processes of the sun. We know, however, that the inevitable progress of nineteenth century social science was self-deception. A secure progress will be secured only by positive teaching based on the great doctrine of religion, the fatherhood of God, the communion of saints, and the mystical body of Christ, as living faith in the actual social community.

Academic freedom

The other problem is academic freedom. A full discussion would take us too far afield so we state the problem briefly. Academic freedom is as essential in the school as freedom of speech and press is in the general social life. It is interesting to note in the French statements on this subject that the right is stated with the limitation subject to responsibility for the abuse of this freedom.

"The free communication of ideas and opinions is one of the most precious of the rights of man; every citizen then can freely speak, write, and print, subject to responsibility for the abuse of this freedom in the cases determined by law" (p. 256).

In university research it is of the essence. In teaching it is weighted with certain responsibilities to the student, the responsibility of conforming to the standards of scholarship and to avoid merely idiosyncratic teaching taking advantage of the immaturity of the student. The ideal, particularly in the research area, was stated in the famous 1910 statement of Wisconsin which was made to encourage that continual and fearless sifting and winnowing by which alone the truth can be found.

The teacher and academic freedom

And dealing with a current problem the President of the Massachusetts Institute of Technology has put the case well regarding a fact often overlooked—the factor of competent teachers.

"The institute also wishes to make it clear that it believes that the teacher, as a teacher, must be free of doctrinaire control originating outside of his own mind. He must be free to be critical and objective in his own way, and above all he must work in the clear daylight without hidden allegiances or obligations which require him to distort his research or teaching in accord with dictates from without. If a teacher were found to be subject to improper outside control in his teaching, the institute would regard him as incompetent" (p. 4, Primer of Intellectual Freedom, Howard Mumford Jones).

And the statement regarding teaching is thus put by the Pope:

A norm of a just freedom

"This norm of a just freedom in things scientific, serves also as an inviolable norm of a just freedom in things didactic, or for rightly understood liberty in teaching; it should be observed therefore in whatever instruction is imparted to others. Its obligation is all the more binding in justice when there is question of instructing youth. For in this work the teacher, whether public or private, has no absolute right of his own, but only such as has been communicated to him by others. Besides every Christian child or youth has a strict right to instruction in harmony with the teaching of the church, the pillar and ground of truth. And whoever disturbs the pupil's faith in any way, does him grave wrong, inasmuch as he abuses the trust which children place in their teachers, and takes unfair advantage of their inexperience and of their natural craving for unrestrained liberty, at once illusory and false (readings in the Philosophy of Education, p. 427).

Conflicts of science and religion

And a word must be said about the conflict between science and religion in this connection. Following the summary fashion we are using, we quote Cardinal Newman's solution:

"(The Catholic) is sure, and nothing shall make him doubt, that if anything seems to be proved by astronomer, or geologist, or chronologist, or antiquarian, or ethnologist, in contradiction to the dogmas of faith, that point will eventually turn out, first, not to be proved, or secondly, not contradictory, or thirdly, not contradictory to anything really revealed, but to something which has been confused with revelation" (Idea of a University, pp. 466–7).

EPILOGUE

There is, in short, vital meaning for education in human rights, but it is not found in the ballyhoo for human rights lumping it with democracy, peace, justice, and every worthy abstract noun. It is more than a catch phrase but it requires thought and reflection. Its real meaning goes deep to the very nature of man and to a destiny worthy of his origin, and it has rich suggestion. It is the man with human rights, inalienable, imprescriptible, sacred, as well as rights growing out of the social order, that through self activity and self direction will be revealed to himself in education fulfilling the potential dynamism of his nature in full measure—to the measure of the fullness of the stature of Christ.

World Defense in the Pacific

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF

HON. JOHN O. PASTORE
OF RHODE ISLAND

IN THE SENATE OF THE UNITED STATES

Wednesday, April 4 (legislative day of Monday, March 26), 1951

Mr. PASTORE. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to have printed in the Appendix of the RECORD an address entitled "World Defense in the Pacific," delivered by the senior Senator from Rhode Island [Mr. GREEN] at Brown University, Providence, R. I., on March 30, 1951.

There being no objection, the address was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

WORLD DEFENSE IN THE PACIFIC

(Address by United States Senator THEODORE FRANCIS GREEN)

Fellow Brown men, most of last December I spent on a hurried trip which took me around the globe. The purpose of my trip was to take part, along with Senator HOMER FERGUSON, of Michigan, as representatives of the American Senate in the Commonwealth Parliamentary Association meeting in Canberra, Australia. The subject was one of especial present interest to all the nations represented, namely, International Relations and Defense.

In speaking to you today on the problems which American foreign policy must face in the vast and troubled areas of southeast Asia and the southwest Pacific, I refer to this trip because it made it possible for us not only to learn the views of the eight nations representing the British Commonwealth, but also to make brief stop-overs in most of the nations within that region and discuss this subject with them also.

After crossing the Pacific by air, we stopped first in New Zealand, then at several places in Australia. From Australia we flew north to Djakartac, capital of the newly founded Indonesian Republic, from there to Singapore, in British Malaya, and thence on to Bangkok, in Thailand. In the new republic of India, we visited Calcutta and New Delhi and our last stop in that area was at Karachi in the new Republic of Pakistan.

It was possible for us, in practically every instance, to talk at length with the leading officials of the governments we visited. We conferred also with the top American diplomats in the area, with members of the press, and many nationals of the various countries.

Let me make it clear that I do not regard this experience as making me an expert on the affairs of the Far East. On the other hand, I did feel able to capture the pervading sense of urgency which surrounds many of the problems in that region. To a large extent, I could see at first hand, and hear from the words of the leaders best informed, the documentation underlying the many reports which as a member of the Senate Committee on Foreign Relations I have studied over the past years.

I assure you that if you have the kind of mind which responds to the challenge of a difficult problem, you would return from a visit to those countries tremendously stimulated with a determination to act in solving the problems existing there. To the pessimist, I am certain that the difficulties appear almost insurmountable. Even to the optimist they seem very difficult, indeed, and time will be needed to devise any successful solution and much more time to carry into effect a program of action. But for us, as free people, the stakes involved are so great that we cannot afford to take the pessimist's view.

Let me paint for you, in outline at least, a picture of this region. With the exception of the predominantly white populations of New Zealand and Australia, most of the brown, black, and yellow people of the region live under conditions which are almost impossible for an American to comprehend. In terms of food supplies, the diet standards are 20 percent below the levels required to meet minimum subsistence, and much of what food there is is badly distributed. India, as a result of a serious drought and trade and political difficulties with Pakistan which have cut off the surplus produced by that Moslem state, is faced with a food shortage of great proportions. There and elsewhere throughout the region the diet standards are so low that the people lack the energy and will to work. Agricultural methods are most primitive, and tilled land produces much smaller yields than it might be made capable of turning out. Other land, which, with irrigation, could be turned to food production lies unused.

Most of the people who farm the land do so as peasants on vast estates. For them there are few incentives to produce more. They lack what might otherwise be a pride of ownership in the land, and they lack a will to produce for profit because any profit will flow into hands other than their own.

Other multitudes live out short lives as unproductive beggars, many packed in cities of indescribable squalor. Still others work for what food they get as laborers on rubber plantations, mining tin or manganese, or otherwise in the production of raw materials for export which produce what revenues these countries get for purchase of manufactured goods from the developed areas of Europe and America.

Moreover, in country after country, the peoples are divided along deep religious or racial cleavages. For example, the Chinese minorities scattered through Indochina, Thailand, Burma, and the Malay States feel the oppression of native majorities and turn toward a China now Communist for support and protection.

Then, too, the long-established practices of colonial powers have made them bitter against the white populations, who lived under democracy at home but refused to adopt it in their colonies. These have left a residual fear, distrust, and even hatred, of white men. The most moving force there is the determination to achieve independence, and the next most moving force is to attain a domestic government which will achieve economic reforms, especially land reforms.

In differing degrees these conditions exert tremendous pressures which cause unrest and instability throughout the region. It can truly be said that the non-Communist governments both colonial and native of these areas are today on trial. And it must be added that the Communists are everywhere actively at work exploiting this dissension and unrest.

This internal Communist activity manifests itself in countless ways. It plays upon the failure of local leaders to overcome starvation. It tries to shout down efforts to enlarge defense forces with cries that the governments must fear the all-powerful Mao of China. It seeks to intimidate people into joining the Communist movement now in order to avoid turning their countries into battlefields of destruction such as—to use their phrase—the American imperialists have done to Korea. Efforts by the United States and other members of the U. N. to furnish military and economic assistance to the countries are condemned as thinly disguised moves to reestablish imperialism. And when last year the Congress cut the funds for technical assistance under the point 4 program to a level below that recommended, this was heralded by the Communists as proof that the United States did not really intend to help the underdeveloped areas.

Black as much of this picture appears to be, there are some bright spots which light the way to effective, affirmative solutions for bringing these people into full partnership in the community of free nations.

But before going into the steps we can take, let me first digress for a moment to answer any of you who may be wondering why we should undertake any responsibility for what happens in far-away areas confronted with so many grave problems.

Firstly, we have a selfish and very important interest in the huge quantities of critical raw materials upon which we primarily depend upon this area to furnish. Assured of a steady and increasing supply of these materials we can maintain and expand the production we so vitally need for the critical period ahead. If these raw materials are lost to us, it will be impossible to develop other supplies or substitutes without first experiencing a serious, perhaps fatal, decline in our own productive output.

Secondly, a matter of fundamental principle is involved. It is the principle of creating a collective strength in the free world. Few people seriously contend that we Americans can best assure our own freedom by facing a hostile world alone. Almost unanimously, we are convinced that with allies beside us, and with unity among these allies, we possess substantial assurance of enduring peace in a free world.

When the democracies of Europe backed down at Munich, fear and despair sapped the morale of free people the world over. And we must not forget that lesson today. Aggression, regardless of where it occurs, affects the whole world. And the loss of a nation to communism by the internal overthrow of its government is nonetheless a loss to the entire community of free nations. Either event strengthens the Kremlin's hand and correspondingly weakens the morale and determination of the non-Communist world.

For us as freemen, there is no acceptable alternative to action, responsible action, on our part to work cooperatively with those who seek to resist the forces of despotism and tyranny. We must reject appeasement in all its forms.

In turning now to the course of action required to bring stability to the Far East, I think we should at the outset recognize the principle that we should work through the United Nations to the maximum degree possible. For one thing, the participation of many nations—large and small—will largely do away with the argument that the white democracies are cooperating for the purpose of fostering imperialism. Particularly with smaller nations in the picture, their participation in, and guidance of, the programs will make it difficult indeed for the Communists to exploit distrust of this motive.

We must also recognize that it is far simpler to chart in theory what should be done than it is to carry this out in actuality. For one thing, the present leadership in some of these countries has shown little real regard for improving the lot of the people. In some cases the anti-Communist attitude of the governments is dictated by little more than the selfish desire to retain their own despotic control over the people. Popular support and loyalty of the people in these instances is slim indeed.

Thus, any assistance going into these countries will have to be conditioned by the insistence that certain basic reforms are expected of the governments in return for the help given them. On the other hand, any attempt to tell a country what it must do arouses sensitivities and is open to the charge of meddling in purely national matters. Obviously, for any program to succeed, it will be necessary to steer a delicately balanced course between hurt feelings on the one side, and demands for improvement on the other.

With these qualifications in mind, let us examine some of the things which can be done. Take the all-important question of starvation. In the short run, we can, and must, see to it that certain countries need immediate help in meeting their famine conditions. But such help is little more than first-aid to tide them over and does not solve the problem of a food shortage. Agricultural scientists know what is needed to improve farming methods. Putting the methods to work is, however, another question. We can furnish agricultural technicians who in turn can train native farm agents to work with the people and show them and encourage them to adopt new methods. The Institute of Inter-American Affairs has enjoyed considerable success with a similar program in Latin America for more than 8 years.

Adoption of land reforms which will give the people an opportunity to own, and retain their tenure, on the land will be of unparalleled value in giving the farmers real incentive to produce. The United Nations has already done a great deal through its studies to develop workable systems of land reform, and throughout Asia this is a crying need.

Similarly, the eradication of disease, improved public health services, greatly expanded educational facilities, present problems which can be solved by assistance, coupled with more readily available long-term loans and direct money grants.

The governments of these countries must get assistance in making plans for such needed public works as highways, irrigation and power projects, schools, hospitals—and they will undoubtedly need material help in obtaining funds for the construction of these projects.

Let me make it clear, however, that I do not regard such economic-aid programs as I have suggested as hand-out programs which we are called upon to finance. All such projects must be authorized only after they are shown to be part of a planned program for the sound development of a country and a region. It would indeed be pouring money down a rat hole to finance projects which were not realistically related to need and properly designed to improve the economic, social, and political stability of the country.

There is also a great need for technical assistance to enable each country to determine which of its resources are best suited for encouraging the expansion of private industry. What I have in mind here is not the development of productive capacity through some socialistic plan which we are asked to finance. Quite the contrary. You have, I am sure, seen the advertisements in magazines and newspapers extolling the virtues of New England or Pennsylvania or Texas or California as fine places to locate new industries. While I take no position on the effectiveness of this as a method for attracting new capital for industrial expansion, I merely wish to point out that the underdeveloped countries have a similar but much more urgent problem of the same kind. The backward regions are, for the most part, rich in natural resources and poor, indeed, in industrial capacity. By surveying and planning for private industrial development, these countries can do a great deal to attract private capital.

The recent report of the Rockefeller board suggests that Congress can double the rate of private investment in the backward areas for industrial development by establishing a program of loan insurance comparable to the FHA home-loan insurance, and by modification of tax laws which will provide added incentive to invest abroad. On the other hand, we should be most careful to see that we do not give the private investors a license to exploit the countries in which they choose to invest. Any such program underwriting private investment should necessarily be limited to projects which fit in with a sound program for the development of the country involved.

By contrast with the costs of any military program, enormous results can be obtained for relatively small expenditures through foreign economic assistance programs. The Rockefeller report, for example, recommended that the United States spend half a billion dollars a year for foreign economic development over the next few years. The report pointed out that this amount, coupled with proper inducements to private investors and more liberal lending policies by the International Bank for Reconstruction and Development, could produce a total of $4,500,000,000 annually which would flow into the backward countries for economic development purposes.

Not only could such a program result in greatly strengthening the individual countries, making them more secure against the internal threat of communism by providing better living standards and hope for the people, but in addition, it would provide us with 50 percent more critically needed raw materials, and could furnish the basis for a much larger volume of world trade in the future.

In promoting political, economic, and social stability in the backward areas, we would be meeting communism at its first line of attack, which is the use of internal means to stir up disunity and strife leading to overthrow of the existing non-Communist governments.

But important as economic aid is, we must also now work toward a real build-up of military strength in order to ward off actual aggression itself. Certainly a minimum requirement here is the creation of much stronger national forces in the underdeveloped areas. At the moment, many of them are scarcely capable of maintaining civil order in their own countries. We can scarcely expect these countries to build forces sufficient to meet and repel the combined might of Soviet Russia and all the Soviet satellites too. But we can assist them in creating a combined strength which will be adequate to meet an attack upon any one of them by any such satellite.

Everywhere I went in southeast Asia last December, I heard the Korean war discussed. There were almost as many views as there were people to discuss it. While I can say there is no real unanimity as to what is the best course of action to be taken in a military sense, it is also true to say that the leaders of every country I visited made it clear that they would defend their own countries if attacked. Deep-seated national jealousies and religious differences qualified the view many of them took as to giving military assistance to a neighboring country in the event it was set upon.

However, I am firmly convinced that these national, religious, and racial differences are steadily being submerged as a result of the growing realization that the Kremlin is simply using the people of its satellites to do its work of gradual world conquest. They have all become acutely aware of the Chinese Communist government and the forces at its command. In the minds of some—perhaps it is more accurate to say many—that I talked with—the Communist Mao was little if any worse than Chiang Kai-shek. The belief is widespread that Chiang was not beaten by the Communists whose armies his own greatly outnumbered in men and equipment. The belief is, instead, that the Chinese people had simply rejected the Nationalist Government after 20 years of mismanagement and corruption, because it had failed to advance the interests of the people. Mao's more recent actions—both in his decision to enter the Korean war, and later to launch aggression against Tibet—have, I believe, changed in Asia a great many of the earlier estimates of the Chinese Communists. The fear that Communist China will not be content to keep its forces within its own borders is awakening the realization that the free nations of Asia must stand together, or fall separately.

The leaders of non-Communist Asia are watching developments under the North Atlantic Pact with greatly increased interest. I heard talk in many places of a corresponding Pacific pact. There is not yet the full willingness to smother the long-smoldering antagonisms between brown men and yellow men and white men and black men to the extent that will be necessary for the kind of close cooperation and mutual support required to make a defense effort like that General Eisenhower is now undertaking a success.

But the necessity for such a collective security system is daily becoming apparent to more of the leaders of non-Communist Asia and the oceanic nations of the southwest Pacific. The initiative for such a plan must necessarily come from them. We cannot compel them to work together; we cannot compel them to cooperate if they continue their distrust of one another. But the exigencies of the present situation are bringing them together.

While war has brought terrible destruction and hardship to the people of Korea, and this is not lost upon the other people of the Far East, the decision by the United Nations not only to denounce aggression, as the League of Nations did, but also to implement that denunciation by acts, as the League of Nations failed to do, is a long step forward in the establishment of world peace. Whatever the final outcome may be this action has given encouragement to those nations who long for peace. The fact that the United Nations has undertaken to defend the integrity of a free nation when its independence is at stake, has had a telling effect upon all of the Far East.

Every non-Communist country has the perfectly understandable desire to avoid involvement in all-out war. Yet each country of the Far East sees in Korea the sickening possibility that its time may some day come. The people of the Far East need, above all, the assurance that the governments under which they live will lead them to peace and to the kind of life in which disease, starvation, poverty, and despair will be minimized. Such assurance is now difficult to find in most of those countries.

We here in the United States have the grave responsibility to assist these people in gaining the assurance they so desperately need. Many of them are taught daily to distrust us and hate us and fear us. Many of them are too sick, too hungry, too uneducated to care what happens. But despite all this, I am convinced that in most of them there is a latent will to rally to leadership which can bring them freedom from want, freedom from fear, and freedom to live in the dignity to which man's spirit entitles him.

We Americans know in our own hearts that it is peace, not war, which we seek. But we are being lied about, our motives are being attacked, and our countrymen are dying today in Korea because a force bent upon the conquest of the world is at large. We must make no deals with that force; we must accept no appeasement of it; and we will ultimately succeed in turning it back to die of its own internal evil.

But we can do this only through resolute acceptance of the great duties ahead of us, with a willingness to sacrifice if necessary everything but principle. I have no doubt as to our success in the long pull.

Is the St. Lawrence Seaway Necessary?

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. JAMES E. VAN ZANDT

OF PENNSYLVANIA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Wednesday, April 4, 1951

Mr. VAN ZANDT. Mr. Speaker, advocates of the St. Lawrence seaway and power project are again making a desperate effort to revive it despite the fact that for over 50 years frenzied attempts have been made to sell such a discredited scheme to the American people.

Fortunately for the taxpayers of America, Congress has consistently refused to sanction construction of such an economic monstrosity, yet proponents of such a perennial legislative proposal persist in their specious arguments hoping that the American people will be lulled to sleep with their persuasive efforts, and succumb from sheer exhaustion.

It was my pleasure to accept the invitation of the Mutual Broadcasting System to make a Nation-wide broadcast on March 29, 1951, regarding the St. Lawrence project. My address follows:

IS THE ST. LAWRENCE SEAWAY NECESSARY?

Ladies and gentlemen, I am deeply grateful to the Mutual Broadcasting System for the privilege of talking to you on the subject Is the St. Lawrence Seaway Necessary?

As a matter of information, the St. Lawrence seaway and power project which has been before the American people since 1895 should be considered in two parts—first, as a seaway which contemplates the establishment of a 27-foot channel from the mouth of the St. Lawrence River to Duluth, Minn., a distance of 1,677 miles. To complete the proposed seaway it will be necessary to construct a series of channels, canals and large dams.

The second part of the St. Lawrence project involves the construction of a large hydroelectric-power dam estimated to produce for the American side 570,000 kilowatt hours of firm electric current.

The project which is commonly known as the St. Lawrence project has been before the Congress of the United States time and time again and not once have its advocates been able to justify the investment because it is as unsound today as it has been in the past.

At the moment there is pending, before both branches of Congress, legislation on the subject and it is interesting to note that there is nothing new to the age-old arguments advanced by its advocates, except that we are told now that the seaway is needed to provide a water route from Seven Islands, Quebec, for the transportation of iron ore from Labrador to Great Lakes ports. It is said that this Labrador ore is vitally needed because of the dwindling supply of ore in the Mesabi Range in Minnesota. We are told also that there is a shortage of electric power in the northeastern section of the United States and particularly in New York State and that this shortage of power is a threat to our national defense. In other words, the advocates of the St. Lawrence project have again tried to label it as necessary to our national security.

The truth of the matter is that this Nation will have won or lost its security long before this project could be completed because it is the opinion of expert engineers that it will require from 5 to 7 years to complete its construction. Meanwhile, money, materials, and manpower, urgently needed for mobilization to meet the emergency we are now confronted with, would be diverted to a scheme that will ultimately benefit Canada more than the United States where only 15 percent of our population would receive any benefits.

If you will read the congressional hearings spread over a period of years containing the arguments for and against the project you will find that Congress rejected the proposal based on the following reasons:

1. The St. Lawrence seaway's value as a transportation artery has been vastly overrated mostly because it would be closed to navigation for at least 5 months or more each year when the St. Lawrence River is ice-bound. In addition, one must consider that the proposed St. Lawrence route will include tortuous, rock-bottomed channels that will be blanketed in fog not only during the fall and spring, but frequently during the summer.

2. The proposed 27-foot channel would be too shallow for 90 percent of the vessels of our own merchant marine, in which the American people have invested $19,000,000,000. Our merchant vessels require channels with a depth of at least 30 feet. On the other hand, vessels of foreign countries, which are smaller in size and manned by cheap labor, would enjoy a field day in dumping cheaply manufactured foreign products on the American market, such as coal, ore, foreign steel and steel products. Nor can we forget that it will bring the Midwest farmer face to face with competition from the agricultural production of foreign countries.

In short, the St. Lawrence seaway will not be a one-way street for the exportation of American goods but in fact will open the way for foreign competition at the expense of the American wage earner.

3. The Nation would lose by spending huge sums of money to establish a costly form of transportation which could exist only because the already overburdened taxpayer would provide and support it. It would disrupt long-established and satisfactory methods of transportation such as trucks and busses on our highways, railroads, airlines, as well as water carriers. The St. Lawrence seaway would compete unfairly with the present-day methods of transportation since it would be Government subsidized and tax free.

For example, at the present time American railroads employ millions of American citizens and long trains carry millions of tons of freight to and from seaboard ports. Should the St. Lawrence seaway become a reality foreign steamers, manned by cheaply paid crews, will deprive the railroads of this freight traffic to such a degree that American railroads will suffer annually a loss in freight revenue of from one hundred to two hundred and fifty million dollars. For every thousand tons of freight taken from the railroads by these foreign steamers, one freight train is eliminated, and when you remove freight trains you destroy the jobs of railroaders and others.

Furthermore, the freight diverted from the American railroads to foreign ships would adversely affect all ports, especially those in New York, Boston, Buffalo, and New Orleans. The effect would also extend to public and private investments in docks, warehouses, terminals, and grain elevators with a consequent reduction in employment. Thus you have foreign seamen on these tramp steamers benefiting at the expense of American workmen. In simple language, the St. Lawrence seaway which has been labeled as a method of cheap transportation would cost the American taxpayers many more dollars than it would save them.

These are only a few of the many reasons why Congress has rejected the flimsy arguments for the proposed St. Lawrence seaway.

As already mentioned the advocates of the St. Lawrence seaway now come forth with the proposal that its construction is necessary to provide a water route from Seven Islands, Quebec for the transportation of iron ore from the Labrador-Quebec area to Great Lakes ports. The amount to be brought in annually over this proposed route is only 10,000,000 tons as compared with our annual need of over 100,000,000 tons.

Mind you, this argument is presented during this critical period in world affairs when our country is on the brink of world war III and at a time when the American taxpayer is paying for tax purposes about 35 cents out of every dollar he earns.

The need for Labrador ores is based on the argument that such ores are indispensable to our own national security because of an impending shortage of high-grade ore principally from the Mesabi Range in Minnesota.

While there have been conflicting statements regarding the remaining deposits of ore in the Mesabi Range, the fact remains that from 1917 to 1949 new ore reserves have been located. It is true that the ore shipped to date is in excess of the reserves, yet we cannot ignore this fact that huge deposits of taconite—a lower grade of ore—have been located in Minnesota and that a process is being perfected that will permit taconite concentrate to compete favorably with the high grade of ore of the Mesabi Range. This fact is confirmed by experts.

In addition to the high- and low-grade ore reserves of the Mesabi Range, there exists on the north shore of Lake Superior at a site known as Steep Rock Lake in Ontario, a source of high-grade ore that, according to the United States Bureau of Mines, may amount to no less than a billion tons. Transportation for this ore deposit is already available by utilizing existing railroad facilities from Steep Rock Lake to Port Arthur where iron-ore vessels now plying the Great Lakes can carry it to its destination.

In addition to iron-ore deposits in Minnesota and Ontario we cannot ignore the huge deposits of iron ore in Venezuela and Chile, that recently started to arrive in this country.

Just a few days ago the Bethlehem Steel Corp. announced that large iron-ore deposits have been located in western Pennsylvania and that already $34,000,000 have been allocated to develop the project. Thus, today we have five principal sources of iron ore, namely, Minnesota, Ontario, Venezuela, Chile, and western Pennsylvania, all of which have been or are being developed in the spirit of free enterprise with adequate transportation facilities available to transport the ore to the mills.

Back of the argument that the St. Lawrence seaway is necessary to transport ore from the Labrador-Quebec area is the fact that a half dozen small Midwest steel companies are promoting the Labrador-Quebec project and they see in the St. Lawrence seaway the opportunity to subsidize the cost of bringing the ore to their mills. Such a subsidy would affect favorably the price of the Labrador-Quebec ore and put it in competition with the ores from Minnesota, Ontario, Venezuela, Chile, and western Pennsylvania which is being mined in the spirit of free enterprise.

In other words, six small Midwest steel companies have invested in the Labrador-Quebec project and they are asking the American people, now burdened by high taxes, to finance the St. Lawrence seaway so that they can get cheaper transportation rates for every ton of ore they transport to their mills, an advantage they would enjoy over their competitors.

While these Midwest steel companies are feathering their own nests at the expense of the American taxpayers, very little is being said about the over-all cost of the St. Lawrence seaway project. We are being told today that the seaway project will only cost the American taxpayers a half a billion dollars—but let me leave this thought with you—should the steam shovels start digging the St. Lawrence seaway there will be American tax dollars in every bucketful of earth—for this project, plus the necessary deepening of lake harbors, together with defending and maintaining it—is expected to cost better than a billion dollars before it is completed with two-thirds of this amount to be sweated out of American taxpayers when in the same breath we are being asked to tighten our belts.

Worse still, a billion dollars is only the estimate of what the project will cost. As a rule estimates are usually way out of line, especially in projects of this nature. For example, the Bonneville Dam on the Columbia River cost nearly twice as much as estimated; the Suez Canal cost two and one-half times, and the Chicago drainage canal three and one-half times as much as the engineers estimated. The original cost of the Panama Canal at the time construction started was estimated to be $140,000,000 with the notation that in no case would it exceed $160,000,000. Yet the total cost of the Panama Canal was $375,000,000.

We are hearing a lot today about the cost of the St. Lawrence project being liquidated over a period of 50 years as the result of collecting toll charges. In the first place, the pending legislation contains only suggestions about self-liquidating tolls. It provides only for further negotiations about tolls after construction is under way. As we all know, any negotiations between the United States and Canada regarding the collection of tolls should be definitely settled before construction is begun, and not left to wrangling discussions after the project is completed.

In responsible Canadian quarters the conviction is expressed that Canada will never agree to tolls, because it would be a radical departure from traditional policy. This is further evidence that Uncle Sam and the American people would be left holding the bag.

Turning to the hydroelectric plant, which is the second part and the power phase of the St. Lawrence seaway and power project, we are told that it is necessary to erect in the International Rapids section of the St. Lawrence River, this hydroelectric project in order to overcome a general power shortage in New England and New York State.

There is no general power shortage in New England or New York State in the accepted sense. I will admit that there have been some postwar difficulties of a very local or temporary character, but new construction of more quickly built types of steam generating plants is the means of solving the problem.

If the people in the northeastern section of the United States are waiting for the construction of the St. Lawrence seaway and power project, they are going to have to wait at least from 5 to 7 years for its completion.

What is to be done in the meantime regarding the alleged power shortage if it is related in any manner to the needs of our national defense? It is obvious that the speedy construction by free enterprise of steam-generating plants in various locations, which can be erected within a period of 2 years, is the sane and sensible approach to the problem. It is not difficult to recognize that the hydroelectric phase of the St. Lawrence project is being promoted with enthusiasm by the public-power group, composed of Socialist-minded bureaucrats.

Nothing has been mentioned by the advocates of the St. Lawrence seaway concerning the mammoth task of defending it against enemy air attack. During the extensive congressional hearings held over a period of years, Maj. Gen. Follett Bradley, United States Army (retired) was asked this question: Can the project with its 40 locks more or less and its proposed dams and powerhouses be defended against enemy air attack? He answered, "Categorically no," and continued by saying an enemy with access to the polar route could and definitely would destroy the project's locks, dams, and powerhouses, and sink ships in the narrow canals in the St. Lawrence seaway.

As I mentioned in my opening remarks the advocates of the St. Lawrence seaway have again tried to label the project as necessary to our national security, despite the fact that we have won two World Wars without it, and that it will require from 5 to 7 years to complete its construction. Meanwhile, money, materials, and manpower urgently needed for the present defense effort would be diverted to a scheme that would ultimately benefit Canada more than the United States.

Finally, the St. Lawrence seaway and power project will cost the American people millions of dollars to build, millions of dollars to defend, and millions of dollars to maintain. In addition thousands of Americans would lose their jobs and the rest of us would face lifelong taxes that would reduce our already dwindling purchasing power due to high living costs.

The average American citizen, in my opinion, is tired of being fooled with subsidy schemes and with the resultant high taxes that follow them. The American people will certainly be fooled if the St. Lawrence seaway and power project should ever become a reality.

Selective Universality

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. EDITH NOURSE ROGERS
OF MASSACHUSETTS
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES
Tuesday, April 3, 1951

Mrs. ROGERS of Massachusetts. Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my remarks in the RECORD, I include the following editorial from the Boston Herald:

SELECTIVE UNIVERSALITY

If the President's new Executive order on student draft deferment is intended to carry over into the universal military service and training program currently under consideration by Congress, it should be viewed with grave misgiving by all friends of the legislation.

For the exceptions therein granted and implied would make the universal program infinitely more selective than selective service has been to date and would seem to open the way for a complete breakdown of the equality of sacrifice principle.

America's strength, as General Hershey pointed out in announcing the new deferment plan, lies not in raw manpower but in scientific and technical know how. We must therefore continue to cultivate specialists as we build up our Armed Forces. Even the strongest advocates of universal military service and training do not suggest now that the educational pipelines be allowed to dry up completely while the military training program is being put into effect.

But there are specialists and specialists. In time of emergency we cannot spare nuclear physicists, perhaps, for basic military training, but it is hard to argue that we cannot spare specialists in English literature or household arts. And the new deferment plan selects, not by specialty, but by marks and aptitude regardless of field.

The President's plan, despite its obvious constructive intent, goes far toward creating that aristocracy of education and wealth which the Defense Department has set itself to prevent in manpower procurement. Congress should continue to emphasize the universal in universal military service and training and seek for a less discriminatory way to protect our colleges and their specialist products.

"Mr. Red Cross"—A Name Justly Earned After Years of Service by Alf Carter

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. E. C. GATHINGS
OF ARKANSAS
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES
Wednesday, April 4, 1951

Mr. GATHINGS. Mr. Speaker, A. B. Carter, county court clerk of Crittenden County, Ark., is an affable, able, and courteous public official. He is a tireless worker. He is happiest when he is serving his fellow man. I know of no man who excels "Alf" Carter in accommodating the people he serves.

The Crittenden County Times carried an excellent article about the services performed by Mr. Carter to his community, county, and State. I include the full text of this editorial, which reflects the esteem and admiration of a grateful people for a job well done:

"MR. RED CROSS"—A NAME JUSTLY EARNED AFTER YEARS OF SERVICE BY ALF CARTER—COUNTY COURT CLERK HAS BEEN HOME SERVICE CHAIRMAN SO LONG HE CANNOT REMEMBER WHEN HE STARTED

In Crittenden County the names Alf Carter and Red Cross are synonomous.

Mr. Carter, who makes a living by being county court clerk, has worked with the Red Cross for so long that he can't remember when he got started or how it happened that the major burden of work for that organization fell on his shoulders.

He thinks it was several years prior to World War II.

Officially, Mr. Carter is home service chairman for the county organizaiton, but to the majority who come looking for aid of various kinds he is "Mr. Red Cross" or the "Red Cross man."

Under normal set-ups, the home service chairman acts as a sort of go-between man for servicemen and their families. In this capacity, the Crittenden chairman has successfully obtained emergency leaves and furloughs for many a Crittenden soldier, sailor, or airman.

The families of these men require a lot of attention too for sometimes the serviceman doesn't want to do his duty by those back home. It's up to the Red Cross home service chairman to see that some aid is given to deserted families or try to get the serviceman to help.

Mr. Carter tells this story about one of his clients. There was a fellow in service who suddenly came home and told his wife he had been discharged. They moved out on a farm, made a crop and then military police came for him. He wasn't discharged, but deserted. The Red Cross helped his wife and three children to get along until help was available elsewhere.

Although he isn't emergency chairman, Mr. Carter does most of the processing of requests for emergency aid. He's got his own collection of clothing in the basement of the courthouse for distribution to burned-out families and others who might need something to wear. And incidentally, he says he could use a few more donations for that supply.

Last year through his efforts, Red Cross workers came into the county and set up headquarters at West Memphis to provide aid for flood victims—the job being just too big for one man.

Despite all the free service he gives to help others, Mr. Carter gives financially to help boost the annual Red Cross funds.

And that's the reason for this story—to give credit to a man who gives unselfishly of his time to help others and impress upon you the need for you to give unselfishly of your money to help provide the money needed to make this humanitarian program possible.

Import Tax on Copper

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. JAMES T. PATTERSON
OF CONNECTICUT
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Wednesday, April 4, 1951

Mr. PATTERSON. Mr. Speaker, long-awaited action by Congress to suspend the import tax on copper now seems to be a reality.

Realism demands that we augment the domestic supply of copper with that mined in Chile. The burden of mobilizing industry cannot be carried without additional copper supplies free of this onerous tax.

I am extremely pleased to note that the news letter of the Mining Association of Montana, in its current issue, carries the text of a resolution adopted by the Utah Mining Association and a statement calling for repeal of the import tax on copper. Their patriotic recognition will aid immeasurably in the smooth passage by Congress of suspension legislation.

The news letter follows:

COPPER TARIFF

Senator SALTONSTALL, Republican, Massachusetts, on March 1 introduced into Congress Senate Joint Resolution 41, providing that the import tax of 2 cents per pound now imposed on foreign imported copper be eliminated during the period beginning January 1, 1951, and ending June 30, 1952.

The Utah Mining Association, in a resolution unanimously adopted at a meeting in Salt Lake City on March 5, urged the suspension of the present import tax on copper. Full text of the resolution is:

"Whereas the supply of copper now available in the United States from all sources is so short of essential demands that fabricators of metal, for civilian and military uses, have been seriously curtailed and restricted in their efforts to supply requirements; and

"Whereas it is clear that our requirements of copper for essential uses are increasing so rapidly that domestic production of the metal is grossly inadequate to maintain our standard of living; in fact, for the first 10 months of 1950, adding all primary domestic copper production to secondary and import copper available, we were approximately 176,000 tons short of our domestic requirements; and

"Whereas it is essential to the success of our mobilization program and to our domestic economy that an adequate supply of copper be obtained by supplementing our domestic production from accessible foreign sources; and

"Whereas unless supplies of available copper are supplemented from foreign sources, inferior substitutes which are more costly and less efficient will have to be used, thus adding to the cost of our emergency program and our cost of living, and ultimately seriously damaging our domestic industry; and

"Whereas although we generally favor protection of our domestic metal industry from foreign competition, it is obvious, and has been well demonstrated, that the import tax imposed on copper is a hindrance and an obstacle to obtaining our essential requirements of this metal and that said tax serves no useful purpose under the present circumstances whatsoever: Now, therefore, be it

"Resolved, That for our national defense and well-being, to maintain our economy and way of life and to preserve and maintain a healthy, adequate domestic copper industry from mine to consumer, the Utah Mining Association, representing the mining industry in this State, earnestly urges that the present import tax on copper be suspended forthwith and that such tax or any tax on imported copper not be imposed unless and until it is demonstrated that our domestic copper industry is injured or is in jeopardy from foreign competition: provided further, however, that if the domestic price of copper falls to a point where our domestic copper industry is injured or is in jeopardy, that the copper import tax shall automatically be reinstituted on a sliding scale basis commensurate with the maintenance of a healthy domestic copper industry."

We understand that the Nevada Mine Operators' Association and some of the local unions of the International Union of Mine, Mill & Smelter Workers have taken action similar to the action of the Utah Mining Association. During the summer of 1949 (when there was no duty on copper) the executive committee of the Mining Association of Montana adopted a resolution that "the copper tariff be not reimposed", and since the tariff was reimposed, our Association has been very active in urging that the tariff be suspended or abolished; the basis of this request being somewhat the same as outlined in the Utah resolution.

Southerners in Congress Might Save World Peace

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. CLYDE R. HOEY
OF NORTH CAROLINA
IN THE SENATE OF THE UNITED STATES

Wednesday, April 4 (legislative day of Monday, March 26), 1951

Mr. HOEY. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to have inserted in the Appendix of the RECORD a magnificent editorial by Dr. Clarence Poe, president and editor of the Progressive Farmer, in which he discusses the possibilities of southerners in Congress being able to save world peace. I especially commend the reading of this editorial to all of the Members of Congress, but more especially to the Senators and Representatives from the Southern States, since it is directed primarily to them.

There being no objection, the editorial was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

SOUTHERNERS IN CONGRESS MIGHT SAVE WORLD PEACE

To Our Southern Senators and Representatives in Congress:

DEAR FRIENDS: First of all, let me pay a deserved tribute to you gentlemen who now represent our Southern States in Washington. As a careful student of both Houses of Congress for many years I can sincerely say this:

Beginning with the distinguished and veteran Kentuckian who presides over the Senate, the distinguished Texan who presides over the House, the equally distinguished Texan who so largely directs American foreign policy, and on down through our newest Members of Congress, I believe the South has never had an abler, worthier, or more distinguished representation than in 1950–51—or one more fully commanding the respect and confidence not only of our own people but of our whole Nation.

And because this is true I know that you can have all the greater influence in shaping the destinies of America—and the world—at this critical time. It is a time, indeed, when the scales between world peace and world war are so evenly balanced that a relatively few highly placed men in a country so powerful as the United States may tip the balance either one way or the other.

In fact, it is my belief that not improbably you 28 southerners now in the United States Senate and you 128 now in our National House of Representatives have enough ability, enough power, and enough prestige to swing the future destiny of mankind to the side of peace, progress, and human brotherhood—if you but have two things: (1) The faith and vision to realize your own possibilities and responsibilities in this hour, and (2) the wisdom to band yourselves together in one continuing determination to render this service to mankind. Whether you will it or not, and however much you might wish to avoid it, you now have a "rendezvous with destiny."

Why do I thus single out you 156 Representatives of our southern people in Congress? Do not all Senators and Representatives in Congress have equally great opportunities and equally great responsibility? No; they do not—and for some very obvious reasons.

First, I have already referred to the fact that southern prestige and position in Congress—as represented by the Speakership of both Houses and the chairmanship of powerful committees—have never been higher than now. But this is not all. You southerners in Congress also have a tremendous advantage in that you are not split into two violently opposing political parties, nor even (in spite of your many proper differences of viewpoint) into two bitterly opposing factions. No other great section of America—North, East, or West—has half such solidarity or half so great an opportunity for working together like brothers in a supreme effort to save our Nation and our world in the present crisis.

Furthermore, no part of America has a greater economic stake in world peace or will suffer so seriously from world impoverishment by war as the South. For our South is still a predominantly agricultural section, and our two greatest money crops—cotton and tobacco—are incomparably the greatest export products of American farms. Every man who cultivates an acre of southern land has a stake in the peace and prosperity of Europe and Asia.

Furthermore—and this may be most important of all—our section, the South, is the only section of America—North, South,

East, and West—that knows from experience what a tragic, devastating, and long-enduring disaster any people may suffer by plunging into any war that patience and diplomacy and statesmanship might somehow have avoided. The South knows. The rest of America does not. And because the South knows, do not our southern Senators and Representatives owe a high duty not only to the South but to all America to save us from such a possible disaster? As General Marshall says, "There are no victors in modern warfare." Or as Gen. Omar Bradley says:

"The victorious power in another war will stand amidst its own ruins * * * in a shattered and impoverished world."

What can you do to save world peace? I certainly don't know all the answers. No one of us knows. But I do know this—that if you should resolve singly and as a group (1) to seek all possible truth and (2) to use all possible wisdom that you might win, then I have no doubt but that your final policy and action will be wise. Benjamin Franklin was certainly never an overly religious man. Yet in an hour of national peril and darkness he saw no safe light for the path ahead except that which comes from asking a Higher Power for a wisdom and courage greater than man can find in any other way. On a recent trip to Washington nothing encouraged me more than my accidental discovery that one morning each week during these trying times a group of Senators meets in a quiet prayer service all by themselves to seek a wisdom greater than their own.

HOW TO USE YOUR KINGLY POWERS

In the foregoing paragraphs I have not said much about the specific policies that you southerners in Congress should follow to save humanity from the disaster and devastation of war. On this page last month I discussed that question at some length. But my supreme purpose will have been achieved if I have only succeeded in helping you Senators and Representatives in Congress realize these facts:

1. Our southerners in Congress now have greater prestige, power, and responsibility for service to all America and the world than they have ever had before. It is indeed a power and a responsibility greater than most kings ever exercised in preceding centuries.

2. The South's economic conditions give it a greater stake in world peace and progress than any other section has. Southern farm people especially depend on you to safeguard our future welfare and happiness.

3. The history of the South enables us to realize, as other sections can never realize, how tragic may be the consequences of any war which patience, wisdom, statesmanship, and diplomacy might have avoided.

4. We are in a time when, in my considered opinion, no solution is possible if it does not go beyond America's own safety, self-interest, or future economic or military advantage. Whether we wish it or not, the only plain common-sense thing to do is to "try Christianity—now." I favor all the military preparedness Generals Eisenhower and Marshall ask to meet the menace of enemy governments—but all this may be worthless unless we also have a truly Christian world program to win the hearts of men and women in all lands.

5. Two things at least I believe we must do: First, we must take a patient and a not-too-arrogant, not-too-dictatorial position in the United Nations and try to work out solutions with weaker and more endangered peoples. Second, because of the far greater riches, power, and property we in America have—not by our own effort but by our gifts from the Almighty, the rich natural resources of a virgin continent—we must make a greater contribution than any other nation to a world program of reconstruction and development. We need some such program not of charity, but a program of stimulated and encouraged self-help. We need not merely to live and let live but "live and help live"—such a program as is embodied in the point 4 and International Development Advisory Board proposals. And perhaps the soundest of all such programs is that advocated by Senator BRIEN MCMAHON and his cosponsors substantially as follows:

1. That all nations reduce armaments and spend two-thirds of their most recent war budgets for a world program of reconstruction, irrigation, education, health, industrial progress, and human welfare.

2. That if other nations agree to do this, the United States would itself give ten billion a year for 5 years for this purpose.

Respectfully submitted,

CLARENCE POE,
President and Editor, The Progressive Farmer.

St. Lawrence Waterway

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. THEODORE FRANCIS GREEN
OF RHODE ISLAND
IN THE SENATE OF THE UNITED STATES
Wednesday, April 4 (legislative day of Monday, March 26), 1951

Mr. GREEN. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to have printed in the Appendix of the RECORD an article entitled "St. Lawrence Waterway Gains Support," by Richard L. Strout, published in the Christian Science Monitor on March 9, 1951.

There being no objection, the article was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

ST. LAWRENCE WATERWAY GAINS SUPPORT—AN INTIMATE MESSAGE FROM WASHINGTON

(By Richard L. Strout)

WASHINGTON.—The proposal to build the St. Lawrence waterway is being taken very seriously in Washington, and after 50 years of delay it may now be approved by Congress. The irony is that if done now it will be at a time of major shortages in steel and cement. If it had been done when first proposed it might have been of inestimable value in World Wars I and II. Also, of course, such an undertaking as this would have put many of the unemployed men to work in the thirties who finally ended up on made-work projects like raking leaves.

Nobody knows the acute shortage of present-day steel better than Charles E. Wilson, Director of Defense Mobilization. Yet he appeared before the House Committee on Public Works the other day to recommend immediate construction of the St. Lawrence project, even though it would add to the demand for steel. Secretary of Defense George Marshall appeared likewise, though he wants precious iron and steel for munitions and tanks. Both admitted that starting now would complicate the economic and raw-material problem. Both nevertheless backed the seaway, and they are joined by other men of like prominence.

What has made the difference? Primarily the fact that the supply of iron ore from the fabulous Mesabi Range is nearing depletion. We have exhausted what seemed once to be an inexhaustible supply. To replace the Mesabi Range, the prospectors have found huge new supplies of iron ore in Labrador and in Venezuela. If there is a through-water highway to the center of the United States industrial life, these new supplies of ore can be brought in cheaply. They will feed the steel mills in the Great Lakes area.

The need for such a highway is urgent, advocates say. The seaway, it is estimated, can be finished in 9 years if started now. By 1960, Mr. Wilson explained, the prospective 130,000,000 ton ingot steel industry will annually need 160,000,000 gross tons of high-grade ore. If we are really going to have an expansion like that, we can't start building the ore highway for it too quickly. Mr. Wilson has weighed the pros and cons and gives the verdict, "Go ahead."

The waterway will produce enormous amounts of electric power. This will be available all over eastern Canada, New York, and New England. The amount likely for the American side is estimated at 6,300,000,000 kilowatt-hours annually. American Presidents have vainly appealed for the waterway since the time of Woodrow Wilson. The pressure against the program has heretofore been strong, but now the switch of the big inland steel industry to support of the waterway may well swing the balance of power.

It is curious to note that in the current issue of John L. Lewis' Mine Workers' Journal there is a bitter attack on the St. Lawrence waterway. Why? So far as the detached observer can see, it is because the miners identify themselves with coal rather than hydroelectric power and with railroads using coal rather than with waterways.

Some of the other groups that have objected to the waterway are spokesmen for seaports of the east coast and representatives of power combinations that saw their position compromised by possible new competition. Of course, the Congressmen from Lakes ports favored the scheme which involves deepening present inadequate channels to 27 feet. This would make a submarine-free inland waterway available for most of the world's cargo commerce. One stock phrase is that it would bring Duluth "1,000 miles nearer to London."

The world seems just on the point of beginning to get power from a new source, uranium. It may be that 10 years from now the first big atomic power plant will be available as the St. Lawrence nexus of dams begins liberating electric current throughout eastern North America. It is comforting to feel that as one source of supply in nature tends to be exhausted others generally come in sight. But what the United States is going to do for cheap iron ore to replace the Mesabi Range unless the waterway is built is difficult to say.

The Danger Point in Taxes

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. JAMES T. PATTERSON
OF CONNECTICUT
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES
Wednesday, April 4, 1951

Mr. PATTERSON. Mr. Speaker, there has been called to my attention by Rudolph C. Larson, of Hartford, Conn., a most interesting article on the effect of taxation upon inflation.

Vivid examples of the disaster which engulfed other nations where taxes became too great in proportion to the national income are contained in this reprint from Harper's magazine.

I commend it to the attention of all Members, and with particular emphasis to those serving on the Committee on Ways and Means, who are currently considering sources of increased revenue:

THE DANGER POINT IN TAXES

(By Colin Clark)

I

How high can taxes rise without economic trouble? The question is timely. People have always grumbled about taxes, but during the past three or four decades—as a result of two hot wars and the high defense costs of the cold war, to say nothing of the gradually rising expense of Government services of many sorts—most of us have watched our taxes climb to such unprecedented heights that we must have sincerely wondered what the effective limit was; and in the United States today, with new war costs mounting and new tax increases being debated, the question presses with special urgency. Is there a discoverable point where the burden of taxes becomes insupportable—or supportable only by such dubious means as inflation?

We have learned, from the experience of many countries, what happens when taxes mount too high. Many people don't find it worth their while to work hard and efficiently. Production doesn't expand as fast as it should. There is a shortage of goods, followed by an inflationary rise in prices. The government then usually makes a countermove—attempting by price controls, wage controls, and rationing to suppress the inflation that is developing, hoping that in due course production and the real national income will grow enough to carry the burden without controls. But this, experience shows, usually takes too long; and there is then a quick escape into uncontrolled inflation—which benefits some people, but does great harm to the great majority, including especially those lower-paid wage-earners who generally keep their savings in the form of money rather than real property.

All this is familiar to us as a sequence of events that has been repeated over and over again in the experience of many countries. Yet the part that excessively high taxes play in causing inflation is still not fully appreciated. It is very widely understood that if a government incurs very heavy expenditures, and these are not covered by taxation, and the government runs at a deficit, the automatic result will be an inflationary trend. It is not so generally understood that if a government incurs very heavy expenditures, and these are covered by taxation, so that the budget is balanced, the trend—while it may be deflationary for a time—will in the long run be toward inflation if the rate of taxation is too high to be borne. The long run, in this case, is probably a period of 2 or 3 years, though this may depend on the nature of the emergency; in wartime it may be longer.

The question I am raising is, how high is too high? What is the danger point? How much of the national income can be taken in taxes before this uncomfortable sequence of events gets under way? Can we, by reviewing the experience of various nations during the past quarter century, fix the point where the danger signals begin to fly? I believe we can.

The foundations of our knowledge on this subject were laid by Lord Keynes in a flash of brilliant insight in 1922. In that year, it may be remembered, inflation was proceeding apace in France and the exchange rate of the franc was falling rapidly. French official opinion hoped to bring it back to its 1914 parity by restoring the balance of trade, and the first step toward this objective was to have been the military occupation of the Ruhr coal field. Meanwhile the French press was claiming that British and American speculation was the cause of the falling exchange rate. Keynes' insight, however, told him that the French inflation would continue. In attempting to pay a high rate of interest on a huge mass of national debt (rentes), the Finance Minister was imposing an intolerable burden of public expenditure, amounting to 34 percent of the current national income.

Keynes remarked: "The level of the franc is going to be settled in the long run, not by speculation or the balance of trade, or even the outcome of the Ruhr adventure, but by the proportion of his earned income which the French taxpayer will permit to be taken from him to pay the claims of the French rentier [bondholder]."

In other words, inflation was the only way out of the financial impasse, and the inflation continued rapidly. Prices increased much faster than government expenditure and by 1926 the latter was only a little over 20 percent of the national income. Then the inflation was checked and a measure of deflation followed. From 1927 onward prices were stabilized. But the interesting thing is that this period of economic and political stability was reached with the level of government expenditure almost exactly 25 percent of the national income. (Lord Keynes commented in 1928: "The French budget balances with the burden of the rentes on the taxpayer bearable at the present level.")

A second relevant prophecy in the period between World War I and World War II also concerned French finances. It was made in 1934 by the Swedish economist, Prof. Bertil Ohlin. He pointed out that French public expenditure by that date had again become such an excessive proportion of the national income (nearly 34 percent) that further devaluation of the franc was unavoidable. The devaluation which he predicted actually occurred in 1936 and French prices went on rising until 1938, by which time the proportion of government expenditure to national income had again been reduced almost exactly to 25 percent.

During the 1920's there were moderate deflations in Britain and Italy and a severe deflation in Norway. Each was carried to the point where it raised the proportion of taxation to national income somewhere between 23 and 25 percent, beyond which it was not carried further. This demonstrates my point in reverse, so to speak.

During the period 1934–35 I prepared a Fabian pamphlet which examined in detail all the taxes then in force in the United Kingdom, estimating by rough commonsense methods the maximum additional revenue which could be obtained from them. (In making this study, I assumed that the British economy was brought to full employment, out of the heavy unemployment then prevailing.) The interesting thing is that the conclusion reached by this method was also that the maximum feasible taxation was almost exactly 25 percent of the national income.

Although this evidence is far from conclusive it certainly suggests that the critical level of taxation beyond which inflationary forces come into play (and deflationary forces suffer a political check) is around 25 percent of the national income.

II

In 1944 I wrote for the Economic Journal an article—eventually published in December 1945—in which I put forward the figure of 25 percent as the measure of taxable capacity. Lord Keynes, who was editing the Journal, wrote me in May 1944 that "in Great Britain after the war I should guess that your figure of 25 percent as the maximum tolerable proportion of taxation may be exceedingly near to the truth," and added that he would not be at all surprised if postwar experience confirmed it.

Now what has been the actual history of the matter since the end of World War II? In the United States, taxation did not pass the critical limit until 1943, and even in the worst years of the war it rose no higher than 29 percent of the national income. Suppressed inflation (rationing and price controls) ended in 1946; whereupon open inflation continued at a moderate rate until 1948, bringing taxes down to almost exactly the 25-percent level.

In a number of countries open inflation was in full swing before the war actually ended. Belgium avoided excessive debt and other burdens on the budget and was fortunate in escaping serious damage to her productive capacity. Her price level by 1946 had risen threefold or fourfold above prewar and this rise sufficed to reduce the burden of Government expenditure to 22 percent of the national income. At this point price stabilization became possible. In France at the same time, however, Government expenditure was one-third of the national income and inflation continued rapidly. It went on to the end of 1948, when a price level 20 times prewar was reached. At that point the budget could be balanced at some 25 percent of the national income.

In Italy inflation proceeded more rapidly, to over 50 times the prewar price level in 1947, when it was suddenly checked. The budget is now balanced with public expenditure at 22 percent of national income, plus 7 percent of national income in social insurance charges (the incidence of which is uncertain).

In Japan there was a hundredfold inflation up to 1949, when prices were stabilized. Taxation is now 30 percent of the national income; but our rule is not violated, for some measure of rationing and price control has continued to be necessary. No doubt the authorities expect that in the next year or so a rapid rise in production, without any further rise in prices being necessary, will raise the national income and thereby lower the tax ratio considerably.

Countries suffering severe suppressed inflation are Britain, Norway, and perhaps the Netherlands. Sweden has moderate suppressed inflation. Australia and New Zealand have suppressed inflation now in the process of becoming open. What are the significant facts about them?

Britain started the war with a figure of 26 percent (including social insurance) of national income going to taxes. The figure rose to 42 percent in 1945. There was a slight reduction in the next 2 years and then the figure started rising again to the appalling level of 43.7 percent for 1949, well above the highest wartime ratio. Although Britain has made a great show of decontrolling a certain number of minor items, the main mass of controls is as rigid as ever, particularly over housing and most articles of food. Last year's devaluation is unlikely to make much difference because it has not been allowed to raise British wages and prices except to a minor degree. It seems inevitable that Britain's suppressed inflation, after a longer or shorter interval, will break out into open inflation, probably on a catastrophic scale. (Incidentally, Hugh Dalton who, when Chancelor of the Exchequer, had a lot to do with boosting British tax rates up to current levels, thought my proposed tax rate of 25 percent of the national income was far too high when I put it forward in the prewar Fabian pamphlet mentioned above. It seemed to him a dangerously radical proposal. After the war he set a 40-percent figure. When I criticized it, he accused me of being a dangerous reactionary.)

The Netherlands figure is now 30 percent. In Norway, which also suffers severe suppressed inflation, a ratio of some 40 percent prevails. Sweden, which has a mild form of suppressed inflation, has a ratio of just over 25 percent. Australia and New Zealand are also at about the 25-percent level and are today emerging from suppressed into open inflation.

All these facts seem to support the conclusion—which is further reinforced by the recent experience of Finland, Switzerland, and Denmark—that the safe political and economic limit of taxation is somewhere near 25 percent of the national income. In this figure all forms of taxation are included: direct and indirect, Federal, State, and local. The figure doesn't tell what proportion of your individual income can legitimately be taken in taxation; it simply indicates how large a proportion of the national income can safely be taken. If the experience of the 1940's, on top of that of the twenties and thirties, doesn't convince you that the 25-percent figure is pretty nearly correct, then I don't know what will.

Proposed Deferment of Students

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. WILLIAM E. JENNER
OF INDIANA
IN THE SENATE OF THE UNITED STATES
Wednesday, April 4 (legislative day of Monday, March 26), 1951

Mr. JENNER. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to have printed in the RECORD the analysis by Hanson W. Baldwin, in the New York Times of April 4, 1951, of the President's very dangerous plan for the Government to choose our college students, and set up an intellectual elite, while the American Armed Forces are deprived of men with first-rate intelligence.

There being no objection, the article was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

DEFERMENT IDEA FAULTY—ORDER TO KEEP BEST STUDENTS FROM DRAFT IGNORES CHARACTER AND LEADERSHIP VALUE

(By Hanson W. Baldwin)

The President's Executive order authorizing a new category of draft deferment—"deferment by brains"—is likely to be one of the subjects of debate in the House of Representatives' discussion of the military manpower bill, which that Chamber took up yesterday.

The arguments for such a deferment procedure, which, will, in effect, keep those college students with the highest marks out of military service, are strong and persuasive. Yet the procedure and the principle have some grave disadvantages that are certain to be exposed by Congress.

The deferments are dictated by the obvious need of the Nation for engineers, scientists, doctors, dentists, trained technicians, and well-educated men. The interruption and damage to the educational system of the Nation during the last war was a serious one. The United States, unlike some of the other warring powers, allowed the immediate emergency of military demands to imperil the future welfare of the Nation not only by reducing greatly the college population but by eliminating or reducing the flow of highly trained scientists and engineers into national life.

SHORTAGE OF SCIENTISTS SERIOUS

Partially as a result of mistaken draft policies in World War II, there is a serious shortage today of scientists, engineers, and technically trained personnel. Government statistics indicated that there are only about 575,000 engineers and scientists in the Nation, and less than 10 percent of these hold doctorate degrees. Yet the present shortage will become worse if our defense program expands. The new deferment procedures are intended to remedy the present shortage and prepare an adequate flow of students for future needs.

Yet, cogent as this reasoning is, an "oligarchy of brains" does not fit well into the democratic concept. The deferment procedures mean that students with the best marks (supplemented by aptitude tests) will be allowed to continue college careers, while those with marks not quite so good will go into the services.

But there are two sides to this coin. In the first place, this procedure means that, except for those few who volunteer, the "brightest" students (judged by marks and tests) will be denied to the services. In the second place, it means that marks and "book learning"—not character or leadership qualifications—are to be the principal criteria by which a student is to be assessed worthy or unworthy of further educational opportunity. Yet certainly the services need brains and certainly the home front needs leaders and men of character.

This is not to say that brains, character, and leadership are incompatible. They are not; sometimes they are all found in one man and he is what might be called the optimum man. But the difficulty with the new deferment procedure is that it is based solely, or largely, on only one of these three important criteria.

Yet the Fuchs case and other spy trials, and the revelations of the Kefauver and Fulbright committees demonstrated that men of brains, in or out of Government, can be traitors and parasites unless they are also men of character and men who will assume the grave responsibility of leadership for the national good.

Indeed, the new deferment procedures illustrate perhaps more graphically than many words what has been wrong with our educational system—it stresses the mind but not the man. There has been too little emphasis on character and leadership development. Yet these two elements of the optimum man are of fundamental importance, not alone to the military service but to the Nation. They are just as likely to be found in the bottom half of a class as in the top half. And they are just as much needed in the services as they are on the home front. Brains, alone, are not enough.

Controversy Between Organized Labor and Defense Agencies

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. ROBERT A. TAFT
OF OHIO
IN THE SENATE OF THE UNITED STATES
Wednesday, April 4 (legislative day of Monday, March 26), 1951

Mr. TAFT. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to have printed in the Appendix of the RECORD a statement published as an advertisement entitled "These Are the Issues," relating to the general subject of collective bargaining, signed by the Council of State Chambers of Commerce, by Herschel C. Adkinson, president, and printed in the Washington Star of April 3, 1951.

There being no objection, the statement was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

THESE ARE THE ISSUES

It is necessary that an attempt be made to present to the American people the issues involved in the quarrel between the representatives of organized labor and the defense agencies in Washington and what the position of business is on those matters. From the time that the labor representatives walked out of the advisory committees to the Office of Defense Mobilization, the Economic Stabilization Agency, the Office of Defense Manpower, Department of Labor, the Defense Production Administration, and left their posts as special assistants to Eric Johnston, Anna Rosenberg, and William H. Harrison, numerous statements have been issued and many speeches have been made.

It is doubtful that the public has been enlightened by this debate. Yet, on the correct determination of the issues in dispute depend not only the success of the country's defense program, but the future welfare of our economic and political system. The debate is not and should not be a private dispute, for basic policies are at stake which will affect this country for many years to come. It is because we recognize the gravity of the situation and the urgent need for understanding and cooperation among all elements of the population that we undertake to state our views concerning the few underlying questions as we see them.

THE CRUX OF THE ISSUE

There is, first, the matter of wage stabilization. On this we have a wealth of experience the world over and for almost any period of recorded history. This record shows many things. But one thing it shows is undeniable. If costs of production are raised and if income is increased in the face of a reduced and declining volume of goods and services, it is impossible to hold prices in check. This is the conditions this country and other countries faced in World War I and II, and the condition it faces now and in the next years as our industry is required to turn out an increasing volume of military products and a shrinking volume of civilian products. This is the crux of the wage issue in times like these. It is a problem that cannot be evaded or argued away. Nor can it be blamed on anybody. The blame, if any, can only be put on a public policy which calls for military mobilization on a large and increasing scale. This policy the American people are committed to.

Under these conditions, wages must assume a part of the burden of restraint, mainly because wages are by all odds the largest part of the costs of business. They run consistently at more than 60 percent of the national income and currently at more than $125,000,000,000 a year. Raising this wage bill will inevitably raise costs and income at a time when the stern necessities of an anti-inflationary policy require that they be stopped from going up. This, too, is nobody's fault. It is an accounting fact. Any reasonable person would expect that 50,000,000 wage and salary employees would take the lion's share of the country's income. This being so, it is futile to look for price stability without wage stability.

IT'S YOUR PAY

The second issue has to do with how wage stabilization, if that is what we want, is to be administered. This sounds like a technical question and has been made to seem so in much of the discussion about it. But it is far from that. It goes to the heart of labor relations. Stated as simply as possible, the question is whether the jurisdiction of a Federal board should be restricted to fixing the principles, rules, and regulations of wage stabilization or should be expanded to include, also, the settlement of labor disputes and strikes. In a communication dated March 13 to Eric Johnston, Economic Stabilization Administrator, the representatives of several business organizations agreed to granting the Board jurisdiction over disputes of a monetary or economic character, directly related to and affecting stabilization, involving all forms of remuneration to employees. There they drew the line. There, in our reasoned judgment, the line should be drawn in the interest of sound and workable labor relations in American industry.

A REACTIONARY STEP

On this question, the representatives of organized labor take an opposite position. They want a board to be granted jurisdiction over all disputes of whatever nature, including all wages, even those that don't conflict with the regulations, and such issues as seniority, discipline, union security, management functions, operating procedures and the like. To accede to this demand would be a long reactionary step in the policies and practices of collective bargaining and would set back labor relations many decades.

Everybody knows how much this country went through since the middle thirties in efforts to establish collective bargaining in this country. Today organized labor claims 15,000,000 members and continues daily to grow. Our major industries are unionized and negotiate constantly with the representatives of organized employees. Once a Federal board is granted jurisdiction over all labor disputes, the incentive to bargain and settle things locally would be progressively weakened. Washington and its policies would become the center of labor relations.

An increasing number of labor representatives would hope to get more from a busy Government board than through their own negotiations. Instead of settling disputes promptly and on the spot, they would soon acquire the habit of submitting them to Washington or to a regional board. This is not speculation; it is experience. No sure and more effective means of shirking the responsibility, which is so essential to the successful practice of collective bargaining, could be found.

LOOK AT THE RAILROADS

Long experience in the United States and in other countries demonstrates how fatal to free collective bargaining the entry of Government into labor relations becomes. We have had a succession of examples of such unfortunate consequences in what has happened on the railroads since 1840. The Railway Labor Act, once considered a model Federal labor statute, has become a dead letter. Direct negotiations between the roads and the unions are steadily declining in importance. Increasing numbers of the decisions by statutory emergency boards are disregarded. More and more disputes are brought to Washington. Strikes have increased. It has become a frequent occurrence for the Federal Government to seize the railroads in order to assure or restore the vital transportation services of the Nation.

EXISTING MACHINERY AVAILABLE

This experience is a bad precedent for the balance of American industry and labor. It is clear to us, as we think it should be to all employees, that there are grave risks in making the problems of labor relations the football of politics. As matters now stand there is ample established machinery in this country, Federal and local, to assist employers and labor in adjusting their differences. To add a new superboard will promote and not discourage trouble and will consequently harm and not serve the national interest in these difficult times.

COOPERATION BY ALL, EXPLOITATION BY NONE

Behind these particular issues lies the gravest threat of all. This is the use of an international and domestic emergency as the occasion for acquiring power over Government and over industry. The task before American business from now on is an arduous and exacting one. As the results of the performance during World War II plainly show, a task of heroic proportions was then accomplished. If industry is to discharge its responsibilities now, as it did then, it can only do so with the wholehearted cooperation of Government and labor. In our society all citizens have the right—indeed, the duty—to protect and advance their legitimate interests, but this does not mean that any group is under a mandate to turn a critical situation to its own selfish advantage, to violate the spirit of our political institutions, and to seek to take over the management and functions of business and industry.

Will Red China's Hate of United States Mean Stalemate?

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. EDWARD J. THYE
OF MINNESOTA
IN THE SENATE OF THE UNITED STATES
Wednesday, April 4 (legislative day of Monday, March 26), 1951

Mr. THYE. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to have printed in the Appendix of the RECORD an article entitled "Will Red China's Hate of United States Mean Stalemate?" written by Carrol Binder, and published in the Minneapolis Sunday Tribune of April 1, 1951. This is a very splendid, thought-provoking article, and for that reason I have asked that it appear in the RECORD.

There being no objection, the article was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

WILL RED CHINA'S HATE OF UNITED STATES MEAN STALEMATE?

(By Carroll Binder)

Does Red China's scornful rejection of Gen. Douglas MacArthur's bid for battlefield negotiations foreshadow renewed Communist attempts to drive United Nations forces out of Korea? Or may more tactful approaches bring an end to hostilities which neither the Chinese Communists nor the 14 nations with troops fighting under the UN banner have anything to gain by prolonging at this stage?

Very little light on these questions trickles through the bamboo curtain which separates the Red Chinese from the free world. There are no free journalists reporting from Red China. The few free diplomats in China have only limited access to the top Chinese leadership. Their reports are kept relatively secret.

If one takes Red Chinese propaganda literally one could hardly help feeling extremely gloomy about the future of the struggle on the Asiatic mainland.

The Red Chinese radio distorted MacArthur's unfortunately phrased remarks about UN ability to hit Red China hard into a declaration that "the United States and Britain are preparing to directly invade China."

This gave great impetus to Red Chinese propaganda efforts to persuade the soldiers and people of China that they must support the war in Korea in order to defend the Chinese homeland from "American imperialists."

For many months Communist propaganda has represented the UN effort in Korea as the first phase of a United States effort to conquer China. The war in Korea is presented to the Chinese people as a "sacred campaign to resist America, aid Korea, protect our homes, safeguard our country and world peace."

This thesis is being stressed in radio broadcasts, by public speakers, "current affairs discussion groups," posters, shop window displays, and letter-writing projects. It is reinforced by witch hunts against Chinese suspected of entertaining friendly thoughts for Americans because of religious, educational or business associations in the past.

These latter are characterized as "counter-revolutionary elements" or "those who work with imperialism against the fatherland." "Imperialism" in the Communist vocabulary applies to United States relations with China but not to Russia's.

A century of American medical, educational, and other philanthropic aid to the Chinese people is counteracted with this sort of propaganda:

"Through their economic exploitation the United States sucked the blood and sweat of the Chinese people and then hoped to buy them off with a small portion of what the United States imperialists had squeezed from their toil. They made big investments to subsidize religious, cultural, and relief bodies in China. But the United States imperialists are completely mistaken in thinking that they can really buy the hearts of the Chinese people with a few of their dirty, blood-stained dollars."

The Reds announce discoveries of "American underground organizations" as a prelude to terroristic arrests, show trials and mass executions. Shih Liang, Red China's woman minister of justice, has ordered Communist courts to refuse mercy to anyone even suspected of opposing the Peiping regime and "to let heads roll." Courts now can order a prisoner shot for "intentions," with the courts deciding what the intentions may have been.

Mayor Peng Chen, of Peiping (who also is deputy chairman of Red China's highest administrative body) has instituted a new technique for "suppressing the wolves of America and Chiang Kai-shek." He arraigned 25 persons accused of being "arch counterrevolutionary criminals" before 5,500 people's representatives on March 24.

"What are you going to do with these important special agents, bandit leaders, despots, and leaders of secret religious societies?" Mayor Peng asked his mob of judges, according to the Communist news agency.

Shoot them, the audience replied, according to the agency. Peng promised execution sentences tomorrow since all of you demand suppression. And the next day, Easter Sunday, thousands of people turned out to watch the firing squad dispose of the condemned, according to a subsequent dispatch.

Thousands are estimated to have been executed in the current purges, not all for being pro-American. Some just stood in the way of the "new China." And some, as in all such blood baths, just had the misfortune to have their intentions misconstrued by the purgers.

Such purges should not be construed as evidence that the Red regime is faced with serious threat of overthrow by would-be revolters. They are rather a means of making sure that the regime meets with no serious opposition when it calls up new contingents for the armed forces, collects heavier levies from the peasants, or confiscates what it desires from urbanites.

The purges are accompanied by systematic campaigns to speed up industrial and agricultural production to help the war effort in Korea. The rejection of MacArthur's proposal was accompanied by fresh references to Formosa, which the Reds vow to take this year. They also vowed to take it last year.

The best time for an operation against Formosa would be between April and midsummer. Vice Admiral Struble, on the eve of relinquishing command of the United States Seventh Fleet, said it is now strong enough to prevent any Chinese Communist invasion of Formosa. He also said the fleet is strong enough to blockade the long coastline of Red China.

Struble's successor, Vice Admiral Martin, added that any attempt by Chinese Nationalists on Formosa to invade the mainland of China will be blocked by the United States Navy. That is in accordance with President Truman's directive of last summer which aimed at localizing the war in Korea.

United States and United Nations policy still aims at localizing hostilities and bringing them to the earliest possible acceptable conclusion.

Unless Russia gives Red China a large amount of air support (which up to now it has shown no disposition to give) there is no possibility of Red China driving U. N. forces out of Korea, as it repeated its intention of doing on March 29. The U. N. forces are sufficiently strong to withstand whatever ground forces Red China may throw against them in a fresh attempt to preserve world peace by fighting the Americans.

United Nations forces are not strong enough, however, to defeat Red China if its leaders choose to sacrifice all prospects for rural reconstruction and industrial development in a desperate attempt to vindicate their theories about the United States.

The efforts to reach an honorable settlement mentioned here last week are based on the hope that the Red Chinese will not subject their low-grade economy and their far from war-minded nation to the hazards of a long drawn out major war. Peiping unfortunately shows no inclination to such realistic thinking.

Investigation of Crime

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
HON. EDWARD MARTIN
OF PENNSYLVANIA
IN THE SENATE OF THE UNITED STATES

Wednesday, April 4 (legislative day of Monday, March 26), 1951

Mr. MARTIN. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to have printed in the Appendix of the RECORD an editorial entitled "This Is the Place," relating to the recent investigation of crime in the United States, published in the Washington (Pa.) Reporter of Saturday, March 31, 1951.

There being no objection, the editorial was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

THIS IS THE PLACE

The story is told of Brigham Young, after he had led his Mormon followers across hundreds of miles of desert, a trip which took courage and fortitude, coming at last to a certain pass in a mountain range and, after looking out over a broad valley which contained Great Salt Lake, turning to his ragged and worn followers and saying, "This is the place."

And now, many years after, and in another era, may we not also say this is the place.

Shown the way by the Senate Crime Investigation Committee, should not we all make up our minds that this is indeed the place and the time to see to it that these sleazy, working-in-the-hours-of-darkness racketeers and gangsters be once and for all put in their places. That applies to every village and hamlet in the country, as well as to the largest cities, and should serve as notice to any politician, selling his country down the river for a few dirty dollars, that an aroused public will be riding herd on him to see that he carries out his oath of office and works for the people who elected him, rather than for the mobster who backed his candidacy.

We are entitled to good government and we, if we make up our minds to it, can get it—and what a welcome change it will be—if we recognize the danger that is in the course we are pursuing today.

We are entitled to ask our officeholders why these leeches on the body politic are allowed to exist and grow fat and insolent, while those who fall under their spell grow poor because of the money they have thrown away.

We are entitled to ask and to get the answer as to why the vast majority of us living honestly and trying to deal fairly with our fellowman and, above all, making correct returns on our income-tax statements, are hounded if we make what appears to be an error, while these overlords of the underworld are allowed to get away with millions of dollars without fear of being punished.

We are entitled to ask and get an answer to the question as to why these shady characters were not hauled up short many years ago and kept in durance vile, when we have seen how comparatively easy it has been for an investigating committee to haul them before the public gaze and show them in their true colors—colors predominantly yellow.

We are entitled to ask and certainly an answer should be forthcoming as to why men who hold responsible posts, who should be above reproach, suddenly accept bribes and close their eyes to what is going on and shut their hearts to the welfare of their fellow citizens.

We are entitled to all these things and we have the power to get them.

Today the Nation is forced along on a death march, led and guarded by a small group of men not reared in and caring nothing about the American tradition. In that direction lies final ruin, because millions of people will find themselves governed by a small but vicious and yet spineless gang and nowhere in the great tradition of this country has there been room for such a situation.

So now, today, not tomorrow or the day after, is the place and the time to correct these evils which have been weakening our moral structure and making us vulnerable from all sides.

We have been shown the way and have been brought to the pass in the mountain where we may look on the wide valley that can be made fertile by hard work. It is up to us to make the most of it and in the process to be true to ourselves.

Yes; this is the place—and the time.

Marble Plaques of Great Lawgivers of the Past and Lawmakers Who Had Had the Greatest Influence on the American Legal System, Adorning the Walls of the Hall of the House of Representatives

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. CHARLES A. WOLVERTON
OF NEW JERSEY
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Tuesday, April 3, 1951

Mr. WOLVERTON. Mr. Speaker, in the beautifully reconstructed and redecorated Hall of the House of Representatives, no feature has attracted more attention and inquiry than the marble plaques of great lawgivers and lawmakers of the past adorning its walls.

The historical background and the accomplishments of the individuals who are represented by these marble plaques constitute the basis of an extremely interesting and informative article written by Roy L. Whitman, of Washington, D. C., an Official Reporter of Debates in the House of Representatives. The article, as published in the March 1951 issue of the National Shorthand Reporter, and, by unanimous consent of the House, made a part of my remarks is entitled "Marble Plaques of Destiny." The article gives unmistakable evidence of widespread reading and study upon the part of the author, and, reflects the culture and ability that characterizes him in many activities. Mr. Whitman has performed a worth-while service in preparing this authentic and interesting account of the great lawgivers of the past and lawmakers who had had the greatest influence on the American legal system.

I am certain that there is a keen sense of indebtedness felt by the membership of the House for the splendid cultural contribution that has been made by Mr. Whitman in his article, reading as follows:

MARBLE PLAQUES OF DESTINY

(Roy L. Whitman)

"The God of nature has written His existence on all His works, and His law in the heart of man. To restore the knowledge of the one and the practice of the other has been the real or pretended aim of the prophets of every age" (Gibbon).

"All implements of civilization are spiritual in origin; when conceived they are called ideas; when materially embodied they are called implements; when instituted for general use they are called patterns; when wrought into the everyday life of all the people they marvel at them and call them the work of the gods" (Confucius).

"Our prenationalized, medieval ancestors had a larger concept of history than we. For them history did not mean the history of one's own parochial community; it means the history of Arabia, Greece, Rome. Even if they were mistaken in believing that the world began some 4,000 years before Christ, it is better to look that far back than only to the Declaration of Independence or the voyage of the Mayflower" (Toynbee).

When the Hall of the House of Representatives was redecorated this past summer instructions were given to a commission of learned and eminently qualified men to suggest great lawgivers of the past and the lawmakers who had had the greatest influence on the American legal system. From this list 23 were to be chosen as subjects of marble plaques, 1 to be placed above each gallery door, the twenty-fourth space to contain an inscription from Daniel Webster. Twenty-two of the plaques were to carry profile heads carved in bas relief; one was to be full face. The 22 were divided into 11 right profiles and 11 left profiles, the starting point being at the full-face figure in the center of the north wall, the ending point at the Webster inscription at the center of the south wall.

The subjects of the plaques were jointly chosen by a group from the University of Pennsylvania and the Columbia Historical Society of Washington, D. C. The committee list was submitted to and approved by members of the staff of the Library of Congress, final choice resting with the Architect of the Capitol and his associates. Of the 23 subjects chosen 13 appear on the University of Pennsylvania list and 16 on the Columbia Historical Society list; 8 are on both; only 2 (Papinian and Suleiman) do not appear on either.

The sculptured heads in right profile beginning with the full-face plaque of Moses, and on the north, west, and south walls are: Moses, Hammurabi, Lycurgus, Tribonian, Justinian, St. Louis (Louis X of France), Gregory, Alphonso, Edward the First, Colbert, Pothier, and Mason, then the Webster inscription.

The left profile heads beginning with Moses, and on the north, east, and south walls are: Solon, Papinian, Gaius, Maimonides, Suleiman, Innocent 3d, De Montfort, Grotius, Blackstone, Napoleon, Jefferson, and the Webster inscription.

The Webster inscription reads:

"Let us develop the resources of our land, call forth its powers, build up its institutions, promote all its great interests and see whether we also may not perform something worthy to be remembered."

Thus we see that the plaques have two bases: great lawgivers of history, and those who influenced the American legal system, omitting those who came after its establishment, with the exception of Blackstone.

America inherited from England a developed legal system. The Judicial Committee of the Privy Council in 1722 laid it down as a rule of English law:

"That if there be a new and uninhabited country found out by English subjects as the law is the birthright of every subject, so wherever they go they carry that law with them, and hence such new-found country is to be governed by the laws of England." (Law: Origin and Development, Huston.)

The first Continental Congress in its fifth and sixth resolves declared:

"That the respective colonies are entitled to the common law of England * * * and to the benefit of such of the English statutes as existed at the time of the colonization. * * *"

The American legal system is a dual system of laws with the jurisdiction of each sovereignty clearly defined, the laws of each sovereignty enacted by a bicamaral legislative assembly of representatives elected by the people, and a veto power lying in the Executive. The system includes inferior and superior courts, trial and appellate; a careful system of reports of all decided cases, all designed to elevate the dignity of man, protect his property rights, preserve the sanctity of contract, encourage personal responsibility; and, in the criminal law, to fit the punishment to the crime.

To appreciate the significance of the plaques and understand their import, let us briefly establish a few points of reference, for to weigh justly the merits of a man one must know his position in world history and something of the time and country in which he lived. This is a very large order to fill within the confines of a short article.

The time and historical elements involved cover almost 5,000 years and may be divided into certain very definite epochs: Ancient history, covering Arabia and Egypt; the epoch of the Grecian and Roman civilizations, extending over a period of a thousand years, equally divided by the birth of Christ; the Middle Ages, also called the Dark Ages, from the fall of the Roman Empire in A. D. 476 until the Renaissance in 1453; and the modern Anglo-Saxon world.

The philosophy behind the plaques is that these men are those who influenced the American legal system. As we shall see later, however, three men absolutely dominate the group: Moses, Hammurabi, and Justinian; in fact, the law student could well dispose of the group of 22 by voting that Hammurabi and Justinian represent them all, for the codes established by these two men have influenced all mankind, the former for nearly, 5,000 years and the latter for 1,500. Each of them set up a complete legal system, a body of laws and courts to administer them. But when the average man sees all these heads he is not satisfied with thinking just that they represent a system, but he wants to know the part they played in influencing the system and the times in which they lived. The average citizen thinks not of the cold structure of the system but of its content: He thinks of union on a basis of equality and how his own country survived a tragic war through this principle; he thinks of freedom of the seas and our suppression of the Barbary pirates to establish that principle firmly; he thinks of the four freedoms: of the intellect, of the press, of speech, of the person; of the right to worship God according to the dictates of his conscience; and he wonders how these principles are squared with the heads on the plaques, heads that do not speak, yet, embedded in the wall in enduring whiteness, influence American statesmen by the memories they evoke. The mere presence of these plaques is an invitation to look into the lives of the men they portray. Let us now proceed to do just this.

The onward march of civilization is thus recorded in these plaques:

Arabia, Hammurabi.

Egypt and Israel: Moses and Maimonides.

Greece: Solon, Lycurgus.

Rome: Gaius, Justinian, Tribonian, and Papinian.

Turkey: Suleiman.

Italy, Innocent III and Gregory IX.

France, St. Louis, Pothier, Colbert, and Napoleon.

Holland: Grotius.

Spain: Alfonso X.

England: de Montfort, Edward I, and Blackstone.

America: Jefferson and Mason.

Let us consider the men and their times as related to the landmarks of popular government found in the American system.

Union on a basis of equality—Rome.

"One of the most potent influences in the growth of Rome was the habit of association engendered by her peculiar location. The settlements on neighboring hills, originally separate towns and cities, were too near together to permit independence except at the cost of perpetual war and mutually destructive warfare. The only alternative, that of union on a basis of equality of rights was adopted. That at an early day broke down the political and religious exclusiveness characteristic of the Italian cantons and of all primitive communities and gave to the Romans a liberality of mind and an adaptability which was one of the chief elements of their success in dealing with other peoples. Rome thus absorbed other communities instead of destroying them." (Theodore Mommsen.)

The mighty empire of law of government and of things practical—and it still exerts its influence—was born on the seven hills where Rome rose from the banks of the Tiber: The forum, the senate, the popular assemblies of Rome. These were adequate for city government but not for empire.

The late Senator James Hamilton Lewis in his Two Great Republics, Rome and the United States says: "The invention and development of such representative assemblies has been the greatest contribution which the Anglo-Saxon race has made to the political progress of the world."

Let us pursue this matter of individual liberty and representative government a little further. Prof. Charles A. Huston, supra, says:

"In its main body the Anglo-American law is almost purely Germanic. Of any direct influence of the aboriginal Celtic stock, or of even the Roman occupation of Britain, no perceptible trace remains. Our law begins with the English, the Teutonic conquerors of England from the Britons."

It may be mentioned in passing that the Romans withdrew from Britain in A. D. 410, and in 449 the Anglo-Saxons began to take possession of the island.

It was the rude barbarians of Germany, says Guizot in his History of Civilization in Europe, who introduced into European civilization the sentiment of personal independence, the love of liberty. It was unknown among the Romans; it was unknown in the Christian church; it was unknown in nearly all the civilizations of antiquity. The liberty which we meet in ancient civilizations is political liberty; it is the liberty of the citizen. It was not about his personal liberty that man troubled himself; it was his liberty as a citizen. He formed part of an association, and to this alone he was devoted. The case was the same in the Christian church. This feeling of personal liberty and independence was unknown to the Romans and to the Christians. It has played so considerable a part and has produced such lasting and beneficial results that Guizot feels it must be regarded as one of the fundamental principles of European civilization.

Stubbs in his Constitutional History of England states:

"The influence of at least two of the political ideas or institutions of the Germans has been especially marked in our later civilization. These two are the elective monarchy based on the right exercised by the freemen of the German tribes to elect their ruler or king, and the public or popular assembly, in which the freemen met for legislative and judicial purposes."

The problem of the Middle Ages was to settle whether all former civilization should be overturned by the German or the German people should be Romanized and Christianized. Modern civilization is the result of the interplay of these forces.

By the eighth century all remains of Roman civilization had disappeared, even its very language.

Freedom of the Mind, and Democracy—Athens.

The antithesis of union occurred in ancient Greece. There we see Athens, the seat and mother city of one of the world's greatest cultures, defeated, humiliated, and practically destroyed by her neighbor to the south, Sparta. There we find also the most enlightened of the early democracies destroyed by the ruthless uncultured people of the most absolute police state that ever existed, Sparta. Athens, fertile field of mental developments; Sparta, peopled by poor, rude, rough inhabitants, where men sought the camp on the battlefield to escape the horrors of peace, so severe was the regimented life of the people (Professor Oman of Oxford)—whence comes the phrase, Spartan severity, Spartan discipline.

But it was in the Greek commonwealth that the political and intellectual life of the world began.

When we think of Greece we think of Athens.

The empire of Greece was that of the intellect, of art, philosophy, of literature, love of the beautiful, and love of freedom.

Solon of Athens (600 B. C.)

Lycurgus of Sparta (900 B. C.)

Solon, the law giver, who wrought so great a reform in the constitution of Athens, so improved the lot of the poor, so balanced the power of the various classes of Athenian society, so regulated her coinage, that he saved the state from collapse and civil war, rebuilt her commerce. Solon, whose new constitution for Athens was so successful that when the first code of laws was drawn up for Rome, the famous Twelve Tables, a commission was sent from Rome to study them and a number of the provisions of Solon's laws were incorporated in the Twelve Tables.

Lycurgus! So modern an historian as Toynbee states the consensus of latter-day research to be that Lycurgus was a god and not a human being, a purely mythical character. So ancient an historian as Herodotus states that there is so much doubt about Lycurgus that the place of his birth is unknown, and the date of his birth cannot be fixed within 300 years. Even the thumbnail biography assigned to him by the Architect of the Capitol reads only: "Legendary lawgiver of Sparta." Some historians ascribe to him the constitution of Sparta under which the people, the comitia, had a voice in government. But what kind of voice? When the king wanted approval of a proposal the comitia would be assembled and allowed to vote yes or no; a judge was hidden whose duty it was to weigh the volume of the vote.

Athens rose phoenix-like from the ashes of her defeat by Sparta to establish the wonderful Hellenic culture, and Sparta takes an inferior position in history. Democracy triumphed over the police state. Why not let Solon represent Greece and replace Lycurgus with another law giver or a good American?

EARLY CODIFIED LAW, THE CODES OF ANTIQUITY

When we think of the legal system and the courts we think of that inscription over the entrance to the Supreme Court: "Equal Justice Under Law"; and we think of the United States Code, of codified law. Throughout the ages the cry of the common people has been "Make known unto us the laws by which we are judged, engrave them where all may see."

For the two famous codes of antiquity we go to Arabia and Egypt, referred by the plaques to the Code of Hammurabi and the Decalog of Moses. Though Moses occupies the central position with his majestic face in full relief let us keep the chronology in proper sequence, for the Code of Hammurabi precedes the Decalog by a thousand years.

Who was Hammurabi? (Circa 2800 B. C.) What was his code? He was the man who rebuilt Babylon from the ruin of the empire of Sargon, rebuilt Babylon to rule as the undisputed queen city of the world for 2,000 years, the man who—whether he responded to the plea of the multitude or from his own innate ability as a great administrator—had engraved in imperishable stone in cuneiform characters the laws of the Sumerians and Akkadians, a thousand years before the Code of Moses, the laws governing his people. Three thousand lines of these laws of Hammurabi have been recovered and of this quantity more than the half have been deciphered. They deal with divorce and alimony; with master and servant; with profit on sales transactions, establishing twice the value as the proper asking price in beginning a transaction; establishing public right in irrigation ditches and canals as paramount to those of the owner whose lands they traversed; they dealt with crime and punishment and incorporated the principle that education, wealth, and knowledge carried with them greater responsibility of obedience to the law.

One of the most important items of the code was that of personal responsibility. The builder of a home was responsible for its soundness.

It placed emphasis on reducing contracts and agreements to writing and having them signed and witnessed.

Rightly then is Hammurabi placed side by side with Moses.

Further back than this in history the plaques do not go, although the cuneiform inscriptions of that Eden where meet the four rivers of Paradise affirm that the history of the land extends 432,000 years before the Flood.

Moses: (Circa 1800? 1400? B. C.) Great hero of Israel, first of the great prophets, whose name implies "He who was saved from the water" frequently likened to and coupled with Solon and Lycurgus. What does he appear to be in the outward events of history? What did he become in the beliefs of his people? He stands at the very beginning of the united life of Israel and established its fundamental principles. His distinctive characteristic, surmounting all intellectual qualities, was his realization that only through obedience to spiritual and moral laws could the new people accomplish a national task and achieve a world destiny (Funk & Wagnalls Bible Dictionary). He is credited with the creation of the religion of Israel.

No other people of the ancient world ever exerted upon our civilization influences comparable to that of the Hebrews through a literature containing the highest idealism the world has ever known.

We come next to the Roman law and the Roman codes, but we must remember that the legal system of the empire (not the Holy Roman Empire of Frederick Barbarosa) did not include representative government.

From the time of Diocletian onward the making of law was exclusively in the hands of the emperors. The Senate still existed, but shorn of all its old functions, alike of government and legislation.

The first three centuries of the Roman Empire contain the perfection of Roman jurisprudence and the commencement of its decline.

Before taking up the codifiers let us pay our respects to Papinian.

It is said that under Papinian (211 A. D.) Roman law reached the highest point in its development. Papinian was a noted lawyer who carried on the government of Rome while the Emperor Severus waged his wars.

But now to consider the Roman codes.

Gaius (130–180 A. D.) stands as the pioneer in this field. His Institutes were received as text books of the law before the general revision of the Roman law.

Justinian (483–565 A. D.): There were others who made codes of Roman law besides Gaius, Tribonian and Justinian—there were, for instance, the Gregorian, Homogenian, and Theodosian codes—but they are all made obsolete by the code which bears Justinian's name.

In his Code, Pandects, and Institutes, we find condensed the legal wisdom of the Romans.

The able and learned Tribonian headed the commission which carried out this work. All obsolete, erroneous, or superfluous laws were eliminated from existing codes; they preserved only the wise and salutary laws. In the Pandects they set out the true spirit of the decisions of the judges. The Institutes contain the essential elements of Roman law.

"The code was signed by Justinian, and the Code, the Pandects, and the Institutes were declared by him to be the only legitimate system of legal jurisprudence. This the last will and testament of Roman jurisprudence was preserved through the Dark Ages and forms the basis of the systems of jurisprudence in most of the continental European states of today. It is one of the most important contributions of Rome to modern civilization." (Guizot, History of Civilization in Europe.)

The code is the facet of Justinian's reign that touches our legal system, but his plaque brings the memory, as Freeman tells us, that "during his reign calamities which human prudence is unable to resist seemed to combine against the Romans as if to compel them to expiate their ancient glory, so that the period which gave birth to so many moments of greatness may be looked back upon with horror as that of the widest dissolution and mortality."

Hodgkins in his Italy and Her Invaders tells us that Justinian projected an expedition against the Goths, but in retaliation Rome was so despoiled by Totila the Goth that the city remained an unpeopled solitude for 40 days.

Law in the Middle Ages: Innocent III and Gregory IX

Separation of temporal from spiritual power in the Christian church occurred in the sixth century, when the church not being able to restore the absolute power of the Roman Empire, in self-defense against the barbarians adopted the principle. "The spiritual order is completely separated from the physical, you have no right to interfere with it" (Guizot, History of Civilization in Europe).

By the eighth century, as we have noted, all remains of Roman civilization had disappeared, even its very language.

"Belief was in the Middle Ages not a matter of choice or of conviction, but of duty. The individual had no rights in the matter, but must submit himself without question to the dictates of the church" (Emerton, Medieval Europe).

The church of the Middle Ages was the only organized force of its period. It was the repository of the knowledge and learning of the time. In the spiritual field the church led the individual from the cradle to the grave, and the spiritual realm had none of its modern limitations. It fulfilled many functions now partly or wholly secular. The church in those centuries buttressed its faith with the most complete and adequate philosophical system the world has ever known. Also it achieved a social system in which the efforts of the individual were subjected to the greater good of the whole.

Innocent III (1198–1226) and Gregory IX (1227–41) were contemporaries of Edward I and de Montfort of England—the fathers of the parliamentary system; of St. Louis (Louis X of France), and Frederick II of Germany, both men of great strength of will and both ardent supporters of the independence of the crown from the church; of Alphonso X; of Maimonides—the great Jewish philosopher who exercised a world-wide influence on Jewry through his beautiful writings and teachings; of John of England, against whom Innocent won a signal victory.

It was a turbulent epoch when the little man did not know individual liberty as we know it, when he had no representative body to make his laws, when he found himself caught in a swirling cauldron that stopped boiling only with the dawn of Renaissance two centuries later.

These two great popes lived in rugged days. Gregory was past 80 when elevated to the papacy and lived to be almost a hundred. It was an age of constant struggle for supremacy between temporal and spiritual power, between emperors and kings and popes. Kings challenged popes and popes hurled the thunderbolts of excommunication and anathema at will; an age when a king walked barefoot in the snow to the Pope's palace to seek removal of the ban of excommunication (motivated, however, by political necessity); an age of secret intrigues and of promises broken as expediency demanded; an age when Gregory IX called Frederick II "this pestilential king * * * that beast of Revelations which came out of the sea"; and the king addressed the Pope in equally vitriolic and sulfurous language.

But both of these popes were men of great intelligence, of fearless courage, devoted to their principles, acknowledged authorities in the field of canon and ecclesiastical law, which in that epoch of the Middle Ages was the great body of law.

The Encyclopedia Britannica has this to say of them:

"Innocent III was an eminent jurist and canonist and never ceased using his great power in the service of the law. A great part of his life was passed in hearing pleadings and pronouncing judgments. Few sovereigns have ever worked so industriously or shown such solicitude for the impartial exercise of their judicial functions.

"Gregory was famed for his learning and eloquence, his blameless life and strength of character."

Freedom of the Seas: Hugo Grotius.

Hugo Grotius (1583–1645) brought order out of chaos in Dutch law, established the doctrine of freedom of the seas. He was the first to attempt to establish a principle of right and a basis for society and government outside of church or Bible, to draw a distinction between religion on the one hand and law and morality on the other.

Parliamentary government is traced to Simon de Montfort, of England (1200–65), and Edward I (1239–1307). The former was one of the godfathers of the latter, and both were contemporaneous figures in the struggle to limit the powers and prerogatives of the sovereign, the one instigating, the other yielding.

De Montfort (1200–1265) established parliamentary control over the executive. To this parliament must be traced the germ of the modern governing system, although the constitution he promulgated was premature and failed.

It was Edward the First who convoked the Model Parliament in 1295 to meet a crisis in the kingdom. His writ of summons to the three estates contained this memorable sentence: "What touches all should be approved by all. * * * Common dangers should be met by measures agreed upon in common." The parliamentary constitution of England was established as the result of Edward's action. Edward is called the Justinian of the English.

The following are good men, 'tis true, but to me, a layman, their influence on the American legal system seems remote and collateral at best: St. Louis, Alphonso, Suleiman, Maimonides.

St. Louis stands in history as the ideal king of the Middle Ages. An accomplished knight, physically strong, fearless in battle, heroic in adversity, of imperious temperament, unyielding when sure of the justness of his cause, energetic and firm, he was every inch a king.

He built hospitals between the two crusades he led. He visited and tended the sick and himself gave charity to many people daily.

He was strenuous and vigorous in upholding the independence of the king in temporal affairs and in the right to supervise ecclesiastical matters in France.

Alphonso X of Spain (1252–84) known as Alphonso, El Sabio (the Wise). The short architect's sketch assigns as reason for his inclusion the authorship of two codes, the Fuero Real and the Siete Partidas.

The Encyclopedia Britannica states that the Fuero Real was formed by combining the best parts of existing charters and was accepted only by towns and districts not already chartered. The three parts of Spain, Castile, Leon, and Aragon were not united and did not have a common court until long after Alphonso's death.

This authority states:

"The famous Siete Partidas (the seven divisions), drawn up about 1260, is often spoken of as a code of laws. It was never so treated till it was promulgated at the Cortes of Alcala in 1338 in the reign of his great grandson Alphonso XI. Even then it was provided that it was not to prevail against any fuero or the Fuero Real."

To further his personal ambitions he debased the coinage and then endeavored to prevent a rise in prices by the application of an arbitrary tariff. The trade of his dominions was ruined. He died leaving his country a legacy of civil war.

Suleiman the Magnificent of Turkey (1494-1566). In his own country distinguished as The Law Giver, but known in European history as The Magnificent. His claim to renown as a legislator rests mainly on his organization of the clerical class, his reform and improvement of the administration of the country, both civil and military, and his inauguration of a new and improved system of feudal tenure. His amelioration of the lot of his Christian subjects is not his least title to fame.

Maimonides (Moses Ben Maimon) (1135–1204). Jewish philosopher, born in Cordova, Spain, driven from Spain by the Inquisition, and likewise from Fez, Morocco; finally established himself in Egypt where by his eminent writings and dominant personality he exercised almost worldwide influence over Jewry. He was a great exponent of reason in faith, and toleration of theology.

The exception, Blackstone:

Blackstone (1723–80), jurist and annotator of English law. His lasting fame is founded on his commentaries of the laws of England. He did for English law what Gaius and Tribonian did for Roman law. Blackstone distilled out the technical treaties, clear and readable expositions of the doctrine of English law. For a century his Commentaries were the foundation of all legal education in this country.

The only Americans included: Jefferson and Mason.

Jefferson, Thomas (1743–1826): Third President of the United States. American statesman, great democratic champion of the rights of the common people; had a large part in drafting the Declaration of Independence. His career of public service lasted 40 years. He was the moving spirit behind the abolition in Virginia of the laws of entail and primogeniture; he secured the separation of church and state in Virginia, established religious freedom. He was largely responsible for a revision of the code that modified a great many of the severe penalties for minor offenses. From an early age he was against the principle that aristocracy only should be privileged and saw that the success of America would depend on the education that the average man possessed.

Mason, George (1725–92): American statesman, author of the Declaration of Rights and the Constitution of Virginia; member of the Constitutional Convention of the United States.

Pothier, Robert Joseph (1699–1772) of France, was an authority on Roman law and wrote a famous digest of the Pandects of Justinian. He also wrote many articles on French law. When the Code Civil of France was ordered drafted by the Convention, much of Pothier's work was embodied textually in the code.

And lastly, what of Napoleon, a Frenchman of a later day (1769–1821)?

The Architect says: "In choosing the subjects, they (the committee) limited the choice to makers of law, rather than judges or writers on the law, and to those who influenced the American legal system—omitting those who came after its establishment."

When the American Constitution was ratified in 1788, Napoleon was but a junior lieutenant in Corsica. When the Code Civil of 1804 was again promulgated as the Code Napoleon in 1807, our legal system had been established for 20 years.

The Code of course is inseparably linked with Napoleon's name and is why his profile is included. He had actually very little to do with the preparation of the Code. Other incidents flood the mind that overshadow a code coming so long after our own legal system was established.

Modern European history begins not with Napoleon but 14 years after the Little Corporal began his career during which he so badly scrambled European affairs that the Congress of Vienna of 1815 had to be called, as Toynbee says: "To piece together the broken fragments of the mosaic of city states which strewed the face of Europe." We cannot forget that he overthrew the First Republic of France, established himself emperor and sought to name his successor—the antithesis of democracy.

While Mignet says of Napoleon:

"Of his government it is said that the country annexed to France or even merely brought under the influence of France found its gain in being better governed."

Larned says of him:

"As a heartless warrior, which was the level of his character and genius, Napoleon was unrivaled. * * * A prodigy such as Napoleon is rarely permitted to be born for the affliction of mankind."

Why not replace the Corsican with a good American of the colonial period who helped frame our legal system at Philadelphia?

"Because my people hath forgotten me, they have burned incense to vanity." (Jeremiah 18:15.)

Address by President Truman at Church Cornerstone Ceremony

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. JOHN W. McCORMACK

OF MASSACHUSETTS

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Wednesday, April 4, 1951

Mr. McCORMACK. Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my remarks in the RECORD, I include the following article from the New York Times of April 4, 1951:

TEXT OF PRESIDENT TRUMAN'S ADDRESS TODAY AT THE LAYING OF THE CORNERSTONE OF THE NEW YORK AVENUE PRESBYTERIAN CHURCH IN THIS CITY

It is a great privilege for me to be able to take part in this service. The New York Avenue Presbyterian Church has played an important part in the history of Washington. For almost 150 years a Presbyterian congregation has worshiped on or near this spot. During all that period this church has preached the Christian message to this busy Capital City.

This new building demonstrates that you are still going forward in the same spirit which moved those early worshipers who first came to the swamps and woodland of this National Capital a century and a half ago. May you long continue in that same missionary spirit.

The essential mission of the church is to teach the moral law. We look to our churches, above all other agencies, to teach us the highest moral standards of right and wrong. We rely on the churches particularly to instill into our young people those moral ideals which are the basis of our free institutions.

Religion is not an easy thing. It is not simply a comfort to those in trouble or a means of escaping from present difficulties, as some people today would have us believe.

Moreover, religion is not a negative thing. It is not merely a series of prohibitions against certain actions because they are wicked.

RELIGION HAS A BROAD VISTA

Our religion includes these elements. But it also includes much more. It is a positive force that impels us to affirmative action. We are under divine orders, not only to refrain from doing evil, but also to do good and to make this world a better place to live in.

Everyone of us should measure the actions of his daily life against this moral code which our religion gives to us. Everyone of us, according to the strength and wisdom God gives to him, should try his best every day to live up to these religious teachings.

More than this, religion should establish moral standards for the conduct of our whole Nation, at home and abroad. We should judge our achievements, as a nation, in the scales of right and wrong.

The democracy we cherish, and our free institutions, depend upon the observance of the moral code, in private and in public life. Selfishness and greed can tear this Nation apart, just as they have torn apart other great nations in the past. Our only defense against them is to follow those moral principles which have been handed down to us by our forefathers and which are enshrined today in churches such as this one.

We talk a lot these days about freedom, freedom for the individual and freedom among nations. Freedom for the human soul is, indeed, the most important principle of our civilization. We must always remember, however, that the freedom we are talking about is freedom based upon moral principles. Without a firm moral foundation, freedom degenerates quickly into selfishness and license.

FREEDOM SETS OBLIGATIONS

Unless men exercise their freedom in a just and honest way, within moral restraints, a free society can degenerate into anarchy. Then there will be freedom only for the rapacious and those, who are stronger and more unscrupulous than the rank and file of the people.

If we neglect these truths, our whole society suffers.

This is readily apparent in the case of some of the evils that continually confront us. For example, when organized crime and vice run loose and are accepted and patronized by the people, they threaten our free institutions and debase our national life. These evils are clearly moral issues and our religious beliefs command us to fight against them.

It is not so readily apparent that moral issues are involved in some of the other evils we have been fighting against in this country. But it is nevertheless true that the evils of the sweatshop and the slum, the evils of needless disease and poverty, and the evils of social injustice are, at bottom, moral issues. Such conditions arise because men have neglected the moral law. They arise because men do not actually live up to the religious principles they profess to believe in.

When we move to correct these evils, through our personal conduct, through community action, or through the Government, we are responding to the Divine command—to the Golden Rule—which requires us to do good to others.

Of course, this is a struggle that is never finally won. There are many injustices in our country that need correction today, and need them badly. We must continue to weigh our national life in the scales of justice, and keep on striving to improve it.

In the world at large, as well as in our domestic affairs, we must apply moral standards to our national conduct. At the present time our Nation is engaged in a great effort to maintain justice and peace in the world. An essential feature of this effort is our program to build up the defenses of our country.

There has never been a greater cause. There has never been a cause which had a stronger moral claim on all of us.

MORAL BASIS OF LIFE AT STAKE

We are defending the religious principles upon which our Nation and our whole way of life are founded. We are defending the right to worship God, each as he sees fit according to his own conscience. We are defending the right to follow the precepts and the example which God has set for us. We are defending the right of people to gather together, all across our land, in churches such as this one.

For the danger that threatens us in the world today is utterly and totally opposed to all these things. The international Communist movement is based on a fierce and terrible fanaticism. It denies the existence of God, and, wherever it can, it stamps out the worship of God.

Our religious faith gives us the answer to the false beliefs of communism. Our faith shows us the way to create a society where man can find his greatest happiness under God. Surely we can follow that faith with the same devotion and determination the Communists give to their godless creed.

This is what we must do. Our religion must live in our hearts, not as a set of dull rules learned by rote, but as a burning faith. Only such a faith—only a living allegiance to such a faith—can carry this country through the trials which are ahead of it.

This is a matter that comes home to everyone of us. We have many different jobs to do and different parts to play in our country's defense of its freedom and its beliefs.

If each of us, wherever he may be—in a factory or a mine, on a farm or in an office, or in the home—if each of us does his best to help—we need have no fear of the outcome.

We should continually ask ourselves whether we are responding to this cause with the moral conviction and the faith which it demands.

DAILY SACRIFICES RECORDED

Every day our newspapers tell us about the fighting in Korea. Our men there are making heroic sacrifices. They are fighting and suffering in an effort to prevent the tide of aggression from sweeping across the world. They are fighting to prevent the much greater sacrifice and suffering which all of us would endure if another world war comes.

Although we read about these sacrifices in our newspapers every day, we have a tendency to think of the defense effort only in selfish terms—in terms of avoiding personal inconvenience or making some personal gain. Our young men are offering their lives for us in the hills of Korea—and yet too many of us are chiefly concerned over whether or not we can buy a television set next week, or make the profit we expect to make this year, or how we can turn the situation to our advantage.

This is a failure to understand the moral principles upon which our own Nation is founded. This is a faltering in our allegiance to the moral faith we have inherited from our fathers.

If we truly believe in God, we ought to ask ourselves what He may be thinking of our present attitude and our present conduct. Considering all the advantages that God has given us as a nation and all the mercies that He has shown to us from our very beginnings, we ought to ask ourselves whether we today are worthy of all that He has done for us. We ought to ask ourselves whether we, as a people, are doing our part; whether we are carrying out our moral obligations.

I do not think that anyone can study the history of this Nation of ours—study it deeply and earnestly—without becoming convinced that divine providence has played a great part in it. I have the feeling that God has created us and brought us to our present position of power and strength for some great purpose.

THE TASK IS NOT AN EASY ONE

It is not given to us now to know fully what that purpose is. But I think we may be sure of one thing. And that is that our country is intended to do all it can, in cooperation with other nations, to help create peace and preserve peace in the world. It is given to us to defend the spiritual values—the moral code—against the vast forces of evil that seek to destroy them.

This is a hard task. It is not one that we have asked for. At times, we would like to lay it down. And, as we go on with it, we see that it is full of uncertainties and sacrifices.

But we need not be afraid, if we have faith.

There is a lesson for us in the passage from the Bible which has just been read here. That part of the Book of Ezra describes the rebuilding of the temple in Jerusalem after the long captivity in Babylon. You remember how the writer describes the people shouting with a great shout when the foundation of the new temple was laid. And then the author goes on to point out that some of those in the crowd, particularly the old men, did not shout. They wept when they saw the foundation stones set in place.

These were the men who remembered all the sacrifices—all the suffering—their people had undergone during the captivity. They knew that these sacrifices had not been in vain. They realized that, in spite of all their troubles, and in the face of overwhelming odds, their faith had prevailed. And so they were too deeply moved to shout; they wept for joy.

They gave thanks to God "because He is good, for His mercy endureth forever."

If we hold true to our faith, as they did, I am sure that we will be able to offer, on some future day, the same heartfelt prayer of thanksgiving and joy. We, too, will be able to give God the glory for the victory of freedom and justice and peace for which we are striving today.

We, too, shall say: "He is good, for His mercy endureth forever."

Opposition to Compulsory Military Service

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. WILLIAM E. JENNER

OF INDIANA

IN THE SENATE OF THE UNITED STATES

Wednesday, April 4 (legislative day of Monday, March 26), 1951

Mr. JENNER. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to have printed in the RECORD a thoughtful statement published in the Freeman for November 13, 1950, relating to the fundamental American opposition to compulsory military or civilian service.

There being no objection, the article was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

THE MANIA FOR COMPULSION

Good citizens ought to defend their country. Good citizens ought to vote. But should they be compelled by law to do either?

In the Anglo-Saxon world, at least, the answer to such a question used to be no. It was part and parcel of the traditional English feeling about liberty that free men could always be counted on to volunteer in sufficient numbers both to serve the state and to see to it that rascals would be thrown out of office. Since 1914, however, the traditional English conception of liberty has had a hard time of it. To meet the levée en masse imposed by the authoritarian and dictator states of continental Europe in two world wars, the Anglo-Saxon world has felt itself compelled to resort to conscription to raise its armies. And now there is more and more talk about the necessity of making voting compulsory by law.

The mania for compulsion afflicts people of all political persuasions. For example, the eminently conservative Representative WADSWORTH of New York joins with President Harry Truman in advocating, not merely a temporary draft for the Armed Forces, but universal military training virtually in perpetuity. The New York Times is properly appalled when the Left advocates seizure of a person's property, but it looks with approval upon universal military training, which is seizure of a man's body for a term of involuntary servitude. (The fact that universal military training and slavery can be described functionally in the same terms ought to give anyone pause.)

In opposing UMT, we realize that we are treading on boggy ground, at least from the narrowly pragmatic point of view. With Soviet Russia herding millions of its slave citizens into a gigantic mass army, and into a gigantic industry designed solely to support that army, just how is the West to meet the threat without resorting to compulsion on its own? Given a modicum of sense in our diplomacy over the past decade, the job of checking Russia could have been done without resort to the spending of billions and the compulsory uprooting of thousands of young men from schools, homes, jobs and careers. But our diplomacy has let us down. We have lost millions of allies in China, and in eastern and central Europe, because of the frivolities (and worse) of our State Department. So we are faced with the necessity of the draft.

Or are we? There is a school of military thought which says that we can still beat Russia without violating basic libertarian principles. A Major de Seversky, a General Bonner Fellers, even (perhaps) a Douglas MacArthur, would argue that the United States should concentrate on air power, on the industrial production of fast mobile weapons, and on guided missiles and the super-explosives. Properly handled, these might be the equivalent to us of the nineteenth-century British Navy, which was successfully manned by volunteers. Not being military experts, we hesitate to give unqualified endorsement to the Seversky idea. But at least it is worth more talk than it is getting.

Talk or not, however, the draft is with us for the time being. It will probably be with us for some time to come. Since it is rooted in a history of diplomatic mistakes that can not be conjured away, we accept it as an inevitable concommitant of the next 5 years. But acceptance of the draft as a temporary measure and acceptance of universal military training as a permanent warp in the fabric of American life are quite different things.

The proponents of universal military training claim that it will do wonders for the young. It will make them healthy, increase their self-reliance, and so on. Having visited Army camps during World War II, and having listened to the GI tell stories that have never yet appeared in Kinsey, we doubt that a baptism in venereal disease or in spree drinking does much to improve a young man's health. As for the self-reliance, when did force applied to those over the age of 15 ever contribute to such? To use contemporary psychiatric jargon, nobody ever becomes "inner-directed" by living an "other-directed" life. Jumping to the bark of the drill sergeant does not constitute a self-disciplined regimen.

From 1870 on, the countries of Europe went in for universal military training. They also went in for romantic youth movements aimed at substituting a barrack-room life for the blandishments of bourgeois society. The end result was fascism—or the triumph of the principle that a man's body can be seized at any time by the state for the state's uses. Nobody, to our knowledge, has ever bothered to explore the nature of the all-togetherness of events in Europe from 1870 to 1950. But we do not doubt the connection between universal military training and the triumph of the idea that the human being has no right to a life apart from the aims and needs of the state.

The United States has won two great wars within the span of a couple of generations. It has done so without interim universal military training. Is it not reasonable to assume that it has been able to win precisely because it has had a society that left the individual free to experiment, to learn, to produce, on his own? Particularly in the individual's plastic years, from 17 to 21?

The assumption is not only reasonable, it is incontrovertible. A boy of 16 or 17 has just reached the stage of adolescence which poses the internal necessity of getting along on his own. He is ready to cut loose from strict parental supervision. At 16 and 17, the self-reliant youth looks for a summer job away from home. He begins to thumb the college catalogs to see what courses most appeal to him. He is beginning to mature. When a war comes, the properly matured youth is ready to use his ingenuity, his genuine self-reliance, in battle. He may need basic training in the elements of fighting (a training which can be provided in the period when the economy is tooling up to produce military supplies), but he will be a more resourceful aviator, a cannier tank-driver, if he has been left alone in his formative years to tinker with auto engines, or to run a tractor in summer months on a farm. And he will have a better conception of military tactics and strategy if he has quarterbacked a college football team or learned to execute the hit-and-run in baseball.

Under a system of compulsory universal military training, the state rudely interferes with the natural processes of late adolescence. It jerks a boy from the area of experiment, of self-exploration and a fledgling approach to inner-directedness, and plunks him down into an atmosphere of coercion. The sergeant-image replaces the father-image in his mind. He may be physically active in executing a thousand orders, he may even reach a point in the hierarchical army set-up where he gives commands in addition to receiving them. But for all the activity of the military life, the boy is forced into psychological passivity. Things are done to him, or for him; he does not do things out of free choice for himself.

When the inductee goes back to civilian life, where he must learn to get along on his own, he is necessarily bewildered. The bewilderment disappears in time, but only because the atmosphere of civilian life in America is still incredibly free. A generation of UMT would change that atmosphere beyond recognition.

As we have said, a temporary draft may be necessary. But at best it is an acceptance of a lesser evil, something which should be watched carefully and rejected as soon as is possible. Keep the draft for the time being if no better way of opposing Russia can be found. But don't let us make the mistake of thinking that the values of Athens can be maintained by changing our society into a Sparta for all time.

To return to the matter of compulsory voting. Sometimes, when the two parties, Democratic and Republican, are both recreant to their trust, and there is no respectable third party in the field, the only honorable thing a citizen can do is to boycott the polls. By refraining from voting, he serves notice on the old-line politicians that he is a menace to be reckoned with when he returns to voting in the future. He is ready to follow a new leader, to vote for an entirely different program than any the old-line politician has seen fit to propose. Simply because the abstaining voter is an incalculable element in the political picture, the old-line politician must tread warily in his presence.

Not voting, then, can be as positive an act of citizenship as voting. And political freedom implies, of course, the freedom to refrain.

We do not advocate political indifference. We hope that more and more American citizens will choose voluntarily to vote when there is something to vote about. But a compulsory vote is a distasteful thing. It is almost as bad as a compulsory one-party slate.

Let's have done with the mania for compulsion. In a free society it doesn't solve a thing.

We Must Have an Over-All Natural Resources Policy

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. CLIFFORD R. HOPE
OF KANSAS
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Wednesday, April 4, 1951

Mr. HOPE. Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my remarks in the RECORD, I include herewith a challenging speech by Mr. E. H. Taylor, associate editor of the Country Gentleman, on the subject of our lack of a sound national policy for the conservation of our renewable natural resources:

Mr. Chairman, members of the conference, a newspaper cartoon that must have caused some wry laughs appeared not long back. It depicted a man in a toy store showing a puzzle to a mother and her young hopeful with the remark: "This will help to adjust him to the conditions of modern life. No matter how he tries to put it together, it will always come out wrong."

The cartoon, with its frustrating puzzle, unhappily fits many of the distractions of the time. It has no bearing, however, on our mistakes in the management of the renewable natural resources of the Nation. We are failing to insure the conservation, sustained use, and potential values of these basic resources for other reasons than the want of any possible solution.

The failure is due mainly to a disregard of two realities. One is the critical importance of these renewable resources to the life of the Nation. The other is the unity, the indivisible relationship of these resources to one another. We have many policies dealing with them separately, but we have no national policy which comprehends and meets the whole requirements.

There is grave danger that this attitude will continue to prevail. The attention and energies of the Nation are centered upon the struggle for survival in the present world conflict. Other interests are being subordinated or set aside until this struggle is resolved.

But we cannot afford to defer the proper care of our renewable natural resources to some indefinite future. They, too, are requisites of survival. Food is one of the three essentials of war. Our food-producing resources suffered a severe drain during and after the recent conflict. The further pressure now being put upon them may last 5, 10, or 15 years, perhaps a generation.

Only a foresighted and resolute conservation of these basic resources will enable them to stand up under such a prolonged strain.

But there is another compelling reason why we must safeguard our capital stock of renewable resources through this emergency. We want to emerge from it with the same kind of America—an America of widespread opportunity, of an advancing standard of living and a vigorous national economy. This will be possible only if our food-producing resources are capable of supporting these advantages.

Food is the primary necessity of life. People spend their money for it first. What is left over is the total fund available for other economic and social uses. Because we have always had plenty of food at a moderate cost a large balance of personal income has been left over for the other satisfactions of life. It is this broad margin of spendable income that has made possible our flourishing industrial system, large-scale employment at high wage levels, and all the variety of professions and services found in this country.

This wealth of food-producing resources has had a reciprocal effect. It has released more and more people for the production of other goods and the amenities of life. These in turn have supplied the improved machines and tools and scientific research which have multiplied the capacity of those remaining on the land. Thus we have the paradox of an increasing food production at the same time that our soil and water resources are deteriorating. It can lead us into one of the most dangerous illusions in our history.

We will, of course, win the struggle with world communism. But while winning it will we neglect and permanently weaken the resources which nourish the American form of society? The answer depends on the public and official understanding of this danger on the home front, and their will to do something about it.

When I stress the necessity of conserving our food-producing resources it is with no thought of singling them out for attention. This would be but to perpetuate the error that has been pursued in the past and present. Soil and water are but parts of what Morris L. Cooke has described as the great complex we call nature. Indivisibly included in it also are forests, grass, fish, and wildlife. All of these elements are interdependent. They are every one members one of another as truly as that other body of which St. Paul spoke.

The uses of land in accord with its needs and capabilities, uses that hold moisture where it falls or slow down its runoff, are necessary to conserve the tilth, the topsoil, and the organic materials that make land fertile and productive. But also, without such conservation of our land resources, we cannot clean up, control, and develop the potential values of our rivers and other water resources. The forest areas are of critical importance to the protection of our watersheds and the water supplies of thousands of communities. Grass is the great healer of land that has been abused. And finally, though I have no need to tell you, fish require healthy stream beds and wildlife the food, cover, and natural habitat that only a provident use of land will afford.

All of these resources are indispensable to our economy, our social structure, and to a full and satisfactory life for the American people. All of them are inextricably bound up together. Any policy that preserves and builds upon this heritage of resources must be an integrated policy, fully recognizing their fixed association and interaction upon one another.

We have nothing resembling such a policy now. Instead we have numerous separate, fragmented and sometimes conflicting policies and programs. These disconnected efforts are being carried on by various agencies, each naturally intent upon its own specialty. It is as though the Air Force, the infantry, the artillery, and the armored units were each to follow its own plan of battle with only accidental coordination with the others. The results are the same in either case. As the report of the President's Water Resources Policy Commission said in this understatement:

"Our Federal programs have not brought the situation under control. In fact, there are no current programs adequate to meet our urgent need for the preservation of these renewable resources. All targets fall far short of that mark."

It is time to end this haphazard and losing course. The public interest requires that we now come to grips with the task in an intelligent and effective way. This requirement can be met only by a policy that views these resources as an entirety, and not as separate problems. In short, we must have a national policy for our renewable natural resources which comprehends both their involved relationship and their vital importance to the welfare of the Nation.

Such a policy should establish the conservation, sound use, and development of our renewable natural resources as a basic purpose of the Government and require all other present and future policies and programs to be adjusted to it.

This policy should be long-range in perspective, with an emphasis on permanency in results. It should clearly define the objectives to be sought with each of our renewable natural resources. In brief, these objectives should represent the maximum public benefits that can be achieved by their proper use and management. In conformity with their interrelated nature, the policy should require that all resource programs and projects shall be correlated to produce the fullest possible multipurpose effects.

A national policy, shaped along some such lines, must precede any orderly and successful management of the renewable natural resources of the Nation.

Its long-time importance is equaled by its urgency. Unless such a policy is enacted soon there is a distinct danger that these resources will be neglected and allowed to deteriorate further during the defense emergency. A natural resources policy would be the most effective, perhaps the only effective check to this danger. It would direct public and official attention to the immediate need of using and conserving these resources in a manner to insure their permanency and it would add efficiency to the present resource activities.

The failure to provide a natural resources policy is an omission in the security program that Congress should repair at the earliest possible time.

Even at best, we cannot expect quick action. For not only must a resource policy be well thought out but it must be geared to do the job. This involves decisions as to how it will operate and be administered. I shall offer my own ideas.

For practical purposes most of our future resource programs should be organized on a watershed basis. Except for a few of the outsize rivers, such as the Mississippi and the Missouri, the watershed or river basin is a natural operational unit. It presents a workable aggregate of renewable resources as well as the problems they involve. This fact adapts it to an integrated program, in which the efforts of the various resourse agencies can be marshaled most efficiently.

The great number of small watersheds in this country makes such a plan of operation all the more practicable. Unless they are well managed the problems of the big streams they feed will remain beyond solution. Their resource development offers a large measure of public benefits, as the Muskingum Conservancy District so well demonstrates. Moreover, what has happily been called the community watershed is the unit in which can best be enlisted the initiative and active participation of local people, for they can see its connection with their own interests. This is an asset not to be disregarded.

The democratic principle of local and regional planning should be one of the fundamentals of a national resources policy. In the administration of that policy a middle way between the present irresponsibility and some kind of centralized control is both possible and preferable. It will remain possible, however, only if action is taken before the condition of these resources reaches a critical stage.

The paramount need is for the American people and their elected officials to see the issue in its real terms. It is not simply a matter of saving soil fertility, of controlling wasted waters, of growing enough timber or of producing more game to hunt and fish to catch. These are highly desirable in themselves. But the issue is larger than any of them.

It is a question of whether we shall have at our command the basic natural resources required for continuing growth, for the satisfactions of living and for the security of the American experiment in human freedom. This is the proposition in its real dimensions. Surely it is reason enough for a national policy that will conserve and increase the renewable natural resources of the Nation.

Lawyers and the Present-Day Crisis

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. J. PERCY PRIEST

OF TENNESSEE

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Wednesday, April 4, 1951

Mr. PRIEST. Mr. Speaker, under permission to extend my remarks, I include an address made by the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. McCORMACK] on the occasion of the annual banquet of the Boston University Law School Alumni Association, held in Boston the evening of March 27, 1951:

LAWYERS AND THE PRESENT-DAY CRISIS

In appraising the position of the lawyer of today in the present crisis it is well, I think, to recall the days when our Nation faced its first and greatest of crises.

In the stirring days between 1775 and 1789, the predominant question and the great concern was the preservation of what the liberty-loving colonists conceived as the only form of government consistent with the dignity of free men.

Today, the strengthening and perpetuation of that same form of government against a more insidious enemy is again the principal problem of free Americans who have inherited the spirit of the founding fathers.

In the days of the birth-pains of the Republic, it was not without reason that the people of a fledgling Nation looked to the men of law to lay the foundations upon which the structure of liberty should be built.

At the end of the eighteenth century, the ancient Judiac-Christian conception of the natural law linked western civilization with the infant Republic.

It was natural, therefore, that the only technically qualified moulders of the American constitutional system were recruited from the profession whose members were schooled in the philosophy that all man-made laws must conform to the law of God.

Thus it was that 34 of the 55 members who comprised the Constitutional Convention were practicing members of the legal profession or had been indoctrinated in the current jurisprudence of their day.

With the adoption of the Constitution, the lawyers became its interpreters and defenders. As the practical political scientists of their day, they espoused and advanced the case of federalism until it became the model and the wonder of government throughout the world.

Today, after a century and a half, the structure which they devised and built still stands. It has survived because of steadfast adherence to the principles of the philosophy from which its architecture was drafted.

The danger today is a tendency to overlook the fact that the enemy of democracy—atheistic, materialistic, imperialistic, international communism—is in reality an expression of a vicious creed which is the antithesis of the natural-law philosophy embodied in our Declaration and our Bill of Rights. As in the days of the founding fathers, then, the battle is cast in the realm of ideas.

It is our task as Americans and as lawyers to help mightily in order that the truth shall prevail.

Wielded in the hands of Bracton, Coke, Fortescue, Blackstone, and Pollock, this natural law which is our heritage broke the power of the "divine right of kings."

Thundered forth in the preachments of Otis, Henry, Wilson, Adams, Hamilton, Jefferson, and Madison, it received immortal enshrinement in our own charters of liberty and established representative government as the protector, and not the creator, of inalienable rights in man.

The lawyers and judges of today are the spiritual descendants of the Coke who defied the King and of Jefferson who penned the Declaration.

Their tasks and duty are no less noble and no more burdensome.

The task is to pit their knowledge, their skill, and all their energies against the philosophy of force which would enslave the world in the paralyzing grip of modern totalitarianism.

As in the times of crisis in the past, the lawyers of today must become the practical political scientists.

The traditions of our law must be reinvigorated and modernized for use—practical use—in the battle of ideologies which rages about us today.

Our principles and precedents are the raw materials—a veritable arsenal of ideas—out of which we can fashion the weapons to capture the minds of men and wean them away from the delusive hope and the false faith which blind them to the baseness of all totalitarian "isms."

The members of our profession must go into the market place of ideas and there preach the basic elements of the doctrine of human freedom.

This means constant reiteration of the principles upon which this Nation was founded, the same principles without which liberty and justice are impossible.

In order to preserve freedom and to secure justice, the nature of man as the repository of those virtues must be evaluated in the light of the natural law.

The medieval teaching which came down to us in the process of the development of the common law must be rediscovered and emphasis again given to the fact that natural law is antecedent to the law of the state.

Believing this and preaching it, we have the answer to the false prophets of today, and their fallacious doctrines shall wither in the wind of truth if we but have the courage to preach and act and live by what we believe.

One of the most significant expressions of my thought is found in a quotation from an address by Chief Judge Lehman, of the New York Court of Appeals in 1941:

"Statesman, prelate and judge, Protestant, Catholic, and Jew, are united in the conviction that the inalienable rights of the individual, formulated and assured by our law, rest upon a foundation eternal and immutable because it is Divine. There lies America's unity."

The lawyer of the present day can do much to spread that conviction.

Today as in the past the spirit of the legal profession generates unquenchable patriotism. Some of the younger members of the bar are now engaged in active combat in Korea. Many others are serving in the various branches of the armed services. Still others, are holding important civil posts in the Federal, State, and local governments.

The very environment surrounding the training of a young man for admission to the bar reflects a respect for law and order. He has been made to believe that juridical order is the essential element of a peaceful society. He can easily understand that this juridical order and good government go hand in hand; that no government can long exist except upon the consent of the governed; that there must be a peaceful adjustment of political affairs and the settlement of disputes by rule of law rather than strength of arms. For "when law ceases, tyranny starts."

But no matter how much he believes in all these things, history teaches him that wars are recurring. No actual solution toward an enduring peace has yet been found.

Yet when war does come, as was the case in World War II and our previous wars, we find the legal profession well trained and experienced to render great public service.

This manifests itself in many ways; adjustment of management-labor disputes so essential to our productive capacity; in the making of Government contracts for defense production; in the field of administrative law; in the forming and enforcement of policies to control inflation; in case of shortages to assure equitable allocation; in the administration of the Selective Service System; in the field of military justice; and many other activities too numerous to mention.

We find the lawyer in time of emergency or of war always responding to the call for active service.

With his training, his ability, his experience, his well schooled mind, particularly in fundamentals, as a leader in his community the lawyer helps mold sound public opinion on important issues of the day.

By virtue of his education, training and experience, he is uniquely qualified and does to a marked extent form and interpret our Government's position on foreign and domestic fields.

Giving full credit to the contributions made by those engaged in other fields of human activity, the influence of the lawyer in the sphere of government is tremendous, and properly so. His education and training equips him to make a marked contribution in the science and operation of government. He has, he is, he will continue to do so.

Because of our changed economic conditions, the large volume of legislation, the necessity and pressure for action, the real work in the Congress is done in committee. It therefore follows on the national legislative level, for all practical purposes, congressional government has essentially turned into committee government.

This means that greater importance must be and is attached to the legislative drafting office of the Senate and House in the Congress, composed of lawyers, who also invariably sit in when committees are considering a bill. Therefore the staffs of committees with the prominence of the lawyer thereon, are all-important. In the executive branch of government, the lawyer as adviser, renders valuable assistance to the President, and department heads.

In the field of preserving the constitutional guaranties relating to the liberties of our people and the American way of life, and at the same time preventing or controlling subversive efforts aimed at the destruction of our Government the lawyer, either as a legislator, as an active practitioner, as a prosecuting attorney, or as a judge, plays the primary part.

Our country—as all of you know—is engaged today in the largest program of military expansion we have ever undertaken short of involvement in full-scale war.

This build-up of military strength is far more than the bald proposition that might makes right. We seek the establishment of a firmly grounded system of international law and order among the family of nations. And to this end, the creation now of powerful military forces within the community of free nations is essential.

We look to the creation of a common policy, directed to a common purpose, and guided by a common body of law among nations. It is the logical end-point of this view that all nations of the world work out together, and ultimately accept, the same policy with respect to dealings among themselves.

Certainly, within the framework of western society we have managed largely to abate the conditions in which the individual takes the law in his own hands. The individual who breaches the law of the community today does so at the peril of sanctions which the community may impose upon him.

But this has not always been the case. The story of civilization is the story of man's continuing battle to enlarge liberty and security of the community at large—always at the expense of the unrestrained activities of the individual. And it is equally the story of resistance by the powerful individual to any new restraints upon his ability to plunder.

With such a heritage, it is indeed difficult for me to understand why any American would challenge the general principle that the collective liberty of all stands above any license that would permit one individual to deprive others of their liberty.

Just as law and order based upon morality have been slow to develop within nations themselves, they have been slower still in emerging among nations. The earlier development of order and stability within nations has evidently received great assistance where there has been a common racial, religious, and environmental background, and achievement of national unity has almost invariably been retarded under conditions in which racial, religious, or environmental differences have divided the people.

While we are a people, not a nation, fortunately we have had no such intense or long-disturbing differences among our people.

The revolution in communications, largely within the past century, has for perhaps the first time in history made unity among nations a practicable—and, I hope, foreseeable—possibility.

We cannot close our eyes to the magnitude of the job. Traditional national jealousies gravely aggravate the task. Great differences in living standards, cultural heritage, political experience, and a thousand other factors give rise to misunderstandings and keep suspicions alive.

The difficulties are great. Yet I firmly believe most Americans accept the fact that it is in our national interest to overcome the difficulties. We can expect no miracle overnight that will bring about the brotherhood of man and world-wide understanding. But with equal truth we can say that only by trying can the job be done. One thing seems to me to be certain; we cannot expect success by default.

The first task of our foreign policy has been—and to a large extent still is—to weld the free nations into a unified community simply as a matter of self-preservation. Division and disunity among the free nations can only result in having them picked off one at a time. The dangers of such division and disunity are at once evident. Every loss to us is a gain to the forces of world communism—a long-term increase in their resources at the expense of ours.

Now if we could assume that world communism would expand no further than it has today, the United States could, perhaps, confine its attention to building up its own defenses without any regard for what happens elsewhere in the world. But there is no basis whatever for believing that the Kremlin is content with what it has already taken. Indeed, the ceaseless activity of world communism belies any intention to be satisfied with what it already has. And when we look out upon the terrible internal weakness within so many of the non-Communist nations, it is perfectly clear that they do not possess the strength individually to protect themselves. Only by uniting their efforts can there be any realistic hope that their freedom can be maintained, and this directly concerns our own country.

If the Kremlin is to be denied world conquest, the answer is to be found in creating situations of strength to replace the areas of weakness which now threaten so many of the nations outside the Red orbit. And it has been toward the creation of these situations of strength that our foreign policy has been directed.

We have sought to accomplish this through policies mutually adopted by ourselves and other nations. The programs have been designed with the realization that their success is measured by the degree of cooperation, mutual trust and common purpose which they generate among the nations participating in them. The more nearly they succeed in breaking down suspicions and national jealousies, the more closely they approach the kind of unity upon which a lasting system of law and order can be built.

I should like now to examine our major foreign policy programs of the postwar years with an eye to testing their contribution to our ultimate goal of peace and stability throughout the family of nations.

Our participation in the United Nations was—and is—predicated upon the assumption that an international institution, participated in by all nations, is a fundamental requirement of a system of law and order. This, in particular, is a challenge to the legal mind. The United Nations furnished a great meeting place of nations in which international questions could be presented, discussed, and understanding of them broadened. The United Nations Charter incorporated more areas of agreement between nations than had ever before been put on paper. But it was not a perfect instrument, and from the first it was recognized that the mainspring of its initial success would be provided by national good faith, rather than legally foolproof sanctions. It was, nonetheless, a tremendous step forward when you consider that it did succeed in bringing together all but a small handful of nations.

Obstruction and bad faith by the Kremlin and its satellites has served to hamper what direct enforcement powers the United Nations did possess. On the other hand, the United Nations has done a fine job of promoting greater understanding among nations. Nations of the free world have sat in ringside seats as evidences of Soviet bad faith have continued to pile up. Without question this factor has been of primary importance in uniting the free world.

I should also like to point out that last fall the General Assembly enacted a provision which now permits it to impose sanctions free of the veto. Back in October, Secretary of State Acheson proposed the uniting-for-peace resolution, giving the Assembly power to act when the Security Council was hamstrung by the veto. And the Assembly accepted the resolution, with only the Soviets and their satellites voting against it. This adds a significant new strength to the UN, and is a real victory for forces seeking an effective system of law and order.

But the United Nations is young, and it is just now beginning to cut its teeth. It still lacks the strength necessary to assure world peace under all circumstances. And thus it is that American foreign policy has directed its attention in part to regional programs designed to strengthen the security of the non-Communist world.

Along in 1946, guerrilla warfare, directed and supplied from the Kremlin, broke out in Greece. The weak and economically wrecked Government of Greece had too recently emerged from Nazi occupation to possess sufficient strength to beat down the threat. And about the same time, the Soviet Union was making exploratory moves in the direction of Turkey.

It was evident that these countries were too weak to save themselves without help. America's answer to this threat was the Truman doctrine, under which we furnished arms and economic assistance. With this aid, both Greece and Turkey were able to strengthen themselves sufficiently that the threat to their security was overcome. And out of the Truman doctrine has grown a new friendship and a greatly stronger desire by both these countries to work in close cooperation with other nations. Both the Greeks and Turks have forces fighting now in Korea, despite the fact that each country borders the Soviet empire, and is fully aware of the opposing military forces across their borders.

Furthermore, both the Greeks and Turks have won the growing respect of the western European nations, and the prospects for their ultimate participation in the Atlantic Pact are now quite encouraging.

As the Soviets took over the countries of Eastern Europe, the rest of Europe was terribly threatened. Chaotic economic conditions produced an almost mushroomlike growth of internal Communist activity and the overthrow of many non-Communist governments seemed imminent. American Marshall-plan aid cut off that threat, and enabled the countries of Western Europe to re-create a situation of economic stability by restoring industrial and agricultural production to points well above prewar levels.

A major feature of the Marshall plan was the emphasis placed upon carrying out the economic recovery program as part of an over-all plan for Western Europe, rather than attempting it piecemeal, country by country. Thus, the governments of the Marshall plan countries sat down together to work out their problems. Considerable headway was made in cutting down the age-old tariff barriers, and in eliminating uneconomic competition. And efforts to further this are still being made.

As an adventure in international cooperation, the Marshall plan has been a striking success. Without it, the defense of Western Europe today would be impossible.

The situation of economic strength created in Europe by the Marshall plan eradicated the internal threat of communism there. Militarily, however, the threat of possible aggression was very real, and any realistic thinking necessarily had to consider that the Kremlin might seek the conquest of Western Europe by force if efforts at internal subversion and economic collapse failed.

It was to meet this threat of aggression that the North Atlantic Pact was adopted in 1949.

The North Atlantic Pact, born of necessity, consists of 12 nations, including our own country, to stand together for common defense. It is in our national interest. It is in the national interest of the other pact member nations.

Its purpose is twofold:

1. To build collective military strength within the Atlantic community with the will not only to prepare but to fight, if necessary, and powerful enough to prevent any attack from coming.

2. In case of attack, to stand together in common defense and resistance against the aggressor.

It is recognized the only factor the Kremlin respects is that which it fears, and that is strength and power greater than that possessed by the Soviet Union.

The Atlantic Pact, created by voluntary entry of its member nations, is based upon a mutuality and trust for a common purpose—unity and strength to prevent aggression, preserve independence and liberty, and as an instrument of peace.

By the Mutual Defense Act of 1949, we implement the North Atlantic Pact to build up military forces in Europe, speed military equipment to our treaty allies, recognizing, as Congress did, that only by an integrated defense force could maximum benefits be obtained by a minimum cost.

In rendering assistance to other treaty nations we are not disregarding our own national defenses.

The policy of the Kremlin prior to Korea was for Communist forces within a country, with the assistance of the Soviet Union, through any means possible, to take over country after country, and as this resulted, to become satellites of the Soviet Union.

The Greek-Turk assistance, and the Marshall plan in other free European countries, has stopped that policy of internal subversion, the overthrow of the existing government, and thereafter Communist domination.

Stalin and his associates had to turn to a policy of open aggression through satellites.

The attack on South Korea by the North Korean Communists, and the follow-up by Red China was the first act of open aggression.

We had witnessed the act of open aggression by the Japs in Manchuria in 1930; by Mussolini in Ethiopia in 1937; and later by Hitler in the Ruhr, followed by Czechoslavakia, Austria, Hungary, with Great Britain following the policy of appeasement, and with the attack on Poland, the Second World War followed.

It is the first open act of aggression that does the damage, and based on our own experiences, its natural and probably consequences, when appeased or permitted, has been war.

Successful open aggression in Korea would have been rapidly followed elsewhere by further aggression against other nations.

For our country to sit back and protest diplomatically, in other words to follow the dangerous policy of appeasement, would have lost for us the confidence and respect of all countries of the world outside the Red orbit, and countless of millions of persons behind the iron curtain who are looking for their day of deliverance.

We would have destroyed respect for our word and our solemn obligations, we would have failed in our trust.

In all probabilities, we would have compelled every non-Communist country to turn through necessity, but with fear to make the best deal possible with the Kremlin, and that would be but the beginning of the end.

Western Europe, with its know-how, with its productive capacity and its 200,000,000 inhabitants, would sooner or later be lost to us. Frankly, this is too great a risk to place our country in. I shall do everything within my power to prevent it.

In order to prevent that happening we might in our own defense and our national interest be compelled to resort to armed conflict with the Soviet Union.

President Truman saw the danger, made his decision and acted quickly with courage.

The aggression in Korea has awakened our people to the danger that exists. Our Navy, our Air Forces, and our land forces have been greatly increased and strengthened. Our Armed Forces now exceed 2,900,000 men and women, having doubled since the outbreak of the Korean aggression on June 25. Our production for defense has greatly increased, with our productive capacity geared to total production, if necessary.

Our resistance to the Korean aggression has increased the morale, the military strength, and production of non-Communist countries.

If another world conflict is averted, it is my firm opinion that Korea, with the armed resistance to the first open act of aggression that took place in that country, will be a main factor in this desired result.

The next step for peace by stopping open aggression was the formation of the defense forces of the North Atlantic Pact nations through the recent appointment of General Eisenhower as the over-all military commander in chief.

The success of the Atlantic Pact is in the national interest of the United States. It is also in the national interest of the other 11 member nations.

I expect that Greece and Turkey will soon be members of the pact.

I hope that Spain will be a member in the near future.

The directing of policies concerning the national interest of a nation calls for cool, calm, rational thinking, with emotional thoughts, impulses, or reactions eliminated as far as is humanly possible.

It is my opinion, which I have advocated for a long time, that it would be for our interest and in the interest of a future period of peace for our country to enter into a military agreement or a military alliance with the Government of Spain; also, that as soon as possible thereafter Spain should become a member of the North Atlantic Pact.

Where the national interest of two or more countries are involved, differences in form of government should not be permitted to interfere with those steps being taken which are in the national interest of such countries.

I would be greatly surprised if some such talks or negotiations with Spain are not now under way.

From our outlook, and I include the non-Communist world, conditions are decidedly better than they were 1, 2, or 3 years ago.

In case of sudden attack or war, we are now in a much better position than we were when Pearl Harbor took place. We are growing stronger.

With the Communist threat, the road to security and peace is through strength.

If I am to err, I intend to err on the side of strength and security rather than on the side of weakness and insecurity.

This is not the time when we can take any calculated risks on the side of weakness. Such risks must be on the side of strength.

I introduced on December 8, 1941, one resolution declaring war. I do not want to introduce another one. But I shall if necessary.

It is by America using its great strength affirmatively and effectively, with the moral forces of the world leading the way that the probability of another world war in our lifetime might be averted.

If this is accomplished, the chances for peace for a long period of time faces the world of today and tomorrow.

The lawyers of past generations were leaders in the onward march of mankind toward the establishment of representative government, and of personal liberty.

The lawyers of yesterday were leaders in the establishment and building of the American Republic. A great challenge for leadership presents itself to the lawyers of today.

It is a challenge for leadership which particularly addresses itself to the legal mind, and which will require ability, vision, patience, and courage to meet.

I have every confidence that the lawyers of today will meet the test, and particularly if war is averted, they will make their marked contributions toward the establishment of an international law and order and machinery which will extend justice to all nations and assure world peace for countless of generations to come.

With the direct responsibility that rests upon me, recognizing as I do the gravity and sensitivity of the world situation as it exists, the moral values and strength of men and women who want to be free, and the material strength of our country and our allies whose objective is peace and international law and order, I view the outcome with optimism and with confidence.

We Now Have a Poor Man's War

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. PAUL W. SHAFER
OF MICHIGAN
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES
Wednesday, March 14, 1951

Mr. SHAFER. Mr. Speaker, the recent Executive order deferring super-duper college students from call under selective service, in my mind, is ill-advised and poorly timed. It comes while the House of Representatives is considering legislation in which this matter is being dealt with. The President should withdraw this order pending the outcome of the congressional debate.

Under leave to extend my remarks, I include an article by Robert C. Ruark which appeared today in leading newspapers of the country. I agree with Mr. Ruark's observations regarding the deferment of the "bright young men" in college from the draft. The article follows:

WE NOW HAVE A POOR MAN'S WAR
(By Robert C. Ruark)

NEW YORK.—It seems we have now seen everything. Lo, behold, and forsooth, we now have a poor man's war, a draft in which the college man is mainly exempt from exposure to the military, and a brand-new caste system in the country.

Our President, in his wisdom, has ordered deferment from military service for young men who are passing their work in college, and shortly will subject other young men to special aptitude tests with an eye to deferment if they are smart enough to make a certain grade, as yet unannounced.

Of course, if a man is too poor to entertain the idea of college, or not spiritually attuned to higher education, he is still draft meat. Fall in, bum, you're in the Army now. We draft the Al Smiths, in other words, and exempt the Alger Hisses.

This, finally, seems to be as gross a violation of individual rights as has come down the pike lately. To choose a soldier on a basis of educational opportunity is almost, if not quite, as unfair a proposition as drafting only red-headed, blue-eyed boys with a strawberry mark on their right shoulders, while everybody else goes free.

It is admitted that education is important, but a great many successful people never went to college, and a great many bums did attend the better seminaries. But this is really beside the point.

The point is that the draft, like death and taxes, should be democratic in its administration. If there is a war stirring, and if a draft is necessary, then the obligation belongs to everybody. The load is shareable by all—not just a few.

It would, per se, be foolish to make a foot soldier out of a budding doctor, or throw a carbine at a brilliant physicist or engineer who is winding up his studies. But most of the men affected by the new draft order are not special cases. They are just youngsters taking general courses.

It is a human oddity that nobody cares to be drafted, and very few sane folks are eager to die. When a man is ordered by his government to conform to one or both penalties against personal freedom, he sort of likes to think that everybody is getting the same deal. A man without a college education is just as dear to his family and friends as a double dome with a triple degree in botany. And it is hard to tell, by looking at a dead GI, whether or not he was fortunate enough to get the full dose of school-housing.

To make a privileged class of any massive group of healthy young men is a downright insult to every candidate for the press gang. It would be of small comfort to a young man unfreezing his feet in Korea to reflect that his friend Bill, who could afford to go to college, was at the moment chasing a coed around the drinking room in a fraternity house at dear old Bless U.

The other angle is that your college man is highly usable in the Armed Forces, because if he can pass his courses the chances are he can think. Thinkers make great noncoms and officers. What do we seek here, a military composed strictly of fools, disgruntled poor boys, and morons?

If the great brains in Washington wish to really louse up the morale of their handcuff volunteers, this is a gorgeous way to do it. I still say the thing is to draft everybody within the limits of age, physical qualifications, and dependency, and then sort 'em out according to their best use from a military standpoint. This block deferment of students and smart guys is an insult to every cross at Anzio and to every civilian who presently wears the uniform of his country.

The Senate Kefauver Crime Investigation Committee Should Be Continued

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. WALTER E. ROGERS
OF TEXAS
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES
Wednesday, April 4, 1951

Mr. ROGERS of Texas. Mr. Speaker, I arise today to insert into the Appendix to the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD a telegram that I have received from Mr. J. C. Phillips, editor and manager, Borger News-Herald, of Borger, Tex. This telegram is most timely and most pertinent. It is a concise expression of what should be in the minds of all American citizens at this time. Character is the foundation of a sound government and a sound civilization, and for which there is no substitute.

BORGER, TEX., March 28, 1951.
Representative WALTER ROGERS,
House of Representatives:

Cities controlled by organized crime have no more chance of escape from this evil control than anti-Communist Russians have of escaping slavery to the Kremlin. The Senate Kefauver crime investigation committee should be continued until an aroused and indignant public starts effective local clean-ups. It seems that corruption in public office has become quite honorable just so long as it is not exposed. The ability to get rich quick, honestly or otherwise, has become too much a part of the American character. Unless we place more emphasis on individual character, in the home, in the school, in civil life, and in public offices, all of the decent and good things of civilization are apt to be lost to us. Dishonest government leads to dictatorship. It is a sorry thing that we sometimes hear, good men will not run for public office because of corruption inherent in politics. Obviously we have good men and courageous men in public office and these are the men who must lead us back to a higher standard of individual and national character. Even in small cities organized crime in public office is hard to eliminate and we know that when gambling and prostitution are flagrant in any city, regardless of size, some public official is getting a payoff. To eliminate this evil, the good people throughout the land must have the continuation of the newly organized Kefauver crime investigation.

Soldiers and Politicians

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. PAUL W. SHAFER
OF MICHIGAN
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES
Wednesday, March 14, 1951

Mr. SHAFER. Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my remarks, I include the article by the well-known and highly regarded writer, Hamilton Butler, which appeared in the Detroit Free-Press Sunday, April 1. I commend it to all Members of Congress:

SOLDIERS AND POLITICIANS

(By Hamilton Butler)

Among General MacArthur's many abilities is that of putting his foot in the mouths of double-talking diplomatists to their great annoyance.

The latest exhibition of this feat was his offer to meet the Chinese Communist commander in the field and discuss a military truce.

What was wrong with that?

As commander in chief of the UN forces fighting a war forced upon them by the Chinese Communists, General MacArthur was clearly within his rights in employing this tactical device.

The State Department, though, and the nervous Nellies at Lake Success shrieked that he had made a political decision and endangered their negotiations with Peiping for a cease-fire.

The arrant nonsense of this charge appears from the text of his March 24 statement:

"Apart from the military area of the problem, where the issues are resolved in the course of combat, the fundamental questions continue to be political in nature and must find their answer in the diplomatic sphere.

"Within the area of my authority as military commander, however, it should be needless to say I stand ready at any time to confer in the field with the commander in chief of the enemy forces in an earnest effort to find any military means whereby the realization of the political objectives of the United Nations in Korea, to which no nation may justly take exceptions, might be accomplished without further bloodshed."

As will be noted, General MacArthur emphasized the line dividing the sphere of military authority from that of political authority and carefully kept on his own side of it.

The unpardonable sin General MacArthur committed was in suggesting the possibility that he might obtain by a conference with the Chinese Communist commander the cease-fire that the diplomats have vainly sought for 4 months to win by appeasement.

The politicians will never forgive him for that.

While General MacArthur has sedulously avoided the area of political decisions, the politicians have invaded the area of military decisions and hamstrung him with limitations unparalleled in the history of warfare.

The interdict they imposed on carrying the war beyond the Yalu even after the Chinese Red hordes had crossed that river and attacked the UN forces in full strength created an inviolable sanctuary for the enemy.

The inability of the UN air arm to strike at their communications and bases in Manchuria was worth a dozen divisions to the Communists.

Also it has cost thousands of American lives.

The politicians told General MacArthur to clear Korea of Communist forces in order that it might become a free and united country.

Then they tied his hands.

As a soldier, and an American, General MacArthur wants to get this wretched business over with before the Korean people are further crucified and his troops suffer more senseless casualties.

The effect of his cease-fire statement was to expose what has been going on at Lake Success, where UN committees have been trying since December to interest Peiping in a truce, without any success at all. They have gotten a brushoff. The Commie foreign office won't even talk to them.

The air has been cleared.

Navy Research Promotes Safer Aviation

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. MELVIN PRICE
OF ILLINOIS
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES
Wednesday, April 4, 1951

Mr. PRICE. Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my remarks in the RECORD, I include herewith an article entitled "Navy's Aviation Matériel Center's Research Promotes Safer Aviation; Jet Speeds Bringing Many Problems," by Lt. Comdr. Robert J. Boylan, United States Naval Reserve, which was published by the North American Newspaper Alliance. It describes some of the activities of the Naval Aviation Matériel Center at Philadelphia, Pa.:

NAVY'S AVIATION MATÉRIEL CENTER'S RESEARCH PROMOTES SAFER AVIATION; JET SPEEDS BRINGING MANY PROBLEMS

(By Robert J. Boylan)

PHILADELPHIA, March 24.—A flat-chested Mae West? Sounds incredible, unlikely, and maybe heretical. But that's what the Navy is developing to replace the life preserver that proudly wore the name of Mae throughout World War II.

The 1951 Mae's flatter surfaces make for less bulk and easier movement and should be a handier preserver that does a better job of saving lives, particularly of wounded airmen. Its nylon netting not only reduces weight but produces a correct floating posture.

The new life preserver is only one of many developments coming out of the Navy's aviation matériel center here which devotes thousands of man hours a week to making aviation safer.

One of the problems the center's engineers are licking is crash helmets for pilots using the seat ejector. First the center did a lot of work on the ejector itself, which shoots a pilot out of a plane when the craft runs into trouble serious enough to make this necessary. Then they designed a crash helmet that could withstand the pressure that develops when a pilot is suddenly fired out of a plane skimming along at 500 or more miles per hour.

For this problem the Navy called on the United Carr Fastener Co. for help. The company, after extensive research with the center, came up with a special pull the dot fastener. Not only does this fastener keep a helmet on securely but under pressure it locks even tighter, thus saving many a pilot's head from being snapped off.

Many NAMC problems arose with the coming of near-sonic jet speeds. For instance, cockpit lighting and the exterior lighting of aircraft. In a jet plane booming along at speeds of 8 or 9 miles a minute a pilot has to be able to read his instruments fast and accurately. And when he sees an approaching plane in the night sky the closing speed is about a mile in 3 seconds, which doesn't give any chance for second guessing on an instrument reading or in sighting wing-tip lights.

For this huge and complex lighting problem the Navy has built its own stellarium in a corner of one of the large NAMC buildings. There a pilot is put into a cockpit, all other lights are turned out, leaving only the man, his instrument lights, simulated approaching aircraft, and a starlit sky.

He is shown a total of 15 aircraft approaching and leaving from various angles. It is up to the pilot to take proper moves to avoid a collision course. Pressing one lever records his recognition of the aircraft and a second lever records his actions, if any, to avoid collision.

So far NAMC has tested more than 300 pilots. As part of the test they are given an elaborate questionnaire designed to produce a pattern of answers rather than a subjective "yes" or "no." What the Navy wants to find out from the pilots is how difficult it is to read instruments at night and how hard it is to spot approaching aircraft.

One of the experiments works like this: A pilot is put into a darkened cockpit. A series of four instruments, located at 12, 3, 6, and 9 o'clock on a panel, flash on and off in a clockwise movement. After a few revolutions a pilot cannot tell which of the four instruments is lighted or which will be next to flash on. This proved to the NAMC engineers that a point of reference was necessary and that supplementary floodlighting should be installed in cockpits.

Many of the problems tossed to NAMC develop because of the constant feud between fuel and rubber—two items that always go together on aircraft. The center maintains a laboratory that devotes all its time to research and development of plastic and rubber products.

One of the products, usable where fuel and rubber come together, is a rubber diaphragm built up like a Dagwood sandwich: a layer of special synthetic rubber with excellent resistance to fuel; a nylon center and a nylon barrier to prevent seepage of fuel; and another layer of a synthetic rubber with a good resistance to low temperatures. Fuel has a tendency to extract from rubber the materials that make it resistant to it.

Also on the long list of successful NAMC accomplishments is a simple tab that may save many a pilot's life. Now part of a new oxygen mask, it prevents air from seeping in as a pilot's head is thrown back in using the ejection seat or in making a parachute jump. Old type masks without the tab slipped open just enough to cause death or serious injury from breathing rarefied air at high altitudes.

Waterproof clothing that "breathes" is another NAMC success. Pressure suits made of a rubber-coated cloth achieve this improvement. On a project such as this, engineers have as their ideal developing a cloth that simulates human skin and its ability to "breathe" through the pores.

The NAMC experts believe that in orlon they have found the most nearly perfect cloth for the suits. It seems to be best because it resists both mildew and sunlight. Nylon is stronger, they say, but doesn't have orlon's other qualities.

Many of the products mentioned were developed in the aeronautical medical equipment laboratory of the Naval Air Matériel Center, which was dedicated only 2 years ago. The laboratory has two divisions: Human engineering, which deals with the physiological phases of aeronautical medicine, and the development division, dealing with the study of scientific engineering problems relating to safety devices and protective equipment.

But the goal of both divisions and of the entire center can be summed up in two words: safer aviation.

Rudolph Halley, Chief Counsel of the Kefauver Committee

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. LOUIS B. HELLER
OF NEW YORK
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES
Wednesday, February 28, 1951

Mr. HELLER. Mr. Speaker, I want to take this opportunity to extend my sincerest wishes for a speedy recovery to my good friend Rudolph Halley, the chief counsel for the Senate Committee To Investigate Organized Crime. Halley has done a wonderful job in connection with the work of the Kefauver committee in helping to uncover the crime and gambling evils in this country. Millions of people have had the opportunity to watch him over television during the recent hearings in New York and Washington, and have come to respect and admire him for his ability and the manner in which he interrogated witnesses.

Hard-working, energetic Rudolph Halley is only 37 years old. He was born in Harrison, N. Y., on June 19, 1913, and received his preparatory education at Columbia University in New York, where he obtained a bachelor of arts degree in 1932 and a bachelor of laws degree in 1934. He was editor of the Columbia Law Review from 1932 to 1934, which denotes a significant honor and achievement. In 1935 he was admitted to the bar in New York and in 1946 he became a member of the District of Columbia bar.

Halley began his legal career as law secretary to the Honorable William Bondy, United States district judge for the southern district of New York, with whom he was associated from 1934 to 1937. He then became assistant United States attorney for the southern district of New York, in which capacity he served until 1942. When the Truman war investigating committee was established, he was named assistant counsel and in 1944 became the committee's chief counsel. In recent years he was associated with the law firm of Fulton, Walter & Halley in New York.

When the Kefauver committee undertook its crime investigations in the spring of 1950, Mr. Halley was appointed chief counsel, heading an investigative staff of 25 men. His working day often extended until 2 in the morning, he got along on 6 hours sleep, and was back on the job the next day full of his usual vitality. Men like Rudolph Halley are sorely needed now in Government service. I hope he will soon return, well and strengthened, to complete the task he has undertaken and in which he distinguished himself so much.

In conclusion, I want to insert in the RECORD a brief item on Rudolph Halley published in the April 2 issue of Life magazine. It is as follows:

HALLEY WAS A COMET ACROSS TV NETWORKS

As its main interrogator, the chief counsel for the Kefauver committee often had to draw unwilling testimony from men who, as policemen or prosecutors (O'Dwyer had been both), were themselves skilled at tenacious examination and verbal entrapment. Rudolph Halley's success at this was due to extraordinarily hard work, to his prodigious memory (he used no notes during the hearings), and to his ability—which showed brilliantly on television—to press question after relentless question in his flat, metallic voice.

Halley is a stocky, good-humored, 37-year-old New York lawyer, who has enormous energy and a respect for law and order as ingrained, if not as flamboyant, as Senator TOBEY'S. Born in Harrison, N. Y., he graduated from Columbia Law School at the age of 20, has since divided his time between Government work and a lucrative civil practice. During the 10 months of the Kefauver hearings he usually worked 16-hour days, 7-day weeks, compiled some 2,000,000 words of testimony and bested most of the major underworld figures in the United States. For this he would receive less than $7,000.

This week he could start writing his report. His boss wanted to end the hearings and begin drafting remedial legislation to curb some of the evils the committee had uncovered.

Sixteenth Annual Patriotic Award Dinner of the Decalogue Society of Lawyers of Chicago

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. SIDNEY R. YATES
OF ILLINOIS
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES
Wednesday, April 4, 1951

Mr. YATES. Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my remarks, I include two addresses delivered at the sixteenth annual patriotic award dinner given by the Decalogue Society of Lawyers of Chicago, Ill., on March 3, 1951. The society's Award of Merit for 1950 on that date was conferred upon Dr. Percy L. Julian.

The thought-provoking speeches reprinted below were given by Mr. Carl B. Sussman, president of the Decalogue Society of Lawyers, and Mr. Roy I. Levinson, past president:

ADDRESS OF WELCOME DELIVERED BY CARL B. SUSSMAN, PRESIDENT, THE DECALOGUE SOCIETY OF LAWYERS

Distinguished guests of the Decalogue Society of Lawyers, ladies, and gentlemen, in welcoming you on this festive occasion I do so in a solemn spirit. We live in uneasy times, when values we hold dear and precious are threatened from without in a measure civilization has not known before. It is good, however, that we, a free people, give constant testimony of our confidence and strength to defend a way of life and a system of government that made us, American citizens, outstanding among all nations on earth. And it is to celebrate the right to project our unity with the noble institutions of our country that the Decalogue Society of Lawyers rededicates itself tonight to a restatement of its principles and completeness with the American way of life.

It would seem that, today, secure in its achievements, its ever-growing abundance, this great land of ours would continue to persist unmolested, its moral leadership unchallenged and supreme.

Yet, such is not the case. The world is in a turmoil. Dark forces are at work to nullify our tremendous gains in the orderly forms of government and there is an endeavor abroad to repeal in substance concepts of civilization we cherish in our own land. Science has made tremendous strides; its accomplishments have added dignity and stature to the human being, and it has lifted crushing burdens from the brows of mankind. But that almost to no avail, for no permanent peace or security is yet in sight for the millions on all continents in the world. Is this, the atomic age, to go down in history as the beginning of another Dark Age? The challenge is urgent; the issues are clear.

We lawyers, members of a bar association, all descendants of immigrants who came here a generation or two ago, Americans all, are beneficiaries of a heritage left us by the founders of this country. Violence and deadly strife, untold sacrifices in blood and tears were conditions precedent that had to be met and overcome to establish at last in all its glories this great Republic, this model democracy. We pledge that this sacred legacy shall be inviolate in our keeping and no unclean hands shall trifle with our trust.

Jews are no longer a homeless people. After 20 centuries of wandering and exile our coreligionists are the proud citizens of the youngest Republic in the world. Yet the scars of yesterday are too fresh and deep to forget that prejudice and ignorance needs the vigilant ministrations of the decent people of the world.

Mankind shares the shame for the unspeakable decade that saw incinerators reduce human beings to dust and ashes and the excesses of that era have placed a lien upon the conscience of humanity to guarantee that the outrage never reoccur. We believe that this assurance and covenant extend and unconditionally include all those with sorrow laden, black or white, all minority groups whom the lash of prejudice and discrimination reduce to second-class citizenship.

We hold it vital to reiterate the truth that all men are created equal. That security from the enemy beyond our border is unsure if there lurks in our midst a contempt for a just application of the blessings of our Constitution. We believe that as lawyers we need exercise our special skills, talents, and learnings to defend the weak and to enlighten the confused. We hold that as a society we need be missionary in practicing what we preach. We need living demonstrations of the sincerity and the integrity of our profession of faith that democracy works.

Tonight, ladies and gentlemen, the Decalogue Society of Lawyers, in the spirit of true democracy, is giving you such a demonstration.

Conscious of the truth that the struggle for human liberty is ceaseless and exacting and that only in a just world will all peoples find justice for themselves, we seek to support such ideals which promote progress for all.

So this day, as in former years, we bestow an award of merit upon a citizen for distinguished service to humanity, believing that our award serves as an inspiration for the common good.

We are proud to salute in the person of our choice for the decalog award not only recognized achievement and proved merit but also a fellow American the son of a people who have yet to wrest their complete recognition from our laws and institutions. In this we pledge them and all minorities our unstinted aid in our march toward the brotherhood of man and the fatherhood of God.

ADDRESS OF ROY I. LEVINSON, PAST PRESIDENT OF THE DECALOGUE SOCIETY OF LAWYERS

Mr. President, distinguished guests, ladies, and gentlemen, with warmth and sincerity, the Decalogue Society of Lawyers tonight honors itself in presenting our award of merit to Dr. Percy L. Julian, as a recognition of his own preeminent talent and achievements and his invaluable service to our beloved country, and to humanity.

It is also a tribute of our admiration, gratitude, and respect for more than 15,000,000 Americans, whom Dr. Percy Julian so worthily represents. Their emancipation, humility, loyalty, and patriotism have profoundly influenced us. Their dignity and industry have served as an inspiration to free men everywhere.

In the world's history, never before was the future of so many nations, of so many continents, of so many individuals at home and abroad, so closely shrouded in dark clouds of uncertainty, pregnant with storm. As one looks around there is little light, save when dazzling flashes write a great interrogation on the murky background.

Whither are we drifting? Everywhere civilization is at the crossroads. Can this change and disaster which impends, be harnessed for the welfare of man, as the great soybean chemist has harnessed the forces of nature?

In the life and works of Dr. Julian will we not find answer to the eternal question: What of the future? Bright or dark? From his resistless philosophy why not look at the duty of us all, to one another, from the first stirring of civilization? What of the other man?

Look into your own mind.

As the wrought iron must be melted and tortured in the crucible of fire and flame and then pounded into its beautiful and useful shape, are not those people who have been tortured by the fires of hate and bigotry, and tempered by the process, the worthiest of consideration and admiration?

Dr. Percy Julian graduated at the head of his class at the Alabama State Normal College. He was a classmate of David E. Lilienthal at DePauw University, in Green Castle, Ind., where Dr. Julian slept in the attic of a fraternity house and waited on tables for his meals. At the end of the 4-year course he was Phi Beta Kappa orator and valedictorian of his class in 1920. The winner of several succeeding fellowships carried him through his courses at Harvard University.

His memorable research of the soybean began at the University of Vienna, where he won his doctor of science degree and returned to head the chemistry department at Howard University, where he had previously been a chemistry teacher. Then he gladly accepted the invitation of his old friend, Dean William M. Blanchard, to teach at his old alma mater—DePauw—where a laboratory was built for him. It was here at the DePauw laboratory, in 1933, that Dr. Julian launched the first original creative work in pure chemistry ever published by a Negro in the history of America.

An official of Glidden, a leading Chicago chemical company, heard of his discoveries and offered Dr. Julian a position as research director of their soybean division.

His first job there was to improve a sizing for paper and cold water. This he did, turning a $35,000 a year loss into a $135,000 annual profit.

The same soybean product is used in his Aero-Foam, the fire extinguisher. In the desperate days of our naval war in the Pacific Dr. Julian's soy protein has done and is doing its work against the enemy. They found it put a blanket—impenetrable to oxygen—over gasoline and oil fire, dousing them like magic. It was Aero-Foam, affectionately called bean soup in the Navy, that saved the lives of thousands of our sailors and airmen and many of our warships.

With long-talked-about wars, and rumors of wars, a grim reality and occurring with such frequency and mounting fury that they kill off the youth of each generation, the world has been forced to look to older men for more energy and manpower.

Dr. Julian's experiments with the soybean has produced unlimited quantities of synthetic testosterones (male hormones) which give old men the mental verve, the muscular vigor, and the virility to carry on in industry and at home.

Dr. Julian has a staff of 65 brilliant research chemists now under his direction, a melting pot of the genius of many races and creeds. He has patented over 40 important discoveries.

Most prominent of his synthetic bean products are: Fisostigmine, used in curing the eye disease, glaucoma; prostigmine, used as a postoperative and also in the treatment of paralysis; synthetic ephedrine, an element used in cold medicine; synthetic male and female hormones credited with saving the lives of countless unborn babies by protecting expectant mothers from miscarriage, and cortisone, a hormone compound which is making cure possible for thousands of arthritic sufferers.

Dr. Julian is now working hard on pregneen-olone to combat fatigue and amino acids for the treatment of infection and starvation, two new life-giving chemicals.

Dr. Percy L. Julian was selected Chicagoan of the year in 1950 by a city-wide poll conducted by Irv Kupcinet, columnist of the Chicago Sun-Times. In 1947 he received from the National Association for the Advancement of Colored People its Spingarn Medal award, and an honorary doctor of science from his alma mater, DePauw University. His accomplished and delightful wife is a research sociologist with a doctor of philosophy and Phi Beta Kappa from the University of Pennsylvania.

Does not the inspiring life of Doctor Julian confirm this old Hebrew Talmud philosophy? "As the grapes which are pressed the hardest, yield the sweetest wine, so this grandson of a slave we honor tonight is one of the most brilliant minds, one of the most compassionate hearts on the world's scene."

At the very time some scientists evolved the atom bomb, Dr. Julian, tranquil and calm, in the midst of life's frustrations and turmoil, worked realistically and sympathetically to save human lives and prolong them.

He has become an apostle of construction, rather than of destruction. We feel keenly his strength and high purpose, the integrity and ability with which he grapples with a succession of difficult problems. He never spares himself, whatever the issue. We know the depth of character and sincerity which motivate his every thought and word. But whither goes the world?

He has asked himself that question all his conscious years. He has read many books, some that men would call sacred. He has tried to understand anatomy, embryology, and chemistry, in the widest meanings of those terms. He has studied comparative religion and found comfort in his own and good in all the others.

I believe there is a great purpose running through all his strivings, which is more than of him. It is above him. The end to which his purpose moves may be hidden at times from mortal eyes, but the direction in which he has moved is not hidden, but clear.

His brain has been demonstrated a thing of marvel. The high thoughts and promptings of his, beam from spiritual lighthouses for the guidance of his earthly voyage.

He finds, in delving into books, and in his work in the research laboratories, that the one book and the one laboratory that contains the resistless truth is the human heart.

In the warm, palpitating book of the heart he has read that each of us had a desire inborn and instinct for beauty, a yearning to serve his fellows and to know the truth.

We honor one who has dug deep into the hidden meanings and implications of the spiritual longings for light.

Prejudice and truth are enemies. Truth, in life as in the laboratory, has no finer task than that which it duly performs: of destroying prejudice. Were I to distill Dr. Julian's philosophy from his life and works in one sentence, he has proved in the laboratory of life that, where prejudice is, truth is excluded, for no judgment where given in advance of known truth is either sound or safe.

So he has not only devoted long hours to his science but also has given unselfishly of himself and his funds to numerous civic and welfare organizations, for the betterment of human relations.

Currently he is a member of the advisory board of Mandel Clinic of Michael Reese Hospital, of Roosevelt College board of trustees, of the board of world service of the First Congregational Church of Oak Park, of the Chicago Council Against Racial and Religious Discrimination, of the Phoenix (Ariz.) Council for Civic Unity, where there is a public school named in his honor, and other organizations. Until his health demanded curtailment, Dr. Julian also was very active on the board of trustees of Provident Hospital, the Round Table of Christians and Jews, the Chicago Urban League, and the Chicago Welfare.

With this background the Decalogue Society of Lawyers is honored to present to you, Dr. Julian, its award of merit for the year 1950 for your distinguished service to your country as patriot and scientist; for your outstanding creative achievements in the interest of the common good; for the boon and blessings your scientific learning and discoveries have bestowed upon man; for your unparalleled devotion to the needs of humanity, the cause of decency, and the progress of free America.

Freewheeling Down Inflation Hill

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. HENDERSON L. LANHAM

OF GEORGIA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Wednesday, April 4, 1951

Mr. LANHAM. Mr. Speaker, with leave to extend my own remarks in the RECORD, I am inserting an editorial which appeared in the Christian Science Monitor on March 22, 1951, entitled "Freewheeling Down Inflation Hill."

Personally, I am alarmed at the present situation and the failure of the efforts of the administration to halt, or even slow to any great extent, the progress of inflation. It is just as dangerous to our American way of life and our freedom as the Russian threat. In fact, it is Stalin's belief that we cannot prevent a continuation of the present inflation and the disastrous depression that will follow if it is not soon controlled.

I urge that more drastic steps be taken immediately to halt the vicious spiral of wage and price increases. If the law is not at present strong enough to halt it, then by all means we should at once take steps to strengthen the law.

The present situation makes it clearer day by day, how right we were who urged that prices, wages, and rents be frozen at the pre-Korean level before inflation had had time to begin its fatal work. Again I warn the House of the danger and express my displeasure at the apparent apathy of its Members toward this menace that grows greater day by day.

The editorial follows:

FREEWHEELING DOWN INFLATION HILL

(By Joseph C. Harsch)

WASHINGTON.—Charles Wilson, Eric Johnston, and Mike DiSalle, the three men entrusted with the gigantic task of keeping the American economy on an even keel, have been reading the riot act through the corridors of Washington.

They have told every top member of the Truman administration from the President down that inflation pressures to date are nothing compared to those to come; that unless Congress will vote tougher controls and the administration will use those controls far more sternly than it has used the present temporary powers, we are in for a day of reckoning. If that day comes, they say, we will be jolted out of our present complacency so hard out teeth will rattle.

Here is their line of reasoning:

We have bad inflation already. Today the Army pays $7.85 for a pair of shoes which cost $4.15 before the war. The rise in costs of things the Government buys already has consumed the whole of the income from last year's new taxes. These are just two illustrations of where the inflation stands at the moment. Any housewife can add yards of examples to the list.

But there is little justification for this present degree of inflation. The Federal budget still is on a pay-as-we-go basis. There is a $3,000,000,000 cash surplus in this year's budget. Merchants' shelves are loaded with consumer goods. There are no shortages of consumer goods sufficient to justify such price increases.

The only important causes of our present inflation are: (a) speculation, (b) fear buying, and (c) purchasing practices of the armed services. Since Korea, commercial bank credits have gone up by $9,000,000,000. Most of this has gone into inventories—that is, speculation. The public has done a lot of fear buying. Defense contracts are awarded on a negotiated basis which amounts in effect to a cost plus 6 percent formula. The rise in wages and prices has been strongest in the defense industries.

Thus, in a period when reasons for inflation were relatively slight we have had massive inflation.

We are headed for a period when there will be real justification for inflation. Even if Congress votes stiff new taxes, there will be some deficit financing.

The time has been reached when the volume of defense contracts is expanding swiftly. The value of contracts awarded by the Army during the first 20 days of January exceeded the total of awards during the previous 6 months. The rate of contract awards by all armed services now has reached $5,000,000,000 a month. The rate is climbing. During the next year, the defense program will involve spending some $50,000,000,000 on capital goods.

The great question is how we are going to hold a line against those powerful inflation influences when we have done such a puny and ineffective job against minor inflation factors.

The problem facing the trio of our economy stabilizers is how to rouse both Congress and the administration to a realization of the dangers.

Right now the politicians seem more eager to please special interests than to protect the economy. The Department of Agriculture sympathizes with farmers who want the lid off farm products. The Department of Commerce sympathizes with the big profits for corporations. The Federal Reserve Board protects the freedom of banks to make commercial loans. The Department of Defense beats against every price or wage ceiling which tends to slow up defense orders.

A remark heard here more and more frequently these days is: "Bernie Baruch was right. We should have gone in for hard controls and a real wage and price freeze. We should have done it long ago."

But Congress has not been roused to any sense of urgency about economic matters. The departments of Government still tend to protect their special interests. The lobbies increase their pressures. The war contracts roll out. Rising prices make labor increasingly restive. There is no effective machinery to prevent angry disputes between labor and management.

We are freewheeling downhill. Messrs. Wilson, Johnston, and DiSalle see a blind corner ahead and shout for brakes.

The three who must carry the load hope we can avoid trouble, but suspect that it may take a jolt of sad experience. They have given their warning. Now it's up to Congress and the administration.

Send a Food Ship to India

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. EMANUEL CELLER

OF NEW YORK

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Wednesday, March 21, 1951

Mr. CELLER. Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my remarks, I include the following very compelling editorial which appeared in the April 2, 1951, issue of the New Leader magazine:

SEND INDIA A FOOD SHIP

The stark hand of a famine worse than India's has gripped the heart of Congress, a famine of pity and mercy. For the bill to send 1,000,000 tons of grain to India has been choked to death—even as countless Indians are daily dying of starvation—by a House Rules Committee clique.

The situation would have been deplorable enough had the bill come to the floor of Congress and been passed—it had been subjected to so much needless scrutiny that procrastination was beginning to produce a bad taste in the mouth of its proud beneficiary. Already, in fact, Peiping has agreed to barter 50,000 tons of rice in exchange for Indian products, and Moscow is almost certain to conclude a similar transaction. The propaganda value of these arrangements will far outweigh, of course, whatever expense Moscow and Peiping might incur, as anyone but a Dixiecrat or a midwestern Republican can see. The United States, to which has been transferred much of Asia's old resentment against British imperialism, will henceforth be all the more realistically caricatured as the conventional bloated and top-hatted Mr. Moneybags smugly contemplating a mountain of withered brown bodies. The expense to us for helping perpetuate this caricature will, in the end, vastly exceed the $190,000,000 it would have cost to send food grains to India.

This is so serious an issue that other means must be found to resolve it at once. It is useless to talk, as so many of us are, of making huge appropriations for "truth" campaigns when the truth is that we constantly undermine our prestige—even as we are seeking, by artificial means, to increase it—by substituting words for deeds, or by permitting deeds to contradict words. It may still be possible to recover a tithe of the standing we lost when the aid-to-India bill was lost in committee, but to do so will require action of an unusual sort, posthaste, on the part of the people themselves.

Since a congressional minority has succeeded in frustrating the will of Congress by a parliamentary maneuver, it is now up to the American people to demonstrate that this minority in no way represents their feeling toward the Indian people and that we are still a humanitarian Nation. This can be done, in a symbolic way at least, by raising through popular subscription sufficient funds to send to India as many shiploads of grain as can be managed. We fully realize that the quantity of grain which may thus reach India can scarcely alleviate the mass suffering there; but if one or more shiploads can be sent promptly, in the name of the American people, that may possibly undo some of the psychological damage that has been done.

We propose, concretely, that a committee of citizens representing all faiths, classes, parties, races, etc., be formed at once; that it be headed by a man of unquestioned humanitarianism and organizing ability; and that it launch a Nation-wide appeal for subscriptions to send a food ship to India. The New Leader hereby offers its own modest resources to the furtherance of this project. Are there any takers?

Filippo Mazzei, the Obstetrician of the American Revolution

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. EDWARD MARTIN

OF PENNSYLVANIA

IN THE SENATE OF THE UNITED STATES

Wednesday, April 4 (legislative day of Monday, March 26), 1951

Mr. MARTIN. Mr. President, Dr. Leopold S. Vaccaro, a consulting surgeon in Philadelphia, has written an article entitled "Filippo Mazzei, the Obstetrician of the American Revolution and the Defender of the Colonies Here and Abroad," which I ask unanimous consent to have printed in the Appendix of the RECORD.

There being no objection, the article was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

FILIPPO MAZZEI, THE OBSTETRICIAN OF THE AMERICAN REVOLUTION AND THE DEFENDER OF THE COLONIES HERE AND ABROAD

(By Leopold S. Vaccaro [1])

Filippo Mazzei is not so well known as his compatriots, Christopher Coumbus, John and Sebastian Cabot, Americus Vespucci, Verrazzano, and other illustrious sons of Italy who, working under foreign potentates, have given the world a new world. Our interest in this roving Florentine physician was stimulated following a recent visit to Monticello, the home of the pen of the Revolution, and Ash Lawn, the humble residence of James Monroe.

Our great admiration for Virginia has been well founded by such illustrious sons as Washington, the sword of the Revolution; Patrick Henry, the tongue of that stupendous historical event; James Madison, the father of the Constitution; James Monroe, who kept the foreign aggressors from our shores; and John Marshall, who, by his learning and understanding, raised the prestige of the Supreme Court to the highest peak in his 32 years of service on that high tribunal. However, we were very slightly familiar with Dr. Filippo Mazzei.

Between Monticello and Ash Lawn there is a hill named "colle," which is the Italian translation for hill. On this hill, Mazzei built a home, which, modernized, is now occupied by Stanley Woodward, our American Ambassador to Canada. When we decided to visit this shrine, four domestics tried to chase us from this private property, but we soon gained their confidence and were shown the place without further opposition. In his Memoirs, Dr. Mazzei states: [2] "Mr. Jefferson took me to the home of a man who owned a cabin and about 400 acres of land boarding on his own. * * * I decided to purchase this 'colle.' Mr. Jefferson's estate was adjacent to this property. He said he would give me a tract of 2,000 acres." Jefferson was then 32 years of age, Mazzei 43, and Monroe the junior of Jefferson. These three great personages in the history of the world signaled to one another from their respective hills when they did not visit each other. A bond of sincere and lasting friendship and affection existed among the three of them. In these critical days, when democracy, liberty, and the dignity of man are seriously menaced by militant communism, we are determined that these principles shall not perish from the face of the earth. Filippo Mazzei assisted at their birth in Virginia.

It is very strange indeed that Providence brought this great man to America. Again in his memoirs he states: [3] "I struck up a friendship with Franklin and through him with various other persons from the Colonies. One of these persons was Thomas Adams, who, being a close friend of Jefferson, made it possible for Mr. Jefferson and me to know a great deal about each other some years before we actually met."

While in London, Dr. Mazzei, in company with Franklin, ransacked the whole city looking for, of all things, the famous stove that Franklin had invented. It was in that metropolis that he formed some hopeful ideas about the North American Colonies. Once, in Virginia, he said: [4] "We lived in Jefferson's house pending the construction of my house. Jefferson understood the Italian language (Tuscan) very well, but had never heard it spoken. Nevertheless, he could converse with my men in their native tongue, and they were so pleased that I was deeply touched."

At Williamsburg, soon after his arrival, Mazzei had lunch with Jefferson. Washington dropped in during the afternoon. Although he never passed beyond a formal acquaintance with the father of what Mazzei came to call his adopted country, he enjoyed a lifelong friendship with Jefferson and was closely associated with two other young Virginians, James Madison and James Monroe. He gave John Adams, to his face, some rather needed lessons in the theory and practice of democracy.[5]

Before Mazzei had been in this country 8 months, he had become an active pamphleteer and was elected to a local office. He was proud to be called "after Jefferson, the best leader in the country." The following observations, published by Mazzei under the pseudonym "Furioso" in John Pinckney's Virginia Gazette during 1774–75,[6] illustrate his ideas:

"To attain our goal, it is necessary, my dear fellow-citizens, to discuss the natural rights of man, and the foundations of a free government. * * * All men are by nature equally free and independent. This equality is essential to the establishment of a free government. Every individual must be equal to every other in his natural rights. The division of society into the ranks has always been and will always continue to be a serious obstacle to the attainment of this end. I repeat that a truly republican form of government cannot exist except where all men, from the very rich to the very poor, are perfectly equal in their natural rights. Fortunately, we are free on this continent. * * * Now when certain privileges are exercised by a portion of the inhabitants and denied to others, it is vain to hope for the establishment of a liberal and permanent government, unless the favored citizens are willing to relinquish their privileges and stand on a footing of perfect equality with the rest of the inhabitants. Discrimination inevitably arouses envy and ill feeling. * * * Therefore, liberty will always be insecure and finally doomed to collapse. * * * Democracy, I mean representative democracy, which embraces all individuals in one simple body, without any distinction whatsoever, is certainly the only form of government under which a true and enduring liberty may be enjoyed. Unfortunately for mankind, this form of government has never existed. The sacred name of democracy has been abused by tumultuous governments built on false and unstable principles."

The reflective mind will discover, in these ideas expressed by Mazzei, the impact on the Declaration of Independence and the Constitution of the United States. He was the true obstetrician of the American Revolution.

Mazzei refers to one of the many conversations and disputations with Jefferson, which they must have carried on very frequently. He says: [7] "Jefferson was amazed at the defects of the English form of government when I pointed them out to him, saying that they had not even occurred to him. 'There are several reasons for that,' I said, 'Ever since childhood you have heard that it was the best possible type of government; you could see that it was such in comparison with other governments in Europe; you must have read English authors who proved that it is far better than that of the Roman Republic; finally, never dreaming of having to change it, you lacked the incentive to examine it in detail, except when provoked by the insolent way the English express themselves about other nations. They are 400 years behind the times. I have examined it carefully and have noted the essential defects I described to you.' It was agreed that I should write another article, bringing these defects to the attention of everyone."

These exchanges of ideas must have profoundly impressed Jefferson who later in his letters quoted England as a "harlot." [8] Dr. Mazzei, as a continental European and Italian, was always suspicious of England and her schemes. He was really responsible for the formation of volunteers in all counties to fight England. In defense of the Colonies, he states: [9]

"The most cunning policy adopted by the Cabinet of St. James to subjugate the Colonies was well known as one of divide et impera and to attack each separately. * * * To protect his position, the Governor of Virginia enforced the views of the Cabinet. * * * On my return to Monticello I communicated to Jefferson the information I had obtained from the Governor and expressed my opinion as to the probable cause of events. We agreed to announce through the newspapers the publication of a periodical by which we aimed to show the people the true state of affairs, and the necessity of preparing ourselves so as not to be caught unaware in case of attack. As I know the views of the Cabinet of the Court of St. James, and particularly of the persons involved, I was to write the articles in my native tongue, and he would translate them into English.

"Our warnings gave rise to the formation of companies of volunteers in all the counties which call themselves companies. Later, a meeting of the people's representatives was held under the name of conventions."

Filippo Mazzei was not only engaged in economics, history, and finances, but also in agriculture. As a matter of fact he introduced vines and crops in Virginia with his friend Bellini. A special corn called maize is an abbreviation of Mazzei. A lot could be written of Mazzei's contribution to agriculture in this country.

For a period he turned over his agricultural enterprise to his assistant, Bellini, and installed the first chair of modern languages at William and Mary College in Williamsburg, Va. He was eminently successful on the farm, in the shop, in the Council Chamber, in local politics, in newspaper writing and as a historian, which we will see later. He was one of the first to predict the coming struggle between England and the Colonies on the belief that each would not fight the other, and that each would therefore advance to positions from which there would be no escape but to fight, having learned the dangers of monetary inflation and of excessive radicalism.

While he was a sharp observer in 1788, during the French Revolution, he strove to keep that revolution close to the American model. Ciampini says: "Dr. Mazzei has assisted at two of the greatest revolutions of modern times." R. C. Garlick [10] writes of Mazzei as follows: "Mazzei has understood from the beginning the character and the importance of the French Revolution. * * *

During 3 years, two and three times a week he writes a lengthy letter to the King of Poland. Nothing escapes his sagacity, his attention, or his curiosity. He is not an inactive agent to register only what comes to him directly or indirectly. He chases after news, swift, and indefatigable, neglecting nothing. He searches above all for the cause and demonstrates more than the vivacity of a chronist the dignity and conscience of a historian. Since the first days he has understood the enormous importance for the present and for the future of what was happening before his eyes and had the sudden intuition of possible developments. And it was natural because he has assisted in another Revolution. He had known well Jefferson and Franklin. He had seen Washington in action. He had engaged in history, economics, finances, commerce, and agriculture. He had seen people and countries. He had been a politician and a planter—a man of the first order."

Who was this great Italian genius who assisted at the birth of the American Democracy and about whom so little has been written? The historic books on America are systematically numb regarding him. The following are some of the authentic data:[11]

Filippo Mazzei was born on a familiar day, one on which another immortal physician was born, Jesus Christ. It was on Christmas Day in 1730 when Mazzei was born at Poggio a Caiano, Florence. He studied medicine at the hospital of Santa Maria Nuova in Florence and from youth practiced his profession successfully.

In 1752 he visited Asia Minor with Dr. Salinas, and remained there until 1755. On March 3, 1756, he went to London, where he relinquished surgery and taught Italian. He was engaged in commerce and imported Italian products. It was in this city that he made the acquaintance of Benjamin Franklin and other prominent representatives of the North American Colonies, who induced him to form a company for the introduction in America of the silk worm, vines, and olives.

On September 2, 1773, Dr. Mazzei sailed from Leghorn and landed in Virginia toward the end of November. We have already mentioned how he was a guest at Jefferson's home for a certain period of time and how Jefferson was instrumental in the acquisition of land and the building of a residence for Mazzei on "Colle." We have mentioned how before the Revolution, under the pseudonym "Furioso" he was laying the foundation for that memorable explosion. Later on, with his good friend Jefferson, he joined a company of the militia in Albemarle County.

In 1779 Mazzei was sent by the State of Virginia as an agent to Europe to obtain a loan in gold and silver and to procure supplies in Italy for the Revolutionary soldiers. However, the ship whereon he was traveling was captured by English pirates. Mazzei knew he had been betrayed by his own captain, a Scotchman. Therefore he threw the portfolio which contains his credentials and instructions from the State of Virginia into the sea. After many vicissitudes he reached La Rochelle in France, but lacking credentials and money, he was unable to deal with the Government or private firms officially. He finally went to Italy, where he remained 2 years (1781 and 1782), residing in Tuscany. During this period, with articles and lectures, he advocated commercial relationships between Tuscany and America, but the Grand Duke of Tuscany, who ardently believed in the final victory of England, was irrevocably diffident to Mazzei.

Mazzei next returned to Paris where he became the champion of the American cause. Here he engaged in debates with the enemies of the American Colonies. In his Memoirs we find these excerpts: [12]

"Before I had been given my commission by the State of Virginia I heard there of a book by Abbot Raynal, which was creating great furore. * * * I deemed it proper to expose him * * * decided to publish in a single volume the refutation of both Abbot Raynal and Mably. * * *

"I consulted Jefferson on this project and he agreed. * * *

"In 4 weeks I had sketched about one-fourth of my Recherches Historiques et Politiques. As soon as I landed in Virginia in 1773, I began to learn about the history of my new country, beginning with the first European settlements. At that time my memory was very good. * * *

"Once back in Europe I refuted Mably's observations in all seriousness. * * * I added some notes which were intended to inform Europeans of things which I thought might not have come to their attention.

"After the establishment of the American Republic, many wished to see a complete and impartial description of that interesting country—and yet no one had written of it deserving to be taken seriously."

He again returned to Virginia in 178. giving Jefferson a minute account of what had happened. Again in 1785 he went to Europe and brilliantly defended the Colonies. He ably refuted the censure of the French writers against the American Constitution.[13] In this he was strongly backed by Jefferson who had succeeded Franklin as American Ambassador to France. He held many private conferences and exchanged ideas, and planned a very effective counteroffensive.

In 1788 he was commissioned by the King of Poland to deal with his affairs in the French capital. It was during this period that he deserved the fine tribute of R. C. Garlick in his book, Philip Mazzei, Friend of Jefferson, His Life and Letters, already alluded to.

Although in the service of the King of Poland, while in Paris he was active in spreading the knowledge of the American Revolution and the American ideals of his adopted country, as he states in his Memoirs. He was very well known to the French public men, having been presented to the French Court previously by Franklin.

With du Pont de Nemours he founded the famous Club of 1789 [14] made up of 32 persons, half of them members of the National Assembly, in opposition to the Club Jacobins. The Jacobins attempted to reduce everything to confusion. Each club had a foreign correspondent, and Mazzei was chosen as the foreign correspondent of the Club of 1789. The letters that Mazzei wrote to the King of Poland have been compiled by Raffaele Ciampini.[15]

In December 1791, Mazzei went to Warsaw and stayed until July 1792, returning to Italy and settling in Pisa. While in his retirement in Pisa his old friend Thomas Jefferson, who had by now become President of the United States, gave him another commission for the planning of Government buildings and the beautification of the Capital. Mazzei has this to say:

"I received a letter from the United States Superintendent of public buildings, in which, by order of President Jefferson, he requested me to find one or two sculptors to serve the United States in the erection of public buildings in the Capital, and especially the Capitol itself * * * to ask Canova whether he would undertake to make a statue of liberty in white marble, 7 feet high, in a sitting position; what the cost would be and when he would agree to deliver it." [16]

"I saw two Carrara sculptors, one named Andrei, 36 years of age; the other Franzoni, 28, highly skilled. * * *

"I remembered that a good marble quarry had been discovered not far from the Capital, and was convinced that Franzoni would be well able to make the statue in America.

"I wrote all of this to Jefferson. * * * I gave the letter to the sculptor and 2 years later Jefferson wrote me: 'The sculptors are here, well in health, well employed and greatly esteemed.'"

Having completed his work for his adopted country, Filippo Mazzei died in Pisa, Italy, on March 19, 1816. He requested that the date of his death be inserted at the end of his memoirs.

Jefferson never forgot his old friend, and on April 24, 1796 [17] he wrote the famous letter to Mazzei wherein Jefferson attacked the leading Federalists as having monarchist tendencies. Mazzei translated this letter and published it in an Italian paper. It was translated into French and then again retranslated into English by the French from the French text, reaching America where it was printed in May 1797, soon after the induction of Jefferson as Vice President of the United States.

It is worthy of note that during that political campaign, in which animosities reigned supreme, the spirit of Jefferson's original letter had been greatly changed to suit the purposes of the Federalists.

Dr. Mazzei was a most prolific writer of articles and pamphlets. He was a very eloquent public speaker and spoke all the Romance languages. He also mastered the English language. His monumental works are: Récherches Historiques e Politiques sur les Etats Unis de l'Amérique Septentrionale (four volumes, Paris, 1788) and Le Memorie della Vita e delle Peregrinazioni del fiorention Filippo Mazzei (Lugano, 1845-46, two volumes).

Mazzei was a profound student of the French prerevolutionary writers and thinkers, such as Molière, Boileau, La Fontine, and, particularly, Voltaire. During my visit at Monticello I saw the bust of Voltaire (Jean Francois Marie Arouett) and I have no doubt that the philosophic novels Zadis, Candide, L'Ingénue, Siècle de Louis XIV, Historie de Charles XII, and A. Sermon de Cinquante must have formed the library of Thomas Jefferson. I have no doubt that when these two intellectual giants, Mazzei and Jefferson, met either at Colle or at Monticello, that their discussions revolved on the ideas and the interpretation of the ideals significant of the Revolution: [18] That all men are born equal and are endowed with certain inalienable rights, such as life, and the pursuit of liberty and happiness; that the governments have been instituted so that men may reach these ends and that those who govern derive their power from the consent of the governed; and that when the government does not accomplish these ends, the people have a right to destroy it and replace it with another government. All discussions must have revolved on this doctrinal background. It was the thought of these two great men that the American Revolution was not only a reaction against the abusers of the English Government, not even a secession from it, but a revindication of the rights of men; an affirmation of the popular sovereignty—a regime of the people.

Hamilton and Adams did not have in mind such a democratic interpretation of the Revolution, and Mazzei did not hesitate to express his views freely to Adams to his face. From the ideas of the Revolution the United States was bound to lay the foundation of a new social political order of democracy.

These two sages had arrived at these conclusions, not only on theoretical grounds, but on profound historical reasons. They had a profound conviction of the capacity of the masses to govern themselves and the conviction that in the United States the historical conditions should be crystallized wherein a government by the people could be definitely established. It is quoted that Mazzei had said:

"Unfortunately for mankind, this form of government has never existed. The sacred name of democracy has been abused by the tumultuous governments built on false and unstable principles." [19]

This government was finally to be realized in the United States of America. We hope and pray that the principles established by the founding fathers after untold sacrifices and struggles, may become the torch of mankind for the establishment of free people and good will toward all men.

A Quiet, but Fruitful Easter Recess

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. EDWIN ARTHUR HALL
OF NEW YORK
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Thursday, March 22, 1951

Mr. EDWIN ARTHUR HALL. Mr. Speaker, it is sometimes lucky to be considered unimportant by newspapermen because you have a much wider latitude of activity than some goldfish they keep track of by watching him swim in a crystal bowl.

They long ago relegated me to the anonymous brigade when it came to embellishing one with unduly favorable comment.

Thus, during the Easter recess, I was at considerable advantage in my roving center strategy of visiting unnoticed through outlying counties which threaten to be part of the new congressional district now being fashioned for me by the boys from Knickerbocker.

My tour took me to places adjacent to but not included in my present bailiwick. I went to the east and the west of the great Hall fortress of Broome.

Thanks to my former secretary, Merlin Casterlin, I found the groundwork well laid. I paid calls on dozens of Americans in every walk of life but the political.

I was well received. It will be fun to go back, especially since a couple of large meetings are now being organized in my behalf at key centers, and there will be new opportunities to make friends.

Our people need help today more than ever before. The growing weight of top-heavy bureaucracy in Washington falls heavily on them because they must foot the bills which high-salaried, do-nothing Government appointees cost the taxpayers.

The folks back home are expected to pay the shot for every new batch of fifteen to twenty thousand dollar executives added to the swivel chair corps. This long list of fakers can be found among the pages of the Federal Register, an imposing volume because of its great length. The five-figure salary of each little giant appears opposite his name. Such a book affords laborious but interesting reading.

Of course, I told the truth and did not step out of cast, when I mentioned to the home folks my objections to the presence of so many well-paid fatcats on the Federal payroll. I insisted they do not earn their money, and the people I talked to agreed with me.

They added that it is futile to fight the handful of Commies who rule the Kremlin, if we are going to permit the building of the same type of Commissariat to supersede Congress they have in Moscow to grind down their millions of subjects. I should hate to see the American people meet any such fate.

But an equally noteworthy fight for freedom ought to be waged on the home front. Citizens of New York State should have the right to know what congressional districts they will vote in next year.

For instance, one loyal albeit newly made friend in the counties I visited demanded that I give him the green signal to start work in my behalf for the 1952 primary. The answer I made was unsatisfactory for I had to tell him I just did not know whether I would be running in his section or a hundred miles away.

My friend's enthusiasm did not die with that, however. He threatened to move into my home territory so he will be able to vote for me in 1952.

"That is most kind of you," I answered him, "but I can hold my own in Broome County because the Americans there far outnumber the Communists."

I suggested to him that he stay where he is, do what many others are offering to do, and organize "Keep HALL in Congress" clubs so we can fight off attacks of the fifth column no matter from whence they come.

Today's Challenge to Our Freedoms

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. EDWARD MARTIN
OF PENNSYLVANIA
IN THE SENATE OF THE UNITED STATES

Wednesday, April 4 (legislative day of Monday, March 26), 1951

Mr. MARTIN. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that there be printed in the Appendix of the RECORD an interesting address on the subject Today's Challenge to Our Freedoms, delivered by the senior Senator from South Dakota [Mr. MUNDT] before the Amen Corner Club of Pittsburgh last Saturday evening.

There being no objection, the address was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

TODAY'S CHALLENGE TO OUR FREEDOMS

(By Senator KARL E. MUNDT, of South Dakota)

Mr. Chairman, ladies and gentlemen, it is indeed a pleasure to address the business and professional leaders of the great American city of Pittsburgh. I have frequently, on past occasions, been privileged to address groups of your citizens, but tonight this great aggregation of civic leaders brings before me the greatest opportunity I have ever had in Pittsburgh to discuss the mutual problems which confront us all.

For nearly 20 years the areas of human freedom and the functions of free men throughout the world—with the sole exception of the Republic of Turkey—have been growing steadily and startlingly smaller. We in America are threatened by these same trends toward totalitarianism.

Tonight, I come before you to challenge you business, professional, and political leaders of western Pennsylvania to dedicate yourselves to the active defense of our free way of life with as much courage, as much conviction, and as much cash-on-the-barrelhead as the Communist conspirators within our midst are devoting to the defeat and betrayal of our peerless way of life and our free institutions.

In my capacity as acting chairman of the House committee that discovered the so-called pumpkin papers on the Maryland farm of Whittaker Chambers that led to the disclosure, indictment, conviction, and imprisonment of Alger Hiss, and in my long years of service on the House Committee on Un-American Activities, I have learned that the Communists in this country count upon the apathy and indifference of the good people of America to protect the treachery and indecency in which the Communists conspire. Were it not for the indifference and the actual, although usually inadvertent, cooperation and support of the American colony of private businessmen—especially in our larger corporate structures—communism in this country would have long ago been crushed and we would not today be reading of its successful conspiratorial operations through its combination with big-city criminal syndicates, through its infiltration of high Government positions, through its network of atomic and other espionage agents, and through its great host of front organizations, fellow travelers, breast-beating liberals, and just plain, ordinary, garden-variety intellectual suckers.

I have had many an actual and former Communist tell me that were it not for the financial and moral support—direct and indirect—that the Communists receive from sleepy-minded and careless capitalists, college presidents, religious leaders, and other patriotic "push-overs," who enjoy the benefits of private enterprise but never do anything effective to defend it, the American Communist conspiracy would today be inoperative and impotent. Instead, as all who dare to look can see, American communism is injecting its dupes and its advocates, today in this tragic era of history, into virtually every respectable activity in the field of education, religion, business, labor, and Government.

The Communists rely upon the easy-to-fool, the slow-to-alarm, and the it-can't-happen-here daydreamers who comprise easy targets in our respectable society to supply the protection, the indirect financial support, the respectable facades, and the motive power with which they operate to maintain the numerous cells of disloyal agents that they have in every State for the purpose of eventual sabotage and treachery and with immediate assignments to carry on attacks against religion, human decency, law enforcement, private enterprise, State's rights, and any educational or legislative program to expose and condemn the treacherous tyranny imbedded in the practices and purposes of every Communist. So successful has been their strategy and propaganda that you can count on the fingers of your hands the public-supported educational institutions in America today demonstrating the necessary courage to train their students specifically in the values and virtues of our economic and political system and exposing directly the consummate evil and wickedness in all that smacks of communism.

Communism is a Godless way of life that holds that the entire economic fabric of the country plus all of its social, political, educational, religious, fraternal, labor, and other organizations together with all media of information shall be controlled by a selected group of politicians in the Capital City of the land. These political overlords in turn permit no organized opposition and they associate themselves with like-minded people in other countries to operate a continuing international conspiracy aimed at the establishment of a world-wide Communist dictatorship operated out of Moscow, Russia.

Any on-the-ground study of communism today will find the Communists following the rule of controlling everything from what they term the "center" and every American Communist can be depended upon to support every conceivable move to concentrate additional power in Washington and to support every nondefense spending project by the Federal Government. Communists know from their world-wide experience that when non-Communist stage hands have set the stage sufficiently well with concentrated power and excessive tax demands in the hands of a small group of politicians in any country, they then have only to change the actors on the stage to actual Communists put there either by deception, infiltration, or a coups de tas of force or happen-chance to take over even so great a country as ours before 90 percent of the citizens know that the hour of decision is upon them. Thus it was done in Hungary and Czechoslovakia, and thus it can be done here unless a courageous and effective counterattack against communism and all its teachings and supporters can be developed out of the individual towns and cities of America. Our Republic is desperately crying for that type of leadership today in more than 2,500 important communities. Unless it comes to the colors of freedom, all of the agents of the FBI and all of the investigating committees of a dozen Congresses cannot save freedom for those who fail to rise to the defense of their own liberties.

In the United States, we have two great defense lines against communism which many European countries lacked, but they will not give us security against political tyranny unless we man them with courageous contenders and maintain them sufficiently strong so they can operate effectively. These defenses are provided by our American opportunity system of private ownership and by our unique political conception and tradition of State's rights which gives the Federal Government ("the center") only those authorities which are specifically delegated to it. I believe if we lose either of these defense positions, we shall inevitably also lose the other. Neither is strong enough alone to protect us in our cherished and matchless way of life. Both are under constant pitiless, and vicious attack by every Communist in the land and by every dupe or fellow traveler the Communists are able to confuse or to control. In recent years, both defense positions have frequently been deserted by fair-weather friends, or by ambitious politicians seeking temporary political preferment for themselves.

Courageous local leadership rising up from among our private citizens safeguard our freedoms against the Communist attack and the kindred creeds of centralized political power, State socialism, and pilot-plant nationalization which it supports.

In conclusion, let me suggest three possible courses of action which enlightened business and political leadership such as we have here tonight might well undertake right here in western Pennsylvania as a counterattack against the forces of collectivism which are threatening your homes, your businesses and your very way of life.

1. Those who support States rights and decry unnecessary encroachments of the Federal Government are today divided by completely artificial political lines. Thus many times southern Democrats and northern Republicans vote in concert more frequently and freely than do combinations made up of either southern and northern Democrats or urban and rural Republicans. Voters who either favor or oppose the all-powerful State should have an opportunity to join their forces in a presidential election. In my opinion, any political formula or realinement for achieving this would find the vast majority of Americans voting to strengthen rather than weaken both States' rights and private ownership. I commend to you your serious consideration of the tremendous barrier against collectivism in America which can be created if we demonstrate enough intelligence in the field of political engineering to bring about a working alliance between like-minded Americans so that they can vote for the same candidate for President regardless of the State or the area in which they live.

2. Local citizens in and out of patriotic and veterans' organizations should undertake a study of the basic needs of an educational system geared to meet the challenges of communism. In cooperation with patriotic and progressive educational leaders, educational programs should be developed which would (a) positively bar all Communists and their "kept companions" from teaching in a public institution—either grade school, secondary school, college or university; (b) provide factual courses to praise and perpetuate those things "Which are right with America" in the field of economics and politics and thus provide students with an understanding of what must be saved to stay free so they can withstand the lures of the Socialist and the Communist state; (c) provide equally factual courses showing specifically how communism and socialism operate to glorify and magnify the privileged politician and to minimize and degrade the importance of the common citizen.

3. Business and professional leaders—and their wives—should make certain that corporations in which they hold an ownership interest and that institutions which they endow or help to finance are neither directly or indirectly giving aid and comfort to the cause of communism. This is an individual, patriotic responsibility which every right-minded American citizen must assume. For a corporation to employ radio, television, motion picture, or advertising talent which is disloyal and which uses the money thus earned to advance the cause of communism is to help betray America as effectively as though a remittance order were being mailed directly to Stalin in the Kremlin. To endow a college or a cause without making sure that no part of that gift is being used—or can be used—to pay the salaries of those who would destroy the way of life that made possible the accumulated wealth making your gift possible is to imperil the freedom of us all in the same manner as a sentry who falls asleep at a post of duty.

Gentlemen, we have heard many times freedom is everybody's job. It is. And freedom is not free. Let us also remember, however, that security is also everybody's job in America in 1951 and unless we make the effort and pay the price, we in this Republic can quickly lose both our cherished freedoms and our security against the foreign forces of collectivism.

Disclosures of the Kefauver Crime Investigating Committee Should Provide Every American Citizen With Food for Thought

---

OF

HON. JAMES E. VAN ZANDT

OF PENNSYLVANIA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Wednesday, April 4, 1951

Mr. VAN ZANDT. Mr. Speaker, the recent hearings on organized crime conducted by the Kefauver committee were eagerly followed by the American people through the facilities of the press, radio, and television. It is conceded that no other public hearings were given such widespread coverage nor elicited such intense interest on the part of millions of American citizens. Radio and television programs were changed to permit carrying into American homes the shocking disclosures revealed through the testimony of witnesses as to the extent organized gambling has become a daily routine on the part of many citizens.

There have been millions of words printed in describing the testimony and newspapers and magazines have joined in exposing the workings of various forms of gambling enterprises that take an annual toll of millions of dollars from the gambling public.

The following thought-provoking editorial appeared in the March 31, 1951, issue of the Altoona (Pa.) Mirror, and since it is a timely discussion of the efforts of the Kefauver committee to awaken the American people I am inserting it at this point so that it may be read by my colleagues and all other citizens interested in curbing organized crime:

KEFAUVER LESSON

The really important disclosures of the Kefauver committee investigation should attract the attention of the average voter. The committee has shown a very definite connection between organized crime and corrupt political organizations which exert a great deal of power in our local, State, and National life.

We are asking our boys to stand fast in Korea. We have disrupted millions of lives and imposed a number of hardships on the youth of the land to protect our way of life, our Government. We have a duty to perform and that is to see to it that our Government on every level is worthy of the sacrifices we are asking them to make.

The committee investigations should make it clear to every thinking man and woman that big crime has its grass roots in almost every sizable American community. The only way to destroy objectionable plants effectively is to destroy the roots that feed them. That is where the average man can play a great part in helping rid America of this objectionable system of semigovernment that has had the effrontery to shove its way into the high places.

To stamp out this evil is going to require a great deal of courage and a great deal of thoughtful effort.

It is doubtful if some of the lesser lights in the vast organization that has spread its slimy tentacles across America and penetrated into the sacred places of American life have realized before now the part they were taking in helping to destroy our beloved Republic. It is extremely doubtful if the man who sells a numbers ticket thinks of himself as one who ranks with a Communist in helping to destroy America. The man who buys the ticket certainly would protest vehemently such an indictment. The greatest weapons the Communists have is not the atom bomb. It is capable of destroying cities and men, but it cannot destroy a people's faith in the fundamental principles of democracy. This slimy monster that has been exposed to full public view by the Kefauver committee can destroy that faith that is so essential to a government "of the people, by the people, for the people."

This power of aliens who have obtained their citizenship by fraud must be destroyed. The simple way to destroy it is to root it out in every local community where it has obtained a sinister foothold.

You and I probably have never given this much thought. Perhaps we, too, have been guilty of buying the tickets that are part and parcel of this great crime racket. If we are normally alert citizens, we probably know the names of those in each village and town where tickets are sold, of those who sell them, and of those who are supposed to head up the organization in the district. We also are aware of the fact that our local public officials who are charged with the responsibility of enforcing the law are not dumb, or deaf or blind, and it is reasonable to suppose that they, too, have heard of these things.

Knowing something by rumor and proving it in a court of law are, of course, two different shades of horse. However, we do believe that with due effort and vigilance something could be done to suppress the racket in every local community across the face of the land. It can be stopped and it must be stopped or how are we to face those whose blood has been shed, whose bodies have been crippled, and the parents, widows, and orphans of those who will not return?

It may be a little rough, as the youth of today express it, to make public examples of men who have given liberally to community efforts and who have been liberal with other worth-while enterprises.

It must be remembered, however, that they are being liberal with other people's money, just as some of their political brethren are liberal. The money they donate is but part of the take they get through their illegal enterprises. A larger part goes to the bosses in outside communities and is part of the fund they use to buy influence and, with that influence, jeopardize our American system of government.

We have a right as citizens to demand that our law-enforcement officers break up these gambling rings right here in Altoona and in Blair County. Yes, we have more than a right; we have a sacred duty to see that it is done. Maybe it would be but fair to give a little warning to those engaged in this type of business to tell them to get out of it and to go to work at some productive type of labor or to go to jail and work on the rock pile.

We must not put all the blame on our public officials, however, as each of us has an individual responsibility in good government. We can break up this vicious circle without outside help if we all refrain from buying the wares of the mobsters. What harm is there in the purchase of a 50-cent treasury ticket? What heartbreak is there for the widow of the slain policeman, murdered by a mobster in the hire of Murder, Inc.?

What harm is there in a bet on a horse? Who is being harmed except the bettor? What about the crooked wire, and the man who fixed it, the fixed race and the doped horse? What harm is there in a murder along a lonely stretch of road as three holdup men flee with ill-gotten gains? What power or powers confined that punishment to a term in prison for one man? Why have murder charges never been brought? What harm is there in gambling? Is it not one of the feeder roots on which these murderers have been drawing for nourishment?

The racket men say gambling is instinctive. They say it cannot be legislated out of existence. They do not say that gambling as it has been organized is no longer a simple game of chance and wits. They do not point with pride to the back rooms where the fix is made. They run like rats when the heat is on. Their racket is holding America and the American way of life up to public scorn. They are harming our standing with the other nations of the world at the time when we need the respect of the rest of our world.

Let us resolve now to tear up this evil vine that is strangling the Nation. Let us tear it out by the roots. Those that grow in Altoona and Blair County are our responsibility. Let them be destroyed.

What the Constitution Means to Me—Winning Essay in Illinois American Legion Contest

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. MELVIN PRICE

OF ILLINOIS

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Wednesday, April 4, 1951

Mr. PRICE. Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my remarks in the RECORD, I include herewith the winning oration written by Miss Barbara Miller, a resident of my congressional district at 1116 North Fifteenth Street, East St. Louis, Ill., in the Department of Illinois American Legion oratorical contest. Miss Miller, 17 years old and a student at St. Theresa's Academy in East St. Louis, was awarded a 4-year scholarship to the University of Illinois.

I feel that Miss Miller's oration, entitled "The Preamble and What the Constitution Means to Me," will be enthusiastically received. The oration follows:

THE PREAMBLE AND WHAT THE CONSTITUTION MEANS TO ME

I speak for my Constitution. I am only 16 and yet I can speak for my Constitution. I can speak of that heritage that my forefathers won for me by signing that memorable document on September 17, 1789. It was written on that day but it was fought and hoped for through years of struggle and strife.

Have you ever taken anything for granted? Like coming home to read your evening paper, or going to church on Sundays with your family. Everyone has at sometime or another. And yet there is one thing that is taken for granted above all else: Our freedom and the document that gives it to us, the Constitution of the United States of America.

Before I started to write this speech, the Constitution was just something I had studied in grade school. I had never really thought about it, perhaps, never really understood it. But now I realize it to be the foundation upon which the founding fathers built all the ideals that they so clearly set forth in the Preamble of the Constitution.

"We the people of the United States"—That's how it begins with the words that have included several billions of people. Little did these men who drew up my Constitution ever dream of how much freedom they have given so many people by so few words: "We the people of the United States."

And yet they were thinking of many others than themselves when they were doing all these things. They were thinking of the Pilgrims who started the whole affair. If they hadn't wanted a better place for their children to worship, they would never have left merry England. If they hadn't had this idea in mind they would never have made their perilous journey over the rough water of the mighty Atlantic. If they had not been thinking of others they would never have stayed on this completely unknown and unexplored continent. If it had not been for such brave men as Daniel Boone, Father Marquette, Lewis and Clark, Isaac Jogue, we would probably not be where we are today. You see, they were the men who went out deeper and deeper into this wilderness of ours, to search, to explore, to civilize, to convert.

"We the people of the United States"—But these are only the opening words of our Constitution. What of all the other phrases of our preamble?

"In order to form a more perfect union"—Men fought and died for this part of our Constitution. Yes; men fought and died at the Battles of Bunker Hill, Princeton, Brandywine. Other men fought during the Civil War at Bull Run, Gettysburg, and Richmond. Men are fighting now in Korea. Many men have had to sacrifice their lives to keep this statement true and alive, but because of their efforts, it still stands as a part of my Constitution.

"To establish justice"— Justice and peace was established by this document. It gave no taxation without representation, abolition of the slave market, and provided for amendment to this Constitution, some of which are known as our Bill of Rights. These 10 amendments are almost as important as the whole document itself, for they safeguard the rights of the people by securing the freedom of religion, of speech, of the person and of property. It also secured trial by jury, the right of petition, and the right of assembly. It reserved to the States all powers not delegated to the United States itself.

"To insure domestic tranquility"—

This new Government by the people, of the people, and for the people, foresaw into the future that there was needed something to keep its peoples at peace with themselves. This was done in article I, section 1, of our Constitution, which states that "All legislative powers shall be vested in a Congress, which shall be composed of a Senate and a House of Representatives." The people now had the power to elect their representatives, and through them pass all bills that would be for the common good of all the people. Also in the second article of our Bill of Rights, these words are phrased: "A well-regulated militia, being for the security of a free State, the right of the people to keep and to bear arms, shall not be infringed."

"To provide for the common defense"—Our safety and well-being was taken care of in article 1, section 8, in the powers granted to Congress. Some of these powers are: To raise and support armies, to provide and maintain a navy, to provide for calling forth of a militia, and to provide for organizing, arming, and disciplining this said militia.

"To promote the general welfare"— Have you stopped to think just what our country did for us when they signed this part of our document? They promised to promote our general welfare. How have they done this? They placed a tariff on all foreign trade to protect our own home manufacturing, they opened the Erie Canal to revolutionize the carrying trade by reducing the price of transportation of a ton of goods between Albany and New York, from $120 to $14. Then to prevent New York from securing all the traffic to the West, Pennsylvania built a system of canals from Philadelphia westward. Yes, our welfare was greatly taken care of by this document. It also states that the majority of the people do not rule. The minority have a voice in everything. This was apparent and made clear in the Civil War. The majority of the people thought that slavery was all right. But the minority came forth and the minority won the Civil War, thus proving that if the majority had won our welfare would have suffered.

"And to secure the blessings of liberty"—God looked down on our land, on our freedom, and our liberty and He must have repeated the words that seem to sum up all of this. The words of the book of Genesis: "And God looked down on all that He had created, and saw that it was good."

"To ourselves and our posterity"— This document promulgates the fact that it pertains to you. John Doe, a reporter who writes the news as he sees it; to you Reverend Dulin, as you preach a sermon that makes your whole congregation sit up and take notice; to you Mrs. Smith, as you put your daughter to sleep without fear or worry; to myself, for I know I shall never want for love or affection.

"Do ordain and establish"— We have now christened and proclaimed our heritage to be known and to be held in the hearts of men forever as the Constitution of the United States of America.

The preamble was finished. It was not only finished but my freedom, my heritage, now had its firm footing not only in the hearts of these few men, but in the hearts of all who call themselves free.

Yes; I speak for my Constitution. Even as such great men as George Washington, Alexander Hamilton, Benjamin Franklin, and all the others who put their expression of their democracy down into this document, I, too, have the power to express my deep feeling of pride and affection. I have a feeling of sharing, sharing in the greatest government this world has ever known.

And now when I stop and think of my Constitution, many things come to my mind. I can see Valley Forge, the ride of Paul Revere, the leadership of the great man, Washington, the solemn signing of this paper that begins—

"We, the people of the United States, in order to form a more perfect union, establish justice, insure domestic tranquility, provide for the common defense, promote the general welfare, and to secure the blessings of liberty to ourselves and our posterity, do ordain and establish this Constitution for the United States of America."

Yes; I speak for my Constitution. No, not I, it is my ideals that speak for me.

The Judge and His God

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. ALEXANDER WILEY

OF WISCONSIN

IN THE SENATE OF THE UNITED STATES

Thursday, April 5 (legislative day of Monday, March 26), 1951

Mr. WILEY. Mr. President, I have in my hands excerpts from a very fine address delivered by a very great jurist. These excerpts are from the talk given by Judge Harold R. Medina before the Church Club of New York, as reprinted in the Christian Science Monitor.

During the Eightieth Congress, as chairman of the Senate Judiciary Committee, it was my privilege to be instrumental in the nomination and confirmation of Judge Medina, after the names of other less-qualified attorneys had been submitted. I had always insisted that the Senate committee should not confirm any proposed judge unless he fulfilled the highest standards of ability, integrity, and devotion to the American system, and unless he had received prior clearance from the State Bar Association and the American bar. Other names were first submitted to us, but by insisting on the highest possible standards and by insisting on bar clearance—incidentally for the first time in such confirmation procedure—we finally secured the nomination of Judge Medina.

The judge's address, entitled "The Judge and His God," will, I believe, be of interest to all church-going Americans, I should like to read a few excerpts from the address, because in this critical period in the world's history it is well to know that men of his stature sit on the Federal bench of this great Nation.

We all remember the picture which was drawn in the press, of him presiding over the Communist trial. He says:

I found myself to be a small, indeed a very small and insignificant particle in the scheme of things. It has been an extraordinary experience.

Fortunately for me, I was taught to pray from so early a time that I cannot remember going to bed at night without saying my prayers.

* * * * *

I suddenly found myself in the midst of that trial of the Communists. It took me a long time to realize what they were trying to do to me. But as I got weaker and weaker and found the burden difficult to bear, I sought strength from the One Source that never fails.

Then he tells about the trial. Among other things, he says:

And I tell you, as I stand here, that my unguided will alone and such self-control as I possess were unequal to this test. If ever a man felt the presence of Someone beside him, strengthening his will and giving him aid and comfort, it was I on that day.

Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that the excerpts referred to be reprinted in the Appendix of the RECORD.

There being no objection, the excerpts were ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

THE JUDGE AND HIS GOD

(By Judge Harold R. Medina)

While there is much in the Bible about judges, I do not recall any occasion on which a judge has been called upon to discuss the impact of religion upon the performance of the judicial function. Perhaps this is because this is an intimate matter—thoughts about which one is likely to keep to one's self. In any event, I have chosen as my subject here tonight, "The Judge and His God."

I suppose I am a more or less typical American. From boyhood I have had an implicit and unquestioning faith, which I got when I attended the classes in the Episcopal Church at Ossining, N. Y., in preparation for my confirmation when I was a boy at preparatory school. Like most other people I know, I wanted to be a better Christian but, as I look back over the years, I find that I did comparatively little to put this wishful thinking into effect.

As a law student and as a lawyer, I fought hard for what I thought was right, and I had a deep and almost passionate interest in the rules of law and the history of their development. They were the tools of my trade and I worked hard with them.

It was not long after I became a judge that I began to feel a new sense of responsibility. It is something very difficult to explain. It was not simply that I wanted to be right and that I took my duties seriously. There came a feeling that everything I did, even the decision of nice questions of interpretation of mere rules of procedure, was in some way becoming a part of a huge fabric which on the whole was part and parcel of the moral law governing mankind and which must of necessity be divine origin.

As I passed upon the credibility of witnesses and as I wrote my opinions and formulated my judgments, I gradually came to realize that I was weaving my small part of this huge fabric; and I knew that I would not perform my task aright unless I was constantly mindful of the fact that all these matters, large and small, would be mere futility unless I tried to make each one fit into its proper place in the moral law which governed all.

Right here is the part that is difficult to explain. I was still reasoning as a lawyer. The fundamental principles of law were the same. I was still manipulating the techniques of my profession as before. But there was some subtle force, the impact of which was new to me, which was spiritual in quality. It was as though someone were always watching me and telling me to make very sure that my rulings and my decisions were fundamentally right and just.

You know we judges are the servants of the people, as are all Government officials in our particular type of democracy. But I think it will not be difficult for you to see from the things I have been telling you about that it didn't take me very long to perceive that we judges are the servants of someone else too.

Years ago I often heard Chief Judge Benjamin N. Cardozo, before he became an Associate Justice of the Supreme Court of the United States and while he was still chief judge of our New York State Court of Appeals speak about humility. He was, indeed, a humble man. One could not fail to observe that. But the full effect of what he had to say about humility was not felt by me until I was myself a judge, and found myself struggling with forces too great and too complicated for me to fathom. I saw in a new light the difficulties which beset one in the search for truth and justice.

This was particularly true when I suddenly found myself in the vortex of the trial of the Communists, in the midst of the play of great forces upon which, for all I know, the destiny of the human race may hang. Later it suddenly dawned upon me that some queer turn in the wheel of fate had singled me out, for the moment, to feel the impact of America's love of justice. And the result was what must be inevitable under the circumstances, that I found myself to be a small, indeed a very small, and insignificant particle in the scheme of things. It has been an extraordinary experience.

Fortunately for me, I was taught to pray from so early a time that I cannot remember going to bed at night without saying my prayers. * * *

As I mentioned, * * * I suddenly found myself in the midst of that trial of the Communists. It took me a long time to realize what they were trying to do to me. But as I got weaker and weaker, and found the burden difficult to bear, I sought strength from the one source that never fails.

Let me be specific. There came a time when, doubtless due to previous planning one of the defendants was on the stand and he refused to answer a question, pleading a supposed constitutional privilege which obviously had no application. I gave him time to consult with his counsel about it; I held the matter in abeyance overnight to make sure that I was making no misapplication of the law, and then the next day, Friday, June 3, of the year 1949, I sentenced him to prison for 30 days, unless he should sooner purge himself of contempt by answering the question.

Pandemonium broke loose. The other 10 defendants and their lawyers, and many of the spectators, rose to their feet; there was a great shouting and hullabaloo, and several of the defendants started toward the bench.

In all that excitement I felt just as calm as I do now when I speak to you; I did not raise my voice over the tone which you hear me use now; and I singled out several of those men, identified the language they were using, got it on the record, and sentenced each of them to imprisonment for the balance of the trial.

And I tell you, as I stand here, that my unguided will alone and such self-control as I possess were unequal to this test. If ever a man felt the presence of Someone beside him, strengthening his will and giving him aid and comfort, it was I on that day.

And so it was later and toward the end of August, when I finally left the courtroom one day and went to lie down, thinking that perhaps I should never go back. But, after 10 or 15 minutes, I was refreshed and I did go back; and I gained in strength from that moment on to the end.

Perhaps someone will think it wrong for me to tell you these things. But I could not come to this gathering prepared to discuss the ordinary platitudes, or to hold forth on philosophy or international affairs, about which I know nothing. It seemed better, particularly in these trying, difficult times, when each of us is worried, and each of us is troubled over this great country of ours that we love so well, to sound a note of comfort.

After all is said and done, it is not we who pull the strings; we are not the masters, but the servants of our Master's will; and it is well that we should know it to be so.

Gift by Hon. William Benton, of Connecticut, to the University of North Carolina

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. WILLIS SMITH

OF NORTH CAROLINA

IN THE SENATE OF THE UNITED STATES

Thursday, April 5 (legislative day of Monday, March 26), 1951

Mr. SMITH of North Carolina. Mr. President, the junior Senator from Connecticut [Mr. BENTON] has recently made a gift to the University of North Carolina which is referred to in a letter of appreciation from the President of the university, Gordon Gray, former Secretary of the Army, to Mr. Earle Gluck, of radio station WSCC, in Charlotte, N. C., dated March 31, 1951. A copy of the letter has come to my attention, and I ask unanimous consent that it be printed in the RECORD.

There being no objection, the letter was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

THE CONSOLIDATED UNIVERSITY
OF NORTH CAROLINA,
Chapel Hill, March 31, 1951.

Mr. EARLE GLUCK,
Radio Station WSOC,
Charlotte, N. C.

DEAR MR. GLUCK: Recently the University of North Carolina has received a gift from Senator WILLIAM BENTON, which I feel that all North Carolina broadcasters should know about. I am writing to you as president of the North Carolina Association of Broadcasters with the request that you inform your membership about Senator BENTON'S generosity, which will, I think, mean a great deal to broadcasting in the State, as well as to the University of North Carolina.

Senator BENTON'S gift to the university consists of a complete associated program service, which includes:

(a) Two thousand two hundred musical selections in the fields of popular light concert, concert, band, sacred music, and opera, and in the minor categories of Latin-American, Hawaiian, and hillbilly.

(b) Cabinets and other physical aids for efficient use of the service.

(c) A card index of all selections cataloged according to title and composer.

(d) Monthly releases of new recorded selections and continuity for 12 hours of programing each week.

(e) A special promotion and sales service.

For the service the university is paying a token amount of $15 monthly to the associated program service.

I know that the broadcasters of the State will be aware of the great value of this gift and, along with the university, would want me to express their collective gratitude to Senator BENTON.

Would you be good enough, through whatever means may be at your disposal, to communicate this information to the broadcasting community of our State.

Sincerely,

GORDON GRAY, President.

Famine in India

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. PAUL H. DOUGLAS

OF ILLINOIS

IN THE SENATE OF THE UNITED STATES

Thursday, April 5 (legislative day of Monday, March 26), 1951

Mr. DOUGLAS. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to have printed in the Appendix of the RECORD, an article entitled "While Human Beings Starve," by Anne O'Hare McCormick, which appeared in the New York Times and was reprinted as a public service by the International Latex Corp. in the Washington Post on April 5, 1951.

This article points out that the human problem of India's need for food must not be treated as a mere political issue if we are to save lives and gain friends in our moral battle with communism. In reprinting this article, the International Latex Corp. has again called to the attention of the American public some clear thinking on an issue of major importance to our country.

There being no objection, the article was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

WHILE HUMAN BEINGS STARVE

(By Anne O'Hare McCormick)

When Congress reconvenes today it will be under great pressure to get the India food bill out of cold storage, where it has been shelved for many weeks while famine draws nearer to millions of people in the drought-stricken provinces. It will soon be too late to save the population of the State of Bihar, where the ration is far below the reduced Indian norm of 9 ounces a day. This is not enough to sustain life for long; unless relief comes quickly, there will be widespread chaos, disease, and death.

The bill has been held up in the House Rules Committee on the issue of whether the 2,000,000 tons of grain India asks for shall be a gift or paid for in strategic raw materials. Actually India plans to buy for cash 4,000,000 tons this year, nearly half in the United States, but does not have dollars to pay for the additional supplies. Meantime, Communist China has offered to provide rice and corn for India, and Soviet Russia proposes to exchange wheat for jute. These are effective political gestures, designed to point the contrast between Communist governments and the niggardly attitude of the United States, but they will not feed the starving; the hard fact is that only this country has grain enough to do that.

MAKING THE SAME MISTAKE

President Truman made a second plea last week for immediate action. David E. Lilienthal, former head of the Atomic Energy Commission, who has recently returned from India, warned yesterday that the United States is beginning to make in India the same mistakes which paved the way for the Communist victory in China. "If a good many millions of Indians starve to death while our storehouses are bulging with grain," he said, "I don't believe that is going to lay the foundation for making us feel better about ourselves or making the Indians believe what we say we are."

India's policy on China has undoubtedly had much to do with congressional failure to report the relief bill out of committee. The President asked for authorization for the grant February 12. Bills were introduced into Congress with strong bipartisan support and were passed by the Senate Foreign Relations and House Foreign Affairs Committees by March 5. Since then nothing has been done. Congress will not take the responsibility of voting against the bill because such a vote is tantamount to a vote against the American tradition. The measure has wide popular backing, besides, despite the irritation Americans feel over India's refusal to support the UN and the United States fight in Korea by labeling Communist China an aggressor. But a good many Congressmen are like the four Republican Senators who opposed the bill in the Foreign Relations Committee. They are willing to leave India on the anxious seat while the lesson of the present crisis sinks in.

The Kashmir dispute also plays its part in hardening sentiment against India. On Saturday the UN Security Council adopted the latest of many formulas for solving the deadlock on this issue. Of all the knotty problems that disturb the peace in Asia, none has roused more passion than the conflict between India and Pakistan for possession of the fertile valleys and green forests of the beautiful land that lies between Afghanistan and Tibet. The UN has been trying for a peaceful settlement since 1948, and the present plan, sponsored by Britain and the United States, provides for another study on the scene and another effort to demilitarize the Province in preparation for a free and impartial plebiscite. But Prime Minister Nehru is not expected to be more receptive to the new proposals than to previous plans. He has a special feeling for the Vale of Kashmir, the homeland of his family, and has repeatedly declared that he will never surrender to Pakistan. His uncompromising attitude, together with Pakistan's campaign on this issue, has had considerable effect in Washington. It is not true, however, as has been charged, that if the two countries were on good terms Pakistan could supply India with the grain she needs. Floods have so damaged Pakistan's crops that the Government at Karachi announced last October that it was unable to export wheat anywhere.

A WAY TO LOSE A BATTLE

The point is that India's policy toward China or her feud with Pakistan over Kashmir is completely irrelevant to her desperate need of food or our obligation to use our surplus to save people from famine. India is a young and harassed nation learning that national independence is not merely a matter of throwing off foreign rule. The conflict over Kashmir adds to her dangers, but in her position next door to two pushing Communist empires she has to steer a dangerous course in any event, and if her ideas of how to save Asia were 10 times more opposed to ours than they are this divergence should not for a moment influence our action as a great power with the means and responsibility to deal with a great human emergency.

We have already deliberately lost a lot of time the Indian people will pay for—and the American people, too, if the hungry millions of Asia who have not yet succumbed to Communist promises are driven to choose bread instead of freedom. We have lost half the value of our aid in delay and questions and haggling over terms when we might have dramatized it in a swift and generous gesture. More, if we do not move so that the grain reaches India this spring, before it is too late to save lives, we shall have lost a great battle in a war that will be decided in the end on the moral front.

MY DEAR SENATOR CONNALLY: At the last regular meeting of our common council held March 22, 1951, a resolution was adopted wherein I was requested to write your committee, expressing the sentiments of the members of the council, and myself, concerning legislation now before Congress in regard to the St. Lawrence seaway project. This matter, we understand, will shortly come before your committee for hearings.

This is to inform you that not only at this time, but for some years previous, at the time of my former administration in 1946 and 1947, and even during the administration of my predecessor in office, we have strongly and consistently endorsed any and all legislation pertaining to the development of this most important project.

Knowing as I do that your committee has all the material facts before you for consideration, it would be presumptuous of me to attempt to inform you on any phase thereof. However, realizing the genuine interest the members of your committee have in assisting in any way you can to develop for the benefit of the greatest number of our citizens the wonderful natural resources of our great country, I am sure you will give most serious consideration to this all-important matter.

HON. RALPH E. FLANDERS OF VERMONT
IN THE SENATE OF THE UNITED STATES

Thursday, April 5 (legislative day of Monday, March 26), 1951

Mr. FLANDERS. Mr. President, when I came to the Senate four or more years ago I found an institution of which I had not heard, and which I have come to value very highly. It is the Wednesday morning breakfast of Senators who profess the Christian religion and wish to apply it to their duties in the Senate. A similar breakfast is held every Tuesday morning in the House. The two breakfasts have been stimulated by the International Council for Christian Leadership, which recently held its annual meeting. To that meeting the dowager Queen of the Netherlands, who styles herself Princess Wilhelmina of the Netherlands, sent a message. I ask unanimous consent that the message may be printed in the Appendix of the RECORD.

There being no objection, the message was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

Ladies and gentlemen, whenever our thoughts dwell upon the near future, it seems of vital importance to explore what lies at the bottom of all troubles. In this message I would like to express to you my thoughts about this future, which after all depends to a certain extent on ourselves in as far as we place ourselves under Christ's leadership.

When we read about Christ's teaching in the Gospel of St. John, not in a superficial and traditional way, but with our whole heart and soul, keen on solving this problem and in unconditional surrender to the living Christ and His teaching, we cannot but be deeply impressed by the sequence of His instructions therein, and its actuality so strikingly befitting these times of increasing danger for mankind. Because in the Gospel of St. John we find His program for this moment, setting the rules for the abolishment of discord and for the regeneration of man.

Christ first emphasizes love and brotherhood of a very high order and unbounded intensity; then He teaches unity between Him and God and us, and harmony amongst ourselves. And should this be fulfilled, He promises peace; not a peace ruled by man alone, not a peace standing by itself and with no other background than man made treaties and conditions, but a peace ruled by Christ through men reunited and renewed in Christ.

In the midst of an overpowering crisis in which the world finds itself today, this teaching stands out as an undeniable and inevitable truth; because at the very roots of this crisis we find primarily weakening of the spirit.

Every other reasoning, doctrine, or ideology, when faced with the truth of Christ's teaching, proves itself false; so let this truth dominate the world.

For it is clear that we are on the eve of a new era, a new world order, and if this is to be the better world we are all longing for, it never can be realized without Jesus Christ; on no other foundation as on His teaching can it rest.

A better world is not thinkable and cannot be built, before this spiritual foundation has been laid, before brotherhood and unison under Christ's leadership work effectively.

Only then His peace will flourish.

Now is the time for inspired men and women of all races, all classes, and all continents to start a world-wide effort in daring and unflinching faith for this purpose.

Surely all who are of good will can join and be ready to cooperate with us, as the better world under His leadership is a thing we can, we must, we shall make true.

Few as yet realize the magnitude of power which Christ bestowes on us in this very moment of supreme crisis, His rescuing power which He focusses on our present world, and is available to all who thirst for this living water.

An indication of this, one may find in the same inspired spiritual language used nowadays all over the world in speeches and publications dealing with the problems of mankind. This undoubtedly may be taken as proof of a renewed inspiration of the Holy Ghost, preparing the way for the oncoming unity amongst men.

That power to strive and work for a better world, Christ makes attainable to all who open themselves to Him. This need not only be in hours of prayer or meditation, but can just as well be carried out in daily life, by anyone who wants to stand for the undeniable truth of Christ and His teaching.

Those who have experienced something of this rescuing power, know the elevating joy and comforting bliss of participating in it; for those no obstacle exists any more, nor can anything stop their indomitable impetus, as they know that to strive for a better world, is the example set to mankind by Jesus Christ.

And, as we read in the Lord's Prayer: "Thy will be done," we know Christ's victory to be near. Now, and in this world.

Letter From Korea

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. S. J. CRUMPACKER, JR.
OF INDIANA
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES
Thursday, April 5, 1951

Mr. CRUMPACKER. Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my remarks in the RECORD, I wish to include the following article by Al Spiers, editor of the Michigan City (Ind.) News-Dispatch, under date of March 27, 1951:

YOU SEE, IT'S LIKE THIS

(By Al Spiers)

A letter came this morning from far-off Pusan, Korea. It's blunt and sometimes bitter. You may not like it.

But Corp. Walter R. Case, who wrote it, certainly intended the letter to be published. There are some things he wants the folks at home to know.

This is what he wrote:

"Myself and a few thousand other GI's would like to know the answers to several questions.

"The biggest question at present is just why we are over here. The Army has tried to answer that for some time now, but I have yet to hear anyone say he is convinced we ought to be fighting.

"The Korean people certainly are not glad to have us. I've seen that with my own eyes.

"You'll notice that I said the people, and not the politicians. After all, it's the people of the world who we are trying to satisfy, even though the scales show otherwise.

"Another good question is where will it all end, and to what advantage? Also, do the people back home realize how disgusted the reservists are at the quick shuffle they've gotten? I've never seen morale of troops so low before."

Why? Just read on:

"When we signed up after the last war we were led to believe we wouldn't be called until a national emergency existed. Most of us were called before the emergency was declared. To us, it was a kind of low blow, dealt by what we once called a democratic nation. It's rough to be lied to by your own Government.

"This may sound harsh, but it's not half as harsh as most of us feel."

There are other things piled atop this original bitterness that fan its flames. Like this:

"Why is it that our PX shelves are bare when the black market thrives to such an extent that the streets are lined with shops selling American cigarettes, candy, toilet articles, stationery, and every item of GI clothing—not used but brand new?

"Why is it that our engineer battalions have to drive trucks and equipment made in Japan when the Koreans use United States equipment and tear it up in a month?

"Why is it that British soldiers, from the nation which claims to have the best tailors in the world, are seen wearing GI field coats and carrying M-1 rifles as they stroll through the PX buying up our scarce items?

"Why, too, are Korean police, civilians, and soldiers wearing our GI uniform? How is an American soldier supposed to respect his uniform when it's being worn by everyone in the world?

"Why is it that British, Dutch, and other European legations are housed in imposing edifices when the nation that foots the bill for the whole show is in a dump by comparison?"

It just about all boils down to this: How is a man going to fight or give his all when he can't see anything worth while behind it? You try and answer these questions. We, the expendible GI's, can't.

"Should this be published, it would give the folks back home the true questions which are in every GI's mind who is over here in Korea."

I think we can answer Corporal Case's grim questions, but it will take courageous soul-searching and confession to find and speak the true answers.

Isn't practically everything that has embittered this soldier the product of nincompoops in Government and the military?

And aren't nincompoops in Government and the military the inevitable products of citizen neglect of the responsibilities that go hand-in-hand with the treasured privileges of our system?

Cozy, comfortable neglect of these deep responsibilities is a luxury that can scarcely be afforded in calm prosperous times. It is a deadly luxury when carried in today's grim, desperate era.

Let's write to Corporal Case. Let's honestly confess our guilt, but simultaneously tell him that a new spirit is beginning to flame at home in America today. It is a spirit that will not rest until we have driven the peanut politicians and nincompoops from places that produce the snafus which such grave, sacrificing men as Corporal Case must endure.

Let's tell him—and let's do it.

His address: Corp. Walter R. Case, ER, 45016051, Three Hundred and Seventy-eighth EUD, APO 59, care of postmaster, San Francisco, Calif.

A Student's View of War

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. WAYNE N. ASPINALL
OF COLORADO
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES
Thursday, April 5, 1951

Mr. ASPINALL. Mr. Speaker, I should like to call attention to a prize-winning editorial having significant value in these days of ever-increasing tensions and world crisis. I recommend the reading of this editorial not because it was written in some marble hall of a great newspaper of our time, but rather because it was written by a high-school student of today, a member of the generation which will take over control tomorrow. It is this future generation which must bear much of the impact of decisions which have been and are being made today. The Denver Post, of Denver, Colo., recently conducted a scholastic writing awards contest for Colorado students and this, a first-prize-winning editorial, was written for it by Miss Sally White, of the Palisade High School, in Palisade, Colo.

Miss White shows a mature evaluating ability as she writes down her thinking on the world in which she lives and the world in which her generation must find its place. For her and those of her age there has been little of normalcy, all too little time to see how the world might look if peace were a reality instead of an idealistic institution being used by an evil and expansionistic power as a propaganda weapon. I recommend the reading of her editorial, A Student's View of War, to the Members as a fine example of a fresh and inquiring mind undulled by years of battering against the indifferent wall of human opinion—an opinion far too often dedicated to the preservation of the status quo in which peoples have all too much of a material interest, and are all too often unimpressed by the need to move forward as new means arise for the solution of human problems.

The above-mentioned editorial follows:

A STUDENT'S VIEW OF WAR

We've just come in from telling them goodbye—my girl friend and I—her brother and his friend have left to join the paratroopers. It's strangely quiet in the house now, more quiet than I have ever known this house to be. But outside the world goes on about its business just as though a piece of peoples lives hadn't been lost. All over the United States, all over the world, families are kissing their loved ones goodbye. Sons, sweethearts, brothers, are leaving some to come back, some to stay to fight for freedom again.

We've lost quite a few even in our small town, and it doesn't seem right to us that the boys who only yesterday laughed with us, who danced with us at the last dance, so carefree and full of fun, still just kids, should be going away to learn how to use weapons which destroy mankind, to learn what it means to kill or be killed.

And it isn't right but there is more to it than losing a friend, a sweetheart, a companion or even a brother. We're losing a piece of dream, which I think is experienced by all the so-called little people all over the world. That 's the dream of peace and prosperity for everyone. I wasn't very old when the last war broke out, not old enough to realize just what it meant beyond the rationing of certain things I wanted and the fact that many of my relatives left for a long period of time. But I did truly believe the things they told us—that when the war was over there would be no more suffering and strife; that everyone would lead a happy normal life again. I know now this wasn't so.

Maybe I don't know much about war except the fact that it destroys the things that God put up on this earth. Maybe I don't know what starts wars but I do know this: it wasn't us, the youth of the world that got us into this new mess. (And I can't believe that the youth of Russia, of Korea, or of any other country relish the thought of sending their loved ones off to war any more than we do.) It was the political big-wigs, the heads of the countries. But it won't be those men who will pick up guns and go to the front lines; no, they will have to stay home and run rationing boards and decide what prices should go up and what must remain the same. No, it will be the youth of the world. We'll go, reluctantly some of us, but we won't admit it. Some of us only sit and wait till we're old enough to try to do our part. We'll go, we'll fight someone else's war and we'll do a good job; some of us won't come home, some that do will be maimed and crippled, but we will do a good job. Then I wonder, will the world settle down to try and live together peacefully, happily, or will we again see how many atom bombs and hydrogen bombs we can perfect to destroy more of humanity? Will our children's children and their children, too, have to fight the wars that a few start and millions pay for? Will this be their heritage? I can only pray to God that our generation will see a way out of this vicious, never-ending cycle? No normal couple would want to bring children into such a world as that for we would know then that the Bible adage that man will some day destroy himself is true.

Outside the water runs on and the world goes on about its business.

SALLY WHITE.

Setback for Housing

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. BRENT SPENCE
OF KENTUCKY
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Thursday, April 5, 1951

Mr. SPENCE. Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my remarks, I include the following editorial from the New York Times of March 18, 1951:

SETBACK FOR HOUSING

With the rejection by the House of Representatives of consideration of the Administration's defense housing bill this week the nation defense program is set back in its effort to assure decent housing and community facilities in areas affected by the development of defense production facilities and military installations. As Charles E. Wilson pointed out, "our production program can suffer serious and crippling delays" due to the lack of housing and community facilities.

To get any defense program under way it is necessary to act with dispatch to eliminate the known pitfalls that can mar its progress. The greatest of these is the lack of adequate housing and facilities such as streets, sewers, waterworks, schools and libraries. People who wish to make the sacrifice of moving to new areas in the interest of national defense are loath to do so unless decent housing and facilities are available to make their lives and the lives of their families livable in an alien area. As a prominent New York builder pointed out recently, there is no necessity to build potential slums to house defense workers when decently planned, livable communities can be built at much the same cost.

It is unrealistic to charge the bill with being a form of "creeping socialism" when experiences during the Second World War showed that in certain areas it will be necessary for the Federal Government to provide housing and community facilities if defense projects are to get under way in time to be of use to the national defense effort. It may be true that there are some "bugs" in the bill, but in the light of the country's present needs and the speed with which the bill was reported out of committee, H. R. 2988 was entitled to consideration and acceptance.

Results of Questionnaire Mailed to Citizens of First Congressional District of Iowa

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. THOMAS E. MARTIN
OF IOWA

Monday, April 2, 1951

Mr. MARTIN of Iowa. Mr. Speaker, on Saturday, February 24 I mailed 32,000 questionnaires to my congressional district. There were 56 questions based upon the President's four messages to the Eighty-second Congress on the State of the Union, economic report, budget, and taxation. I distributed the questionnaires to every fifth householder—both town and country—using rural directories for each county, and city directories for each city having them available. I sent the questionnaire also to all who have ordered farm bulletins the past 4 years and to the parents of all babies born in the First Congressional District during the past 4 years. No other names were added and none of the names on the above list was deleted. I wrote no letter to accompany the questionnaire except the statement printed on the questionnaire itself. After delivery of the questionnaire in the district we received special requests for approximately 50 questionnaires and we mailed these additional copies when requested. The post offices returned about 2,200 questionnaires that could not be delivered to the addressees.

In response to the 29,800 questionnaires delivered we have received up to and including April 2, 1951, a total of 3,465 replies. Replies are still coming in at a fair rate, but inasmuch as the ratio between yes and no answers has remained constant from the time we passed the 2,000 mark I have decided to present the summary of returns without waiting for the complete response. The return of 11.6 percent to date is very gratifying as the percentage of returns is already considerably higher than Dr. George Gallup's estimate of total expected returns from such a mailing.

I placed a space on the questionnaire for the person answering it to indicate his occupation, and I am gratified with the listing of occupations by 3,312 of the 3,465 who answered the questionnaire. The occupations listed were as follows:

Farmer	982
Business	592
Professional	661
Labor	798
Housewife	223
Student	56

We have received more than 2,000 special letters with the answered questionnaires and the discussions in these letters are very interesting and informative.

The replies have been rather evenly spread throughout the past 5 weeks, and in my opinion they reflect rather accurately the thinking of the people of the First Congressional District during the month of March 1951. On some of these questions changes in world-wide or domestic events can and will, of course, affect the opinions of those who have replied, but the true grass roots opinions as reflected in the following report are of special value just now when the first session of the Eighty-second Congress is entering the period of final consideration of many of these issues:

Famine in India

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. HERBERT H. LEHMAN
OF NEW YORK
IN THE SENATE OF THE UNITED STATES

Thursday, April 5 (legislative day of Monday, March 26), 1951

Mr. LEHMAN. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to have printed in the the Appendix of the RECORD, a very excellent and timely editorial entitled "While Famine Stalks," which appeared in the Washington Post this morning.

There being no objection, the editorial was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

WHILE FAMINE STALKS

It is not pretty to watch Congress dawdle while the specter of famine hovers over India. Even if legislators act with all possible speed to approve the bill giving India 2,000,000 tons of grain, it will be a close race. The grain must be sent to ports, and ships must be broken out of storage; it has been impossible to keep them ready on a standby basis. Yet, unless grain is in Indian hands by June, a breakdown in the rationing system is likely; already the people are on a 9-ounce minimum ration, and even this is not available in some areas. President Truman, in his request to Congress in February, put April 1 as the deadline for delivery of the first million tons.

The depressing part of the affair is that it has become confused with all sorts of side issues. First, objections were cited to Prime Minister Nehru's attitude on Korea; then there was talk of making the grain a loan, although India is in no shape to repay it; then India's embargo on certain strategic materials—monazite and beryl—became a stumbling block. This newspaper believes, as respects the latter point, that the American position on access to strategic materials ought to be made quite plain. But none of these factors is reason to deny or delay the grain. It is not in the American tradition, when a stricken person asks for food, to demand to know first how he voted in the last election.

As the Washington Federation of Churches has pointed out in a letter to Speaker RAYBURN, indifference to starvation is "an evil not to be tolerated by Christian conscience." Help now would be "a merciful weapon in our struggle against communism" and would "do much to heal the widening rift between this country and India." Yet while Congress dallies, Russia has made propaganda by offering to sell India 50,000 tons of wheat, and Communist China—itself faced with starvation in many areas—has capitalized on the American delay by offering a million tons of rice. They are doubtless phony offers, both of them; but they make good propaganda, and are pathetic illustrations of India's desperation.

There is reason to believe that the House Rules Committee, which has been sitting on the bill, will report it out when Speaker RAYBURN believes he has the votes to pass it. The test cannot be put off longer, and we cannot believe that if the issue is placed squarely before House Members, they will turn it down. This country would be harmed as much as India if Congress should turn its back on both a moral obligation to humanity and the opportunity to strike a blow in behalf of stability in India.

"Crum-Bums"

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. FRANK M. KARSTEN
OF MISSOURI
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Thursday, April 5, 1951

Mr. KARSTEN of Missouri. Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my remarks in the RECORD, I include the following editorial from the March issue of the bulletin of the St. Louis Medical Society:

"CRUM-BUMS"

The daily press is reporting, with increasing frequency, the incidence of narcotic addiction among mere children. To find a name for a character so contemptible that he would peddle dope to kids we must turn to the lexicon of the kids. To them, the lowest form of human life is a "crum-bum." Much worse than an ordinary bum, more despicable than any other type of crook, much more dangerous than the small-time hoodlum—the narcotic peddler who trafficks with the teen-ager is the worst "crum-bum" of the lot. His rank in the genus homo is comparable only to that of the slimy, crawling things that inhabit the undersurface of rocks in the remainder of the animal world. A creature so completely bankrupt of moral principles that he would encourage narcotic addiction in children, to the end that they must steal, lie, cheat, and prostitute themselves in order to purchase the stuff, has sacrificed his right to live among decent people.

What place does this diatribe have in a medical publication, you ask? Simply this: Only the doctor knows, better than anyone, the mental and physical agony that the addict endures. The doctor has seen, more than anyone else, the abject misery and the stripping-away of conscience, virtue, morality, and standards of human relationships engendered by the craving for narcotics. It is fitting and proper, therefore, that the physician—who bears the same responsibility to community health that the lawyer does to community law and order—raise his voice in protest against this horrible and revolting development in our modern society.

We quote a headline from a recent newspaper story: "Couple gets 5 years for dope peddling." Five years. And they may be free in 2, or 2½, or 3 years. Free to go back to where they cached the $270,000 they made in 6 months selling heroin. What "crum-bum"—or for that matter, a higher order of bum—would not be willing to spend 3 or even 5 years in the pokey for that kind of money? The same edition stated that Al Capone's brother faced 16 years for tax evasion; a writer of rubber checks was sentenced to 6 years in another story in the same edition. But for a couple who had murdered the souls and minds and futures of kids; who had helped rob them of the opportunity to grow into healthy, happy, ambitious citizens of a community where they could walk proudly with their fellows—5 years.

This is in no sense an indictment of the judge who pronounced sentence, for—again we quote—this was "the maximum time the court could impose." If 5 years constitute the maximum time that a judge is permitted to put away these termites of our social structure, then it is high time that the lawmakers reexamine relative values. If spies, saboteurs, and other traitors to our country can be given life sentences, then those who would sabotage the children upon whom the Nation's future depends should be given life sentences. If a murderer can be given the electric chair, then those who would create thieves, murderers, and prostitutes deserve no less. Something drastic should be done to protect these kids.

Let Them Find Sites Less Sacred

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. HOMER D. ANGELL
OF OREGON
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Thursday, April 5, 1951

Mr. ANGELL. Mr. Speaker, on leave to extend my remarks, I include the significant editorial written by Arthur L. Crookham, which appeared in the Oregon Journal on March 18, 1951, entitled "Let Them Find Sites Less Sacred," on the proposal in carrying out the dispersal program to select as one of the sites the Civil War battlefield, Bull Run:

LET THEM FIND SITES LESS SACRED

Looks to us as if the third battle of Bull Run is shaping up.

What do you mean, third battle?

Well, in Washington, a committee of Congress is considering erecting one of the proposed dispersed Government office buildings on the magnificent Civil War battlefield, where not one, but two bitter engagements were fought at the outskirts of the National Capital.

Of course, the land is owned by the Government—which means a saving in costs. To this beautifully landscaped area tens of thousands of visitors go each year to see the first great battlefield of the Civil War, where Thomas Jonathan Jackson won the name of Stonewall and where a few months later the braggart Union General Pope was defeated by Longstreet and the self-same Stonewall. It seems that the 1,600-acre tract has caught the congressional eye since it is 28 miles from the White House, nicely outside the range of any A-bomb that might demolish the White House.

What do we mean by third battle of Bull Run? Well, before this national shrine is torn up by bull dozers for some unsightly office building, a lot of fireworks will be shot off by students of the Civil War, historians, and antiquarians. There must be plenty of land in other directions from Washington available for such a building.

Once we start digging up long-preserved national parks for man-made structures, who will say when to stop? We're a-getting out our musket and we'll be tenting tonight at Bull Run. Look out, you Congressmen. History tells us a lot of your fellow Members ran away from their sightseeing at first Bull Run. History can repeat.

The Political Parade

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. KATHARINE ST. GEORGE
OF NEW YORK
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES
Thursday, April 5, 1951

Mrs. ST. GEORGE. Mr. Speaker, under unanimous consent to extend my remarks in the Appendix of the RECORD, I include an article by George Rothwell Brown, which could well be entitled "When You Cannot Justify Your Position in an Argument, Walk Out On It":

THE POLITICAL PARADE

(By George Rothwell Brown)

The great debate, involving the integrity of the Constitution from Presidential encroachment, and the defense of the country in possible war with Communist Russia, was brought to a tragic conclusion before packed galleries, and row upon row of empty Senate seats.

In view of the basic fundamental issues involved, the attempted usurpation by President Truman of congressional control of the armed services of the Union, and the hazardous adventure in sending inadequate ground forces to Western Europe, this discussion in the Senate took place in the face of a shameful Democratic absenteeism.

The debate was boycotted by virtually the whole Democratic side of the Senate.

On the afternoon upon which Senator FERGUSON, of Michigan, made an analysis of remarkable forcefulness of the constitutional power of Congress to determine how and when an Army of the United States might be employed, for several hours the entire Democratic side of the Senate was empty.

Senator CONNALLY, of Texas, chairman of the Foreign Relations Committee, whose mind was already made up, for a little while sat alone amidst a sea of vacant Democratic seats.

There was a look of contemptuous boredom on his face.

The speeches that were being made on the Republican side, the cross-fire of interrogations which brought out the facts, went in one CONNALLY ear and out the other.

He made no attempt to participate in the argument, but as silent as a clam in its shell scorned to answer any of the statements by the opposition, which completely riddled President Truman's impudent assumption of dictatorial powers, as Commander in Chief, the Constitution to the contrary notwithstanding.

Presently even Chairman CONNALLY got up and walked out of the Chamber, leaving a committee clerk at the adjacent desk.

For quite some time this lone individual was the only person on the Democratic side of the Senate.

Why was this great debate—in view of the consequences for weal or woe of the headstrong Truman-Acheson-Marshall policies perhaps the most important to have been heard in the Senate since the Civil War—deliberately boycotted by the Democratic leadership?

It was apparent as Republican crossfire ruthlessly exposed Truman's attempt to seize a power denied him by the Constitution of the United States, that the Democrats could not answer the constitutional arguments of the opposition.

They could not deny. They would not listen.

The Truman Democrats had no facts—all they had was the votes to jam through a couple of resolutions, having no force in law, and merely begging the President to consult Congress in any future use of troops in Europe, beyond the four extra divisions which are to be sent with the virtual unanimous consent of Congress.

But the votes the majority leaders calculated upon having were admittedly barely enough to win a victory for the Presidency at the expense of Congress and the Constitution.

In the voting to take place this week, the margin would almost certainly be slim, one way or another.

The outcome would depend in part upon how many independent conservative Democrats would vote to send the pending resolutions back to committee to be redrafted in the form of a "joint resolution," which would require action by the House of Representatives.

It would depend in part also upon how many New Deal Republicans would desert their party, and sacrifice on the altar of Roosevelt-Truman internationalism, the constitutional safeguards against Executive usurpation bequeathed to the American people by the founders of the Republic.

It was Easter time. Day after day the Senate galleries were packed with American men and women.

How disillusioned they must have been.

On one side of the magnificent new Senate Chamber WHERRY, TAFT, BRICKER, KEM, WATKINS, DIRKSEN, valiantly defending the ancient rights of Congress.

On the other a vast expanse of empty seats, expressive of the utter contempt in which the Democrats, with a few splendid exceptions, like BYRD, of Virginia, and MCCLELLAN, of Arkansas, held the whole great debate.

Dispersion Boys Seek a Site

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. HOMER D. ANGELL
OF OREGON
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES
Thursday, April 5, 1951

Mr. ANGELL. Mr. Speaker, on leave to extend my remarks, I include an interesting editorial written by Royce Brier entitled "Dispersion Boys Seek a Site," which appeared in the San Francisco Chronicle, March 8, 1951:

DISPERSION BOYS SEEK A SITE

(By Royce Brier)

At the various important battlefields of the Civil War national parks have long been established. They are strewn with bronze markers set up by a historical society, naming formations and describing the action, and with monuments erected by States and patriotic organizations, North and South.

Cemeteries are also situated in the parks (it was a cemetery dedication which occasioned the Gettysburg Address). Millions of Americans visit these battlefields annually, studying the battles or seeking their family names, which are often to be found, a granite immortality for some boy of eighteen. Among the favorites are, of course, Gettysburg and Bull Run, scene of the small first battle, July 21, 1861, and a big battle a year later. It is but 25 miles from Washington.

There is a plan to disperse Government buildings due to the atom-bomb hazard. The planners are looking around for sites not too far from Washington, and have their eyes on some of the battlefield parks. They might save a few million bucks that way.

The Washington Post last week described one of these exploration trips. A House Public Works Subcommittee went out to Bull Run, and members indicated they were impressed with its possibilities as a building site. As you shall see, it isn't the first time Congressmen have sashayed out to Bull Run, and if you'll tolerate a prejudice, this second visit is as dubious as the first.

Efficiency is splendid and Government thrift is admirable, but it is possible to go overboard. One of the tendencies of our day is to wonder if the national shrines and parks cannot be put to some more utilitarian use. No doubt there are gents in crowded Washington who would set up a clerical section in Mount Vernon if they could get away with it.

The weeks of July were hot and nerve wracking in the rolling land of Virginia. Beauregard, the elegant and learned fellow who had fired on Sumter, was sent to command a rag-tag army of fire-eaters assembling north of Richmond to protect that new capital of the Confederacy.

Lincoln was trying to get together a ragtag army of greenhorns (excepting a small nucleus of Regulars) to protect Washington from seizure, which would be almost fatal to the Union at that juncture—the Europeans had their tongues hanging out for it. A Brig. Gen. Irvin McDowell commanded this force under Fuss and Feathers Scott, who was too old and fat to get into the field. Good man in his day, though.

Beauregard showed some of the traits later displayed by McClellan, one overestimating his enemy. He insisted McDowell had a magnificent fifty thousand, whereas McDowell had thirty thousand, and thousands had never heard a musket go bang.

So McDowell moved out from Arlington. It was the biggest army ever seen in America; its ubiquity awed Congressmen and other Washington red-hots, who drove out in carriages of a Sunday morning to see the rebels trounced and brought back tied up with ropes. Boy, it was a day.

So the battle began about 10 a. m. Some of the best generalship and some of the worst was displayed in the next few hours of dust and heat. The Confederate General Bee said: "There stands Jackson like a stone wall." Colonel Sherman was there, but not Colonel Grant. Neither McDowell nor Beauregard knew what went on or what to do. Each got but 18,000 of their roughly 30,000 troops into combat.

Late in the afternoon Beauregard and the rest of them thought they were licked. Their luck was McDowell and his men also decided they'd had it, and did something about it. They disengaged, brigade by brigade, and it went from retreat, to rout, to panic. The Congressmen and other sightseers got mixed in this fantastic melee, and pushed into the ditches. Beauregard didn't pursue. He and Jeff Davis had a big row about it afterward. Jeff Davis never captured Washington, and he might have Monday.

One cannot describe this first disaster to the northern arms in such stunning terms as it has been described:

"The defeated troops commenced pouring into Washington over the Long Bridge * * * The sun rises, but shines not * * * The men appear, they come in disorderly mobs, queer looking objects, strange eyes and faces, drenched and fearfully worn, hungry, haggard, blistered in the feet * * * Amid the deep excitement, crowds and motion, and desperate eagerness, it seems strange to see many, very many, of the soldiers sleeping—in the midst of all sleeping. They drop down anywhere, on the steps of houses, on the sidewalk, and deeply sleep * * * some in squads, comrades, brothers, close together—and on them as they lay, sulkily drips the rain * * * The hour, the day, the night passed, and whatever returns, an hour, a day, a night like that can never return again."

Those are the words of Walt Whitman, who was there, and to air a prejudice a little further, it would seem that when an hour, a day, a night can never return to America it would be well to leave the field where that travail began as it is, for quiet and memory, and not plaster it with neo-Greek architecture and octopi motor-parks.

Pacific Coast Shipbuilding, a Low Ebb

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. JOHN J. ALLEN, JR.
OF CALIFORNIA
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES
Thursday, April 5, 1951

Mr. ALLEN of California. Mr. Speaker, on two occasions during the past 30 years the Pacific coast shipyards have been called upon to contribute to the bridge of ships which have supplied our forces in foreign wars. During World War II the San Francisco Bay area was one of our largest shipbuilding centers and many thousands of men were employed in this activity.

It should be remembered however that prior to 1939 the shipbuilding skills and organizations had been practically lost on the west coast through long disuse. A start was made in 1939 with the building of two ships in an Oakland yard. It required 4 years to build up the industry to the full capacity required. It did not reach its maximum production until 1943. Ultimately, the west coast produced about half of the wartime tonnage even though the war was half over before its full ability could be brought into use.

Once more history is repeating itself. On the San Francisco Bay shores there are three major shipyards operated by private industry. The Todd shipyard in Alameda, on March 26, 1951, was employing only 128 skilled men. The Bethlehem yard in San Francisco was employing only 200 men, the lowest number in its history. The Moore drydock yard in Oakland was employing approximately 350 men, but all on repair work, most of which has probably already been completed.

Mr. Speaker, I include as a part of these remarks the letter, dated March 26, 1951, from Mr. Mario Grossetti, business manager of Local 9, Shipfitters and Helpers of the International Brotherhood of Boiler Makers, Iron Ship Builders and Helpers. Similar information has reached me from other sources. Mr. Grossetti's letter is as follows:

I am writing to give you a report of the conditions in the shipbuilding and ship-repair industry in the San Francisco Bay area.

At present, you, like anyone else, are hearing the cry that there is a labor shortage of skilled mechanics in the private shipyards and navy yards. This talk is all false, as there are plenty of unemployed journeymen in the metal trades-unions.

As of this writing, I will quote you some figures of some of the shipyards:

Todd Shipyard, Alameda, is now at its lowest, with 128 men. Very bad.

Bethlehem, San Francisco, lowest it has ever been—200 men.

Then there is Moore Drydock, which is employing a little more than the above figure, but it is only repair work, and the men will probably be off by the time you receive this letter.

The reason for it being so slow is that the Government has not seen fit to supply the west-coast shipyards with any ship construction or any amount of repair work.

The navy yards are doing all the Navy work and trying to use up the manpower in the area. There is a demand for skilled mechanics at the San Francisco Naval Shipyard, also the Mare Island Navy Yard, Vallejo. But why is there a shortage in the navy yards?

1. They do not pay the prevailing rate in the area, which is $1.93 per hour. The navy yards will not hire you for this rate, but will at $1.81 per hour. It is true they have two other rates of $1.89 and $1.97, but they tell us you must hire in at the minimum rate, which is $1.81 per hour.

At present there is an order for 100 shipfitters at the San Francisco naval shipyard. I could fill that order and still have men available, if something could be done about getting at least the union scale in the navy yards. I have been trying to get my people to go into the navy yards, but they are refusing to go in at the minimum rate, especially when they have 10 or 20 years experience behind them. They figure they are mechanics, and should be entitled to more than the minimum rate.

2. When you hire in at the navy yards, they give you a strict physical examination, which is eliminating many good mechanics. I say this is unjust because the people they are hiring in are only temporary employees, and anyone who worked around the shipyards is bound to have a little high blood pressure, or some other minor ailment.

3. President Truman and the administration a few months back told private industry they should try to place as many handicapped people to work as possible. The Government should practice what they preach, and employ handicapped workers in the navy yards.

4. After you are O.K.'d for work, it takes you from 3 to 4 weeks to go through a security test. By that time you are disgusted or broke; so you pick a job some other place.

Now, I have outlined some of the difficulties which one has to go through in order to work in the navy yards. I hope that something can be done to make it easier to get employment in navy yards. I know that the navy yards come under the civil service, and that there is procedure that one must follow, but on temporary employees I say if it is possible, something should be done to eliminate all this for temporary employees.

One other thing, while I am writing, which I would like to call to your attention, is that I have seen a news release stating that the Japanese Finance Ministry agreed today to lease the shipbuilding facilities at the former Japanese naval yard at Kure to the American National Bulk Carrier Co. The firm was understood planning to build tankers in Kure. I think a little investigation should be made to find out why so many American companies are going foreign to perform their work. If it keeps up, it would seem to me that the Americans may have to migrate to foreign countries for employment.

Penalties for Violation of the Narcotics Laws

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. JOHN E. FOGARTY
OF RHODE ISLAND
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES
Thursday, April 5, 1951

Mr. FOGARTY. Mr. Speaker, the most frightening social problem facing this country at the present time is the rising incidents of narcotic-drug habits among the young school children of both sexes as reported in so many large cities. As a rule, both school officials and the police find themselves without means to check the growth of this evil and face an impossibility in their attempts to eradicate it. There is reason to believe that the spread of this most horrible of vices, believed by some medical authorities to be incurable, is being deliberately fostered for purposes of profit.

The Federal Narcotics Bureau has reported that illegal traffic in narcotics has advanced at such a stepped-up rate that peddlers have even stooped to giving teen-agers free shots to start them on the road to addiction. The United States Public Health Service Hospital at Lexington, Ky., reported last November that in the first 10 months of 1950 it had received 203 addicts under the age of 20 years as compared to 13 in 1948. The Lexington Hospital is the only public one convenient to the larger centers of drug addiction and is indicative of the trend now existing.

One of the worst aspects of the problem is that the drug habit leads very quickly and almost inevitably into crime. The craving for the drug soon surpasses the possibility of satisfying it, and thus the girls resort to prostitution and the boys to various forms of crime, including robbery and hold-ups, in order to secure money with which to procure additional supplies. Or of equal gravity they become purveyors of the drug and are used as the means of recruiting new victims.

A perusal of newspapers from most cities in this country shows that the problem is just about universal in scope. Attempts have been made and are continuing to be made to combat this vicious evil but with little permanent effect. A major enforcement hitch is that narcotics laws carry light sentences. Persons convicted of narcotics offenses are fined relatively small amounts of money and if imprisoned are sentenced for short periods of time. In this respect the penalty for conviction is certainly not a deterrent to continuing violation and court records indicate that probation is often granted the violator which permits him to carry on his filthy operations.

It has been proved that in those areas where a realistic approach to the problem has been made through heavy fines and long terms of imprisonment, violations have amazingly decreased. Apparently the only language which these villainous and foul traders in human misery understand is fear of actual, effective punishment.

With this thought in mind, I have today submitted a bill to amend the penalty provisions applicable to persons convicted of violating the narcotic laws. This bill would provide heavy mandatory fines and compulsory minimum sentences greatly in excess of those authorized in the present law. A mandatory life imprisonment is called for upon conclusive evidence that the offense is the third conviction of the offender.

While this may seem to be quite drastic it still does not actually make the punishment fit the crime. Those of us who have had the misfortune to have seen, at first hand, the ravages of dope addiction well realize this. There could be no punishment which would adequately compensate for the human suffering and misery caused by this affliction worse than death itself.

I am convinced that if this bill should be enacted into law it will check and greatly reduce the present widespread violations of the narcotics laws. It will certainly give our enforcement officials an effective and much-needed weapon with which to combat that vicious and fiendish industry.

Importance and Responsibility—Bureau of Ordnance, Navy

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. OREN HARRIS

OF ARKANSAS

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Thursday, April 5, 1951

Mr. HARRIS. I had the very special privilege of being present and hearing an interesting, forthright, and outstanding speech of Rear Adm. M. F. Shoeffel, United States Navy, Chief of the Bureau of Ordnance, United States Navy, before the annual meeting of the Chamber of Commerce at Camden, Ark., on Tuesday evening, March 27, 1951.

There were some 800 people who attended this annual dinner meeting and heard Admiral Schoeffel discuss the duties, responsibilities, and the importance of the Bureau of Ordnance of the Navy Department. On this occasion the Navy was honored with special emphasis on the naval ammunition depot at Shumaker, which is near Camden, Ark.

I was very much impressed as were those who had the privilege of hearing the Chief of the Naval Ordnance, in that the reactivation of this depot as a vital part of our ordnance program is of such great importance to our national defense and mobilization program, our future security, and our efforts toward a real and lasting peace.

I am sure the admiral's discussion would be of real interest to every Member of this Congress. I ask unanimous consent that it may be included in the RECORD:

The reason for being of the Bureau of Ordnance is to furnish the firepower which enables our Navy to be a potent member of the team dedicated to the preservation of a free world.

The responsibility of the Bureau includes research and development, manufacture, procurement, maintenance, storage, and issue of all offensive and defensive arms and armament of the Navy—air, surface, and submarine—plus a considerable responsibility for the arms of the Marine Corps.

In discharging these responsibilities the Bureau depends partly upon its own stations, partly upon our friends in khaki or in Air Force blue, partly upon universities, and partly upon industry. The facilities outside the Navy have always played an important part in the program of the Bureau in connection with our requirements for certain types of ordnance—and when we must go to mass production in times of emergency. But to discharge every phase of its responsibility effectively, the Bureau must maintain the hard core of its own ordnance shore establishment, including its research laboratories, ordnance plants, and ammunition depots.

The Bureau's own part of its research program is conducted principally at the Naval Ordnance Laboratory, White Oak, Md., and the Naval Ordnance Test Station, Inyokern, Calif. Our center for research, development, and design of rockets is at Inyokern, Calif., which covers over 1,000 square miles in the Mojave Desert, and is actually a town in itself. As I develop my subject you will see why rockets are of particular interest to you here in Camden. The Naval Gun Factory in Washington, D. C., is our principal manufacturing plant for hardware. Aviation fire-control equipment and bombsights are made at Naval Ordnance Plant, Indianapolis, Ind.; torpedoes at Naval Ordnance Plant, Forest Park, Ill.; and the Naval Powder Factory at Indian Head, Md., produces the most advanced types of explosives. Much of this equipment is tested and proved at the Naval Proving Ground, Dahlgren, Va.

Naval ammunition depots, located at strategic points throughout the United States, comprise the largest part of the ordnance shore establishment. The principal functions of these depots are to load, store, repair and issue all types of ammunition. The importance of the repair and storage functions cannot be overemphasized. Our experience during World War I and in the initial phases of World War II, when this country had serious deficiencies in both armament and ammunition, has illustrated most forcefully the mistake of throwing away prematurely any ammunition that can be salvaged.

VJ-day came while most of our Navy was in the far western Pacific area preparing for what might have been the greatest campaign of the entire war. As a result of preparing for that operation, very large stocks of ammunition remained on hand in September 1945. It is to the everlasting credit of the responsible people in the Bureau and at its ammunition depots that a large part of these stocks was available for use within a few hours after President Truman ordered United States forces to meet the Communist threat in Korea. In spite of budget limitations, in spite of higher priorities for research and development of new weapons and ammunition, and in spite of the necessity for expenditures of new types of ammunition for training, the Bureau was able to keep reserve stocks, totaling approximately $2,500,000,000 in value, in serviceable condition. The genuine saving to the taxpayers has afforded all of us justifiable satisfaction. Since 1945, nearly 500,000 tons of rockets, bombs, projectiles, and related items which make up the fire power of your Navy, have been reconditioned annually, at a cost of approximately 3 percent of the replacement value.

The Naval Ammunition Depot, Shumaker, Ark., participated significantly in that far-reaching reconditioning and storage program until 1949, when national economy measures necessitated a severe cutback in all of our ordnance stations. Many of our depots, including Shumaker, were placed in maintenance or inactive status at that time.

The outbreak of hostilities in Korea last June changed the picture overnight. "Praise the Lord and pass the ammunition" became more than just a forgotten melody. Coastal ammunition depots and overseas bases worked practically around the clock loading the ammunition for our fighting forces. To keep pace with the tremendous expansion in expenditures and replacement requirements, reactivation and expansion of the ordnance shore establishment was given No. 1 priority. After a survey made in August 1950, it was decided to reactivate the Naval Ammunition Depot, Shumaker, as the Nation's primary facility for the production of rockets.

As you know, one of the most effective and spectacular weapons in the Korean fighting to date has been the rocket. Carrier-based Navy and Marine planes have been blasting away with rockets at enemy installations, including railroad bridges, ammunition dumps, trains, trucks, and the like, and in close support of the troops. The "Tiny Tim," the Navy's largest and most powerful rocket, which was developed toward the end of World War II and produced at Shumaker, for use against enemy shipping, is being used with telling effects against land targets in the Korean War. The Navy is also supplying rockets to the Air Force for its vital role in beating down the Communist threat. In the surprise Inchon landing rockets loaded at the Shumaker depot contributed materially to the success of the operation. These included both aircraft rockets and rockets launched from amphibious fire support ships.

As you are undoubtedly aware, the plant at Shumaker came into being during the latter part of World War II, to meet the lack of production facilities for all types of rockets. It was named after the late Capt. Samuel Robert Shumaker, United States Navy, who, as head of the Research Division of the Bureau of Ordnance, had contributed in a great measure to the development of the modern Navy rocket. The site for the plant, near Camden, Ark., was selected by a special board appointed for the purpose as the most favorable of a number under consideration and investigation.

The original plans for the Shumaker plant called for an expenditure of approximately $200,000,000. A little over $100,000,000 had been expended by the time VJ-day arrived, and construction was suspended. The first rockets were produced on April 25, 1945, just 5 months and 4 days after work on the plant was initiated. The shooting phases of that war ended before the full benefit of the plant's productive capacity could be realized, and operations were necessarily drastically curtailed in the fall of 1945.

Upon the reactivation of your naval ammunition depot here last September, $33,000,000 was made available mainly for the construction of the following additional facilities:

1. Completion of three production lines.
2. Expanded electric battery charging buildings.
3. Construction of 120 magazines.
4. Construction of 23 storehouses.
5. Completion of cafeteria of 1,000 capacity.
6. Construction of bachelor civilian quarters.

In addition to the bachelor civilian quarters, the Bureau is now seeking approval for the construction of a number of family housing units.

In order to test rockets at greater distances—a distinct advantage in the utilization of these weapons—we are extending the test range approximately 7 miles beyond its present limits. There are obvious advantages and economies in having test ranges located at the loading plant.

When the construction here is completed a thumbnail sketch of the situation will be that rockets developed at Inyokern will be assembled here. From every lot produced here a number will be tested on the ranges across the river. Employment for the current construction work will probably reach a peak of about 3,000 employees very shortly, and should hold that figure for several months. Additional funds are being requested for the purpose of continuing the necessary expansion of the facilities to keep pace with our planned requirements.

The deactivation of Shumaker in 1949, brought about by sharp national economy measures, necessarily entailed a corresponding large-scale cut-back in the Navy payroll of this community. The low point was reached on June 30, 1950, when only 141 people were employed. This employment represented an approximate monthly payroll of $36,000. Employment increased rapidly upon the reactivation of the station and by March 1, 1951, the number of workers had increased to 1,155, with a monthly payroll of about $300,000. The estimated employment figure for June 30 of this year is 2,250, with a corresponding approximate increase in payroll to $825,000. The tentative plans of the Bureau include even more expansion in the following year and a payroll that may exceed a million dollars a month. We have studied the labor market in this area and are confident that with the help and cooperation of all concerned we will be able to reach the higher employment level. It has been particularly interesting to me to learn recently that your retail sales in Camden for the entire year of 1950 amounted to about a million and a half dollars. You can see that in a few months the Navy payroll alone should equal that figure every 6 or 8 weeks.

The personnel figures that I have just outlined are based on the requirements necessary for the depot to accomplish its assigned mission. I repeat that the mission most importantly includes: The preparation, loading, storage, and issuing of rocket-type ammunition and the reconditioning and preservation of rockets and related ammunition parts.

I am sure that all of you have a sympathetic understanding of the tremendous problems which are bound to arise when facilities and production must be increased at such a rapid pace. I know that I speak for Captain Cullen and his staff, as well as for the Bureau of Ordnance, when I assure you that everything possible will be done to accomplish the objectives necessary to discharge our obligations, with the least possible disruption to the community. After all, the plant is an integral part of your community. Many of the employees are relatives and neighbors of yours. I feel confident that all of you, together with the many other loyal citizens which make up this fine community, will bear with us in our growing pains in the creation of this great American arsenal.

Even when the present emergency shall have passed, the naval ammunition depot, Shumaker, will occupy an important place in the permanent ordnance establishment of the Navy as its principal rocket-assembly facility.

Universal Military Training

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. EDITH NOURSE ROGERS
OF MASSACHUSETTS
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES
Wednesday, April 4, 1951

Mrs. ROGERS of Massachusetts. Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my remarks in the RECORD, I include the following telegram:

WASHINGTON, D. C., April 4, 1951.
Hon. EDITH NOURSE ROGERS,
House Office Building,
Washington, D. C.:

Request by cable from Rome to forward following message from National Commander Erle Cocke, Jr., to you:

"Recent tour of Korean battle front and American installations elsewhere in Asia and Europe confirms belief universal military training would have prevented untold casualties, saved many American lives, and will strengthen our future defense against communism. The American Legion urges support for universal military training and is strongly opposed to any amendment that would defer it or separate it from present bill."

Address of Edward T. T. Williams

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. KATHARINE ST. GEORGE
OF NEW YORK
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES
Thursday, April 5, 1951

Mrs. ST. GEORGE. Mr. Speaker, under unanimous consent, I include in the RECORD an address delivered by Edward T. T. Williams before the meeting of the American Pharmaceutical Manufacturers Association, November 29, 1950:

I am sure all of you are somewhat sober as the result of the news that has come from Korea. I know I am. We are somewhat like the man who carried a case of chronic appendicitis around with him for 6 or 7 months, and then because of acute pain was forced to consult a surgeon. The surgeon, after examination, said in effect: "Yes, you're going to have to go into the hospital immediately for an appendectomy; and while you're there and so long as you will be under a general anesthetic anway, perhaps I'd better remove those two growths that you have—one on each eye. They seem to be at least 5 years old each."

As we look at the international scene, we can readily see that Russia has a purpose, a single-minded purpose. We know that Russia is growing stronger, that Russia is ruthless and that Russia is realistic; and when I say Russia, I mean international communism.

It must be equally apparent to you, as you have watched the domestic scene, that we lack purpose, unless you want to call self-defense a purpose. We have engaged in a curiously inconsistent form of idealism. Certainly we have lacked reality.

Our people talk about the fact that western civilization is threatened by communism. Most Americans don't know what is meant by western civilization. Try it on some of your friends. Ask them what they mean when they say western civilization. You'll get all sorts of answers.

Some will tell you it started with the Greeks. Some will tell you it is Christianity, which is absurd because there are many Jews in western civilization. Some will tell you it is a standard of living. Some will say it is democracy. To me western civilization as we live it and practice it today is less than 400 years old.

The line of demarcation between medievalism and western civilization occurred with the establishment of the Dutch Republic. Garet Garrett selected the significant date as being February 15, 1568. On that day Philip II of Spain condemned the Dutch to die as a nation of Bible readers and heretics. For 10 years there had been religious conflict in the Netherlands. Philip was determined to convert the Dutch to Catholicism. The stubborn Dutch were equally determined not to be converted. And the Dutch fought with a bitter resistance. They fought as individuals, they were not effectively organized. It was a very personal thing and they fought personally.

Philip sent Alva to the Netherlands to enforce his edict. The Dutch were tortured. They were put to the rack. They were condemned to die. They were executed. And as the condemned were carted through the streets in the early morning, they would scream at the men and women who would come out in the early morning to watch them going to be killed. They would exhort the watchers not to succumb to the Spaniards. And when men talk under those circumstances what they have to say carries weight.

As a matter of fact, what they said carried so much weight in the Dutch resistance and it became so bitter that the Spaniards put steel rings over the tongues of the men and women who were being led to be executed, and they had the foresight to heat those steel rings first so they would sear the tongues of the men and women in the carts and they could not talk.

When Alva notified Philip that right after holy week in 1568 he was going to execute 800 Dutchmen, it was quite apparent that mass murder was being practiced. That condition went on for approximately 49 years. Forty-nine years is a lifetime, and it was a long lifetime in those days. It wasn't a question of who was right and who was wrong; it was a question of survival.

When the Prince of Orange finally put into words and phrases some of the theories of natural law, that men do have inalienable rights with respect to religion and the opportunity to pursue both their economic and religious ends, and when Queen Elizabeth sent over 4,000 soldiers the Dutch became free. The Dutch Republic rose on the ashes of its martyrs and became in a short period of time the economic schoolmaster of Europe, because for the first time the great liberals of the day had achieved their purpose. They had freed the individual from a bureaucratic system of administrative control and law as practiced at that time by crown and church.

Well, when the British looked across the channel at this sudden rise of the Dutch, this dynamic upsurge, they were a bit puzzled, because even though Elizabeth had helped the Dutch, she didn't do it because she liked the Dutch; she did it because she hated Philip. Philip was trying to put Mary Stuart on the throne of England and Elizabeth didn't like that.

In England at the time, curiously enough, the prevailing religious philosophy had it that an English gentleman could not work and go to heaven—less than 400 years ago. He could pawn his wife's jewels and go to heaven, but he couldn't lend money. The Jews became the moneylenders of England because of that. It wasn't until the Puritans incorporated in their religious philosophy the fact that a man's work was his calling and that a man could have a moral tone in his business which paralleled the moral tone of his personal life that it was accepted practice in England that a gentleman could work and go to heaven.

When the Puritans threw out the hereditary rulers of England and ended the feudal system in England, they drew the line of demarcation between medievalism and western civilization as we know it, because they, too, freed the individual from a bureaucratic system of administrative control under which he was helpless to pursue his religious and economic ends.

Well, it was only natural, when the Colonists came to this country—and, as you may recall, many of them went from England to Holland and then came here—that they should carry along that philosophy, the philosophy of western civilization in which the individual was to be free to pursue his religious and economic ends and in which he and his fellows, collectively, were in control of the economic stability of the state through the control of taxation and through the control of the monetary system.

Now, all through the upward surge of western civilization as we know it in these last 400 years, as the French Revolution made its contribution, as France and England and Holland and the United States made their contribution to what I am describing, the hammer in the forge of western civilization was made up of the men and women who worked and saved and put their substance to work, to productive use; the men and the women who worked harder or studied harder or strove harder to make a larger-than-usual contribution in order to receive a larger-than-usual reward.

Well, here we are in the United States today facing a crisis. Five years ago we were the most powerful Nation on earth. We were so strong that we were stronger than any possible coalition of two or three nations. We were so efficient that we could turn out more and better goods than any two or three nations on earth. We were so patriotic that our sons, almost barehanded, fought the Japanese until they received material support. And here we are, looking at Russia, and we are a bit apprehensive. What has happened?

A Swiss historical philosopher by the name of Burckhardt once said a very profound thing. He said, in effect "National civilizations persist not in relation to their power or their patriotism or their efficiency, but in direct relationship to the extent to which they learn and apply the lessons of their own history."

If power 5 years ago hasn't sufficed to make us strong today and if efficiency doesn't leave us too confident and if patriotism may not be enough, where along the line have we failed? Why is it that we are a bit apprehensive? What has happened to change the pattern? Where did we fail to learn and apply the lessons of our own history?

Well, we broke the pattern in England and the United States when we introduced the theory of direct taxation. When William Howard Taft signed the Federal income-tax law, it is reported that he said something like this: "I feel this is unconstitutional, but I am going to sign it because I don't think it will ever exceed 4 percent."

Lenin once wrote a note to the Communist organizers in Switzerland. He said, in effect, "If you can persuade the Swiss to adopt a federal system of direct taxation, that will be the shortest road to socialism and communism." Lenin knew what he was talking about.

We might have gotten by with a system of direct taxation if limits had been established, but when, on September 30, 1930, the British went off the gold standard and when, 2 years later, we followed, we separated, you might say, the other half of this broken pattern. We broke it twice.

Let us see what happened. Let us assume now that in New York or Chicago or your home town, whatever it may be, the city council were to meet tomorrow and pass a resolution and submit that resolution to the voters for approval. A resolution which read to the effect that all of the voters of that city, all of the citizens of that city, would relinquish to the city council the unlimited right to take any or all of the income of the citizens of that town. Do you think that resolution would be adopted? You know as well as I do that if that were presented to any group of citizens by any city council in the United States it would be voted down, possibly 100 to 1. And yet, the citizens of the United States have given that power to another group of men who might just as well be called a city council, because they are no different. They just happen to be called Congressmen and Senators. They have that power, and when they have that power in an unredeemable currency, as has been the case now for almost 20 years, they can abuse the power without penalty.

In other words, prior to that combination, if a government made fiscal mistakes it had to pay penalties. It had to pay higher interest rates on borrowed money. Perhaps it could not borrow money. Everyone, including the taxpayers and the citizens, became aware of the fiscal failures of the party in power. But since we put that combination together, the prevailing British Government or our Government can waste $1,000,000,000 or $2,000,000,000 or $3,000,000,000 without penalty. They can hide $1,000,000,000 and we can hardly find it.

When there was given to succeeding groups of legislators in England and the United States this right of direct taxation in a nonredeemable currency, we made it possible for them, through unlimited control of the financial substance of the people, to establish bureaucratic systems of administrative law. Operating under the popular and painless analgesic of social reform, so dear to the heart of politicians hoping to perpetuate themselves in office, it was a simple matter to mask the symptoms of economic and political rot which grew insidiously under the surface. The unlimited power to collect money from the people brought with it the unlimited power to distribute money. Control over the economic life of the individual was the result.

And so, as we look at this picture, we discover that the wheel has turned. At the time of the Dutch Republic, the great liberals were the men who wanted to separate and free the individual from a system of bureaucratic control. They wanted to free him from the state, to pursue his religious and economic ends. The great reactionaries were those who wanted to impose bureaucratic controls upon him through the state or the church. Through the cleverness of words, the meaning has changed, and today the great liberals are those who argue for state control, for bureaucratic controls. They argue in opposition to the freedom of the individual, and the great reactionaries are those who are talking as I am talking today to you.

As that wheel has turned, the Catholic Church has turned with it. The Catholic Church, philosophically wise in the ways of history, has made the complete turn of the wheel and is today the arch opponent of international communism. It understands the deep, underlying problem.

Many intelligent people have made the turn of the wheel, too, but not too fortunately for them. You remember that I told you that the hammer in the forge of western civilization was the group of people who worked harder, who saved and who put their substance to productive use; also the people who tried to excel in the profession, sciences and arts, and in business, because out of it might come a greater reward. They were the hammer. But in the last 20 years, during which period the taxes in England went to 40 percent and England was broke, and the taxes in this country went to 30 percent and we were struggling against inflation, during that period these same men and women who were the hammer of western civilization became the anvil. They were hammered from below by pressure groups and they were hammered from above by political manipulators.

There is a political economist in England by the name of M. J. Bonn. He teaches. He made a statement last winter, I believe, and he phrased it in the form of a question. He answered his question by the manner of his asking it. He said, "Is what we have in England today socialism, really, or is it a return to medievalism?" He knew what he was talking about.

He knew that by these combinations of circumstances, changing groups of politicians, conservative, liberal, or labor, were given power over the economic life of the citizenry, which was dangerous, bureaucratic controls through administrative law. And what do we find in this country? Oh, yes; we have a few Democrats and we have a few Republicans who have moral integrity and courage, but by and large the words, "Democrat" and "Republican," give only lip service to this broad, deep concept that we are discussing.

In other words, what have they narrowed it down to? They have narrowed it down to the fact that the great goal of democratic government is to provide economic security for the individual. Under the guise of social reform, under the guise of the beneficent state caring for its people, they have narrowed the philosophy down to that single thought, and we have been talking about pensions, social security, and the protection of the individual personally. Economic security—that is what is has narrowed down to.

Meanwhile, time has proved that the security of the individual is not of paramount importance at all, because, through a combination of ignorance and political greed, political inepitude and group selfishness, we have created such a hodge-podge of economic confusion, mixing the good with the bad, mixing social reforms (some of which were good) with many other things that were bad, that we have threatened the economic security of the state itself. No longer is the security of the individual our paramount problem.

Our paramount problem is to consider what needs to be done to strengthen this country. Just as depositors in a bank cannot regard their five or ten thousand dollars as part of their economic security if the bank collapses, so must the citizens of a republic relinquish their personal security if the State collapses. Today, the principal question that we have to face is the political and economic stability of this country.

You see, what we are facing is an odd test. The test is not whether our civilization is better than communism. The test is not whether our people have a higher standard of living or whether, under our philosophy, people have a better opportunity to fulfill their aspirations. That is not the test at all. It is a much more startling, realistic test than that. The test for the immediate future is simply this: Which civilization is going to survive?

Oh, yes; over long periods of time, the good always wins out. But the Dark Ages lasted for hundreds of years. The Dutch suffered for 49 years. I am sure none of us wants to have the good win out after a 10-, 20-, 30-, or 40-year interlude.

We are therefore facing a test of survival, and when you examine the civilizations of history—and 20 of them have already failed—you become conscious of the fact that one civilization does not conquer another. That never happens. The old civilization collapses. It breaks down from within, because it has lost its political and economic stability.

Now, let's look at the Russian picture quickly. The Russians are dealing in hard labor and hard money. They work on a piecework system. If you want to get more pay and more food, you make more goods. Often they deal in gold because they have to, or they deal in barter because they have to. It is a rugged economic school in which they are operating.

And what are we doing? We are dealing in soft labor and soft money. We have created a soft Government which tries to provide a soft future for all of our citizens. And in the process of doing it, through subsidy and through direct employment, we have created literally millions of economic parasites.

There was once an Englishman by the name of Lord Melbourne who said: "What the wise men promised has not come to pass, but what all the damn fools said would happen has happened." Our so-called wise men have promised much for a long time. They have become professional promisers. Meanwhile, we and others like us throughout this country of ours are the damn fools that Melbourne was talking about. We saw the things that were wrong. We disagreed with many of the things that were done. Often, we went along for superficial reasons. We knew the truth. We talked about it. We watched the moral and economic tone of this country go down, as expenditures and ambitions for social reform went up.

Social reform is good when it can be digested in the political and economic scheme. Social reform is bad when it cannot be digested.

Now, our business happens to be closely related to the sciences and the professions. Often scientific men and professional men and men who follow the arts think that they are apart from the economic scheme. But we know that the scientific, professional, and cultural horizon is completely circumscribed by the political and economic horizon.

Witness what happened in this country. How much science and culture and art did we have here until we achieved political and economic stability? And so, among scientists and professional men and those who follow the arts, these same apprehensive conversations took place.

Woodrow Wilson once said, "Some men grow up and some men swell up." We have watched our country in the last few years swell up and we have watched some of our politicians swell up. It takes a salary of $19,800 today to give a man essentially the same as a salary of $10,000 in 1940. We have heard politicians talk, sometimes boastingly talk, of the increase in our national product in terms of dollars. When we discuss these gains in terms of dollars, you know and I know that much of what we claim as gain is just economic bloat. That is all that it is—economic bloat.

Why is this subject of significance to a group like this on a day like this, at the end of a meeting? Well, in my book it is important because one of the greatest defaults that has occurred in history has been the default of the intelligent American citizen—his default from his own responsibilities as a citizen. We, Melbourne's damn fools, who knew what was going on, stood off to one side. We weren't organized the way the unions were. We weren't in politics the way the politicians were. And, by and large, we were too lazy, too complacent, too self-satisfied and, in all, too gutless to take this issue and make a personal issue out of it and do something about it.

Whom else would you expect to follow this pattern, examine the facts and be helpful? Certainly, you couldn't expect the first or second generation of immigrants or labor unions to come up with it. You couldn't expect self-indulgent politicians to come up with it. You know as well as I do that with but few exceptions most of our politicians are not leaders. They follow a sort of Gallup-poll technique. They use investigators to find out what the people want and then try to beat them to the punch by giving it to them.

We, representing the intelligent segment of the American population, many millions of us, defaulted, because, unlike the Dutch who were willing to fight personally and unlike the colonists who did the same thing, we left often to lesser men in politics the responsibilities for what was going to happen to this country.

Now, as we look at the present situation, we say, "Well, after all, it looks as though we may be going into another war and, you know, all the rules are off in a war." Yes, that is quite true; many of the rules are all off. But, if another war comes, who will many of the great patriots be? Won't they come from this same group that I am talking about? Haven't they come from this same group for 150 years? Isn't it in our blood to be patriotic? Won't we all go to Washington? Won't our sons fight? Won't our daughters get into it? Hasn't it always happened and won't it happen again?

Of course it will, but I am here to say to you that if we do get into heavy preparations for a war and if we do have to go through the travail and misery of it, if we do have to go through this fight once again, let's learn a lesson from the past. Today all classes of our people—labor, farmers, professional men and businessmen—are confused and anxious. They know something has happened and is happening to our economic stability and they don't like it. Soon they will learn that our entire defense program is dependent upon our civilian economic stability. Soon they will learn that the continuous subsidy of voters of many classes with public money tends inevitably to higher costs, greater subsidies and more inflation. Even the pressure groups who benefit are beginning to worry.

If, during this difficult, trying period, the intelligent thoughtful citizen of the United States isn't willing, savagely and bitterly, if necessary, to make a personal fight out of the issue of protecting our country from the political and economic self-indulgence that has arisen because of the breaking of the historically successful economic pattern, he will make another default. He will default on his own account, as he has done for the last 10 or 20 years, and he will also default on account of his children and his children's children, because they will not live as free men and women.

The Real Issue

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. HERBERT H. LEHMAN
OF NEW YORK

IN THE SENATE OF THE UNITED STATES

Monday, March 19 (legislative day of Friday, March 16), 1951

Mr. LEHMAN. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to have printed in the Appendix of the RECORD a statement made by the well-known economist, James P. Warburg, on March 10, 1951, entitled "Let Us Debate the Real Issue."

While Mr. Warburg's views are obviously controversial and will not necessarily meet with general agreement, they are thoughful and very interesting. I believe they merit the consideration of the Members of the Congress.

There being no objection, the statement was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

LET'S TALK ABOUT THE REAL ISSUE

(By James P. Warburg)

The great debate, which has been filling the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD, the front pages, and the airwaves, seems to me almost wholly irrelevant. The question of sending troops to Europe prior to the outbreak of war should have been debated 2 years ago when the Atlantic security program was proposed to Congress and to the people in a regrettably misleading manner. This program actually involved two commitments, only one of which was frankly disclosed when the treaty was placed before the Senate.

It was made clear that the treaty committed us to go to war with an aggressor against the European signatories. It was not made clear that the administration intended to go beyond the treaty and commit the United States to fight the aggressor along the line of the Elbe River in central Germany.

In urging the Senate to make clear, when it ratified the treaty, that we were not undertaking to defend our allies by necessarily holding any particular line or frontier, I ventured to point out the dangers which seemed to me inherent in any such additional commitment. These were: first, that we should thereby commit ourselves to a preannounced strategy in a possible war with Russia; second, that a commitment to hold up a Russian invasion in central Germany involved building up a force, which as yet did not exist, precisely where it would be most likely to provoke rather than to deter attack; and, third, that to build up such a force we should either have to double our then existing combat strength and send most of it to Germany, or else rearm the Germans themselves.

Senators CONNALLY, VANDENBERG, and other members of the Foreign Relations Committee replied that the suggested clarification was not necessary, since no such second commitment was contemplated. They relied upon the unequivocal assurances of the administration witnesses that no substantial American forces would be sent abroad in advance of war and that the United States would in no circumstances permit the rearming of Germany.

Shortly after the treaty had been ratified, the administration sent up its military aid bill and, in urging this measure, stated that its purpose was to prevent Europe from being overrun, in the event that an invasion should be undertaken. To accomplish this purpose, the bill provided merely a paltry $1,000,000,000.

This was the time when the great debate should have taken place. This was the time to make up our minds whether or not we could and should undertake the commitment, and, if so, to recognize clearly that it meant raising and equipping a powerful new combat force for European garrison duty. This was the time to ventilate the misgivings which are now belatedly expressed after we have committed ourselves to the military defense of Western Europe's frontiers. The issue of sending troops to Europe is no longer debatable except in terms of whether or not the United States shall go back on a solemnly given promise. That is why I say that the current great debate is irrelevant.

There is, however, a much more important issue before us which, so far, has not been debated at all. There is an opportunity before us—perhaps our last—to extricate ourselves with honor from the stultifying position in which we now find ourselves. This opportunity will arise at the meeting of the Council of Foreign Ministers, for which the deputies are even now preparing the agenda.

The issue we shall face at that meeting—the issue we should be debating now—is whether we want a peace settlement in Europe or the continuation of the arms race and the cold war.

Unless I misread the signs, this impending meeting of the Council of Foreign Ministers will either signal the beginning of a process which leads to the reunification of Germany, the healing of the great scar across the face of Europe, and the ultimate making of a European peace settlement, or else it will finalize the partition of Germany, the partition of Europe, and the probability of eventual conflict.

The outcome lies very largely in our hands. It will be decided at least as much by the President and the Secretary of State, before Mr. Acheson goes to the conference, as by what happens at the conference itself.

* * * * *

The Council of Foreign Ministers is not about to resume its function because we desired a meeting. Quite the contrary is the case. The Council is about to meet because the Russians stated last October that they would not tolerate the contemplated rearming of Western Germany and demanded a meeting of the Council to discuss a renewal of the Potsdam pledge against remilitarization and the carrying out of the Potsdam Agreement for the creation of a peaceful and united German nation. Our first inclination was to rebuff this proposal as a piece of effrontery. The French inclination was to welcome a meeting. The official British reaction was indecisive. Since October there has been a voluminous exchange of diplomatic notes, in which the western powers have tried to broaden the agenda for the meeting so as to include all the various existing causes of tension, while the Russians have sought to confine the discussions as closely as possible to Germany. The Russian notes have been couched in the now familiar language of distortion, vilification, and assumed Kremlin infallibility. The western replies, particularly those drafted in Washington, have borne the equally familiar hallmark of weary patience maintained with increasing difficulty. They have breathed an atmosphere of "We'll go through it all again, if we must, but, of course, no good will come of it."

This atmosphere must be changed before our Secretary of State goes to a meeting which may well open or close for good the door that leads to a peaceful settlement. Certainly nothing can be expected of the conference, if we go to it without an affirmative plan of our own. If we go simply in order to defeat the Russian plan, whatever it may be, we shall continue along the present road to disaster.

As a matter of fact, we know what the Russian plan is. The Russians told us all about it last October. Strangely enough, the Russian plan looks very much like our own plan for a German settlement before we abandoned hope of reaching a settlement, in 1947.

The Russians have proposed the unification of Germany. This was our aim from 1945 to 1947. At that time two obstacles stood in the way: Reparations and disagreement as to the terms of unification.

But, last October, the Russians proposed—and I quote their language—"the removal of all hindrances to the development of a peaceful German economy." Now, if this phrase means anything at all, it means that the Russians are willing to forego further reparations, probably because they think they have extracted about everything they can extract from their puppet state. If true, this removes one of the two barriers that stopped us at Moscow 4 years ago.

The Russians have also indicated—less clearly, because this is obviously a bargaining point—that they may be ready to permit free elections and the maintenance of the political freedoms in the whole of a unified Germany. This could be true if, from the Russian point of view, a democratic Germany (in the western sense) appears as less of an evil than a rearmed Western Germany. The hypothesis makes sense to me because the Politburo, while perhaps not too sincerely alarmed over the inclusion of 250,000 Germans in a western defense force, may in fact be very much alarmed over the possibility that, once rearmed, the Germans might slip out from under NATO control and go off on military adventures of their own. In this respect Russian fear of Germany is rather similar to French apprehension. Neither is, in my judgment, unfounded.

Be this as it may, it is, to say the least, possible that the second great obstacle encountered at Moscow may also now be removed.

Why, then, has our Government been so reluctant?

It has been reluctant because the attainment of its own aims in Germany now runs counter to its program of pursuing the cold war until it has built the much-discussed situations of strength from which it wishes to negotiate. The truth is that our Government is caught between two contradictory policies, one of which it must give up or change. It wants to make Western Europe defensible against Russian invasion before it negotiates a peace settlement. To do this, our Government thinks it must rearm Western Germany. On the other hand, our Government wants to arrive at a peace settlement based upon a unified, peaceful, and democratic Germany. This is irreconcilable with seeking to integrate the rearmed half of Germany—two-thirds would be more accurate—in an anti-Soviet coalition.

The solution seems to me quite simple. More by accident than design, we have now maneuvered the Russians into a position where they are apparently willing to unify Germany on our political terms, to give up reparations, to sign a peace treaty, to end the occupation and withdraw occupation forces. In other words, the threat of German rearmament has apparently given us the very situation of strength we needed to attain our ends. Then why not negotiate and find out whether this is true? And, if it is true, why not give up German rearmament in order to obtain the kind of peace settlement we have vainly sought for 5 years?

As I see it, by foregoing German rearmament, we should not be giving up anything of real value to us in any case. Rearming Western Germany would not add to the strength of a West European defense, because the conditions on which West Germany might fight for the west would be precisely those conditions which would make France unwilling to fight. This has become abundantly clear in recent months. Furthermore, rearming Germany would actually add to Russian military strength, because it would make willing allies out of such presently unenthusiastic satellites as Poland and Czechoslovakia. On the other hand, rearming Germany would almost certainly eliminate what hope remains of helping the Germans to become a peace-loving people; it would utterly destroy what little value there may have been in our democratic teaching. And, finally, rearming Germany and building up a huge army along the Elbe River would be the most provocative thing we could do—the one course most likely to bring on a Russian invasion before we were ready to meet it. It did not take General Eisenhower long to come to these conclusions.

Because our proposal to rearm Germany was, in itself, a foolish proposal—for the reasons just stated—I said, a moment ago, that we have attained our ends more by luck than good management. Shall we now be so unwise, so stubborn, so concerned with saving face as not to take advantage of this stroke of good fortune?

Shall we now pursue the cold war as an end in itself, forgetting that we reluctantly embarked upon it only as a means toward reaching a peaceful settlement?

I submit that the No. 1 item of the President's instructions to Mr. Acheson, when he goes to the conference, should read:

"You are authorized to make it clear that, if a settlement of the German question can be reached under which a freely elected all-German Government will be enabled to guarantee the political freedoms to all German citizens, under which a just and honorable peace treaty may be negotiated, demilitarization assured, and occupation forces gradually withdrawn, then the United States will gladly withdraw its suggestion for the inclusion of German forces in the North Atlantic Treaty Organization."

If our Secretary of State were to begin the discussions with a statement of that sort, defining precisely what we mean by political freedoms, the Council would at once buckle down to the problem which lies at the heart of its assignment. If real progress were made toward reaching agreement on Germany, the Council would then find it infinitely easier to move forward on the question of the long-delayed Austrian Treaty. This, in turn, would open the way to a discussion of the withdrawal of Russian troops from Hungary, Rumania, and Bulgaria; and, finally, to a general discussion of the gradual reduction of all armed establishments.

If, on the other hand, Mr. Acheson follows the past pattern of the peripheral approach—seeking to begin with a discussion of the Austrian Treaty or the troops maintained by or in the Soviet satellites, and leaving the initiative, so far as Germany is concerned, to Mr. Vyshinsky—then I should say that the chances of a constructive outcome will be slim. We shall then, in all probability, witness merely another sorry spectacle of procedural wrangling and propaganda speeches, in which the relatively polite rebuttals of the west will be no less indicative of moral and intellectual bankruptcy than the slanderous vituperations of Andrei Vyshinsky.

The objection may be raised that a German peace settlement at this time, which would in effect "neutralize" Germany in the cold war, would "lay the great workshop of Europe wide open to Soviet aggression or subversion."

So far as military aggression is concerned, I am not suggesting that we abandon our commitment to defend Western Europe. As an alternative to German rearmament, I proposed some months ago that we and the British agree to maintain—not in Germany, but in France and the Low Countries—an Anglo-American garrison of at least 20 divisions, provided that this force would be at least matched by our Continental Allies. This army would be no further from the Rhine than the Russian Army would be from the Oder. It would be a far more reliable force than one which included Germans. It would be far less provocative because it would not include Germans, and because it would not be built up, as is now contemplated, right up against a Russian Army across the Elbe River.

As for political subversion of a neutralized Germany, why should we fear that Russian influence would be stronger than that of the west? Wendell Willkie once remarked that he could not understand why so many Americans made the assumption that, where democracy and communism come into contact, communism is likely to win. Why should we assume that a truly free German people—by which I mean a people freed not only from foreign coercion but from renascent native reaction—should be susceptible to Communist conspiracy? This danger will be real only if a free Germany becomes a land in which the masses are discontented, which means, if the Government pursues policies that allow the rich to become richer while the poor grow poorer. If western influence is directed toward true democracy, why should we fear that the German people will fall for the false promises of the east?

The assumption that a "neutral" Germany will necessarily fall prey to the Kremlin is defeatism of the most dangerous variety.

Let me make certain that I have made my major point unequivocally clear.

No matter what the Russians have done or failed to do in the past—no matter how untruthful their often-repeated allegations as to our motives and actions—no matter how churlish the behavior of their negotiators—there is now apparently—and I repeat, apparently—a real chance that a German peace settlement can be achieved.

A German peace settlement is fundamental to a peace settlement in Europe. A European peace settlement is a prerequisite for the establishment of enduring peace throughout the world.

Even if a kindly history should absolve us of all blame for what has happened up to this moment, history will not forgive us if we fail—through stubbornness, or pride, or stupidity—to make the most of this opportunity.

May it be given to those harassed and overburdened men, in whose hands rests not only our future but the future of all mankind, to seize upon this moment and to make it the turning point toward peace.

The Puyallup Valley Daffodil Festival

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. HARRY P. CAIN

OF WASHINGTON

IN THE SENATE OF THE UNITED STATES

Thursday, April 5 (legislative day of Monday, March 26), 1951

Mr. CAIN. Mr. President, on Tuesday the House and Senate restaurants, abloom with bright yellow daffodils, brought to the Nation's Capitol a bit of spring from my home State, the great and beautiful evergreen State of Washington. This came about through the generosity of the Puyallup Valley Daffodil Festival, Inc., of my own Pierce County, to Representative THOR TOLLEFSON, from Tacoma, and to the junior Senator from the State of Washington. This corporation, each year, stages a colorful flower festival, the highlight of which is a parade of beautiful floats, for which over a million daffodil blooms are used each year. Festivities during the 3 days of the daffodil festival take place in Puyallup and Sumner, in the fertile Puyallup River Valley near Tacoma, and in Tacoma itself.

This year the festival will be held on April 6, 7, and 8. Out home we have come to regard this annual festival, of which this is to be the eighteenth, as a sort of official recognition of the coming of spring.

The April issue of Nation's Business carries a well-illustrated article They're Daffy Over Daffodils on this now nationally famous festival and industry. The author is Mr. William L. Worden, a close friend of mine, who, when he isn't traveling over the world pursuing his profession as a writer, lives in Tacoma. Many of my colleagues, I am sure, have read and enjoyed his articles written from Korea and Japan, which have been recently appearing in the Saturday Evening Post.

Because Mr. Worden's article in Nation's Business tells the story of the daffodil bulb industry of the Puyallup Valley so colorfully, I am sure that the Senators will enjoy reading it, especially after having seen the blooms in the Senate restaurant, and I ask unanimous consent that it be inserted in the Appendix of the RECORD.

There being no objection, the article was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

THEY'RE DAFFY OVER DAFFODILS

(By William L. Worden)

The road was narrow and the ruts were deep. Cumbersome Marmon sedans risked muddy shoulders to let model-T Fords and four-cylinder Chevrolets get by. Ladies with cloches down over their ears snapped pictures with box cameras, and transplanted Dutch farmers patrolled fences to keep small boys from trampling all over rows of yellow daffodils. The farmers did not care about the daffodil blooms but perspired for the bulbs below them. Tempers and radiators boiled over.

It was a mess, and also a very typical April week-end scene on the byroads of Washington State's Puyallup Valley in 1927.

On an early Saturday in April 1951, the highways of the Puyallup Valley—wider now, and paved—will be lined with 30,000 or 40,000 people, and the streets of Tacoma, Puyallup, and Sumner will hold another 100,000, while floats, bands, and marching organizations pass in a parade featuring 1,000,000 daffodil blossoms. At the same time a field house will be filled with thousands of flowers—rare varieties and floral arrangements by professionals and amateurs. The following day ski races in the nearby mountains and a yacht parade on Puget Sound will also feature daffodils, as prizes and decorations, respectively.

This is an eye-filling show and has a mouth-filling name—the eighteenth annual Puyallup Valley Daffodil Festival. A visitor may wonder at the spectacle of four communities going into a week-end business paralysis over flowers; but he is not likely to suspect either that this celebration grew out of a rural traffic jam, or that it has been thriving for 18 years just because people like yellow flowers.

Daffodils don't sound like much of an industry, but they are. The valley is a 15-mile-long, 3-mile-wide strip of rich soil along the banks of the Puyallup River between Mount Rainier's glaciers and Puget Sound. It had been a hop-growing center since settlement days in the 1880's, but was reeling in the early 1920's under the twin blows of prohibition and a hop-killing insect pest. A United States Department of Agriculture expert happened on the scene during a search for an area in which an American bulb industry could be started to compete with the centuries-old Dutch monopoly on daffodils, tulips, irises, and lilies. Here he found suitable soil and landowners who were looking for a new crop.

It was a happy marriage, from the start. Bulbs grew disease-free, larger than the Holland imports and, most important, a full 2 weeks ahead of the Dutch season. Dutch immigrants supplied knowledge of bulb culture and their Yankee neighbors built machinery—bulb planters, diggers, and sorters—to get away from the tedious handwork which always had been part of the industry. Almost immediately bulb growing provided a profitable side line for a farmer with an acre or two to spare. Later, it proved even more practical as a large-scale, industrialized farm operation.

In the Puyallup Valley and half a dozen similar areas in Washington, Oregon, and Michigan, growers specialized from the first in supplying big, fat bulbs to florists and greenhouses. These were forced by the buyers—hence the importance of the 2-week seasonal advantage—and the blooms sold in January or February at high winter prices. A bulb with the unlovely name of the Double-nosed King Alfred became the premium product because it would produce two big and spectacular blooms.

The bulbs were good enough to capture a share of the American market immediately; and with World War II, the capture became complete. Machine methods, accurate grading, disease-free guaranties, and competitive prices have kept the American bulbs abreast of imports in the postwar years.

As an industry, daffodil growing is firmly established on nearly a thousand Puyallup acres, producing 8,000,000 bulbs for sale annually. Washington State as a whole sells 15,000,000. Bulb fields and sorting sheds provide jobs for laborers, school youngsters, and housewives during the season; and the industry maintains skilled farm labor the year around—including men who can look down a row of thousands of daffodils in bloom, pick out two or three of the wrong variety and transplant them, still keeping their eyesight.

Forty acres of daffodils in full bloom, with a snow-capped mountain in the background, form a beautiful picture; but the blossoms have only about the same connection with the final product as tassels do to a field of corn. Careful bulb growers leave blossoms in the field until they begin to wither, then send crews in to top them, collecting the withered flowers as insurance against providing havens for pests but throwing them away once they are out of the field. To cut blooms before they start to wither reduces bulb size as much as 15 percent.

Growers never had any commercial interest in the crowds who drove out to see the fields in the twenties. The market was in New York, Chicago, or St. Louis, but not in the western Washington area where daffodils grow so readily that everybody has them in his own garden. The few flowers the grower might permit his children to sell from a roadside stand did not begin to equal losses caused by careless amateur photographers and sightseers who ruined the back roads and trampled the bulbs.

However, it's hard to stop somebody who really wants to look at flowers. After a few abortive attempts, the growers decided it was easier to bring the flowers to the lookers.

The town of Sumner started with a budget of $25 and a small parade at the height of the blossoming season. Trucks and wagons were decorated with a few thousand discarded daffodil heads. Simultaneously, a few of the major growers displayed a collection of their choice daffodils in a corner of the town's high school gymnasium.

Some Tacoma and Seattle newspaper photographers showed up to take pictures—and the festival was launched. The town of Puyallup joined the celebration on another spring, and then Tacoma followed. The parade acquired bands, more floats, and the inevitable festival queen.

Today, the festival includes the tiny town of Orting among the celebrants. A board of directors representing chambers of commerce, business and growers works throughout the year without pay. Ski and yacht clubs cooperate by arranging their specialties in conjunction with the main show; and professional growers team with women's garden club members to stage the flower exhibition.

The daffodil festival is a big show—but you'd never guess it from the budget.

Five thousand dollars is the most the directors ever have had—obtained through the sale of 50-cent daffodil buttons and through contributions.

Daffodil growers actually make the largest contribution. Since the war, the industry has begun shipping thousands of cut flowers by air freight direct to city markets, thus short-cutting part of the old bulb-forcing system. But at the height of the cut-flower season, they deliver 1,000,000 flowers to the parade—selling them last year for $3.50 a thousand at a time when the going price was $14.

In the Puyallup Valley, a festival means that a couple of hundred businesses and businessmen, a farm industry, a majority of the area's feminine gardeners, and the representatives of one city and three country towns do a lot of work together. They brave uncertain weather, blister themselves arranging flowers and bang their fingers building floats, putting together one of the country's most beautiful shows.

There really isn't any reason—except that they all like daffodils.

Universal Military Training

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. FRAZIER REAMS
OF OHIO
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES
Thursday, April 5, 1951

Mr. REAMS. Mr. Speaker, under unanimous consent to extend my remarks and include an article from the Christian Science Monitor of April 2, 1951, by Gilbert A. Robinson, 48–13 One Hundred and Eighty-eighth Street, Flushing, N. Y. The writer is a young man, now 23 years of age, who left college at the age of 18 to voluntarily serve in the Armed Forces. He believed in universal military training.

I commend this to the reading of my colleagues because it gives a different and a refreshing point of view from much we have heard here on the floor in recent days:

YOUTH CONSIDERS UNIVERSAL MILITARY TRAINING

(By Gilbert A. Robinson)

(Our author, having entered the armed services at the age of 18, spent some time in the Aleutians. He evaluates the defense effort from the points of view of many young men in the services, high-school and university students, as well as his own, and has based his article on these observations.)

There is strife in the American home today. The shoes have switched feet. Youth is attempting to educate its parents. But parents seem harder to educate than they claim their youngsters once were. Paradoxical? Yes, but true.

In many homes we have the strange situation of youth trying to reorient their parents' thinking along lines which will be most conducive to the over-all good of the Nation—namely, legislation for universal military training and the 18-year-old draft.

The pros and cons of these issues seem to strike right at the home itself. Many homes are finding that there is a rift in the thinking of the parents and their children. Many mothers, either from maternal or other views, do not wish their sons to go. On the other hand, the sons desire to do what they deem is in the best interest for the country as a whole.

Parents, as voters, are exercising their constitutional prerogative of writing to their Congressmen about the 18-year-old draft and UMT legislation now pending in Congress. The elder statesmen, military men, educators, and organized groups have all voiced their opinions, but, up to now, youth has been reticent.

From my conversation with students, veterans, servicemen, and those who are working, I feel that youth seems forcefully to recognize that the United States must be strong; to be strong we must maintain a well-trained military force; and that, last but not least, they constitute this force.

We agree, youth says, that we need an army; we agree it is youth's responsibility. Why, then, all the complications and debate? youth is asking today. All we ask is that the system be a fair one, with equitable distribution in length of service.

Many of those in the high schools and colleges in the 18-to-20 age bracket, looking ahead, feel that they are capable of taking on the responsibilities that military service incurs. Those to whom I have spoken who have already served look back and, speaking with more authority, generally agree that no undue hardships were sustained by virtue of service alone. They clearly recognize that there are temptations to which young men entering military service must remain alert, but that mere watchful consideration of these principles should not deter us from using those who can serve best.

Some feel that life in an army camp is not at all conducive to the higher things in life. On the other side, there are sentiments expressed by one college graduate, considered an adept student of history, who pointed to another line of thinking. He thought that we should have had universal military training 30 years ago, and that perhaps we would have spared ourselves much.

He pointed out that all other major powers by 1938, except Great Britain and the United States, had UMT. In 1938 the British adopted it, and now we stand alone. He believes we should not adopt it solely because we stand alone but by its proved merits. In view of the fact that we want a North Atlantic agreement with teeth in it, he poses this question: Why should not we as leaders catch up to our allies in this one field, so we could keep astride of our leadership?

Youth appears not only to be thinking of direct military service but also to be tying together the lessons they are learning, or have learned, about the world's past mistakes. Many students speak in ordinary conversational terms of the mistakes in not deterring aggression in Manchuria in 1931, in Ethiopia in 1936, and in Poland in 1939, and they point to the lesson of the man with the umbrella.

The majority seem to recognize the signs and see a direct approach to stopping aggression wherever it may occur by being prepared. Therefore youth, I feel, is agreeing with the UMT provisions. Not only do many graduates, veterans, and students consider it an essential step to maintain peace and cooperate with the UN, but think it is an essential part of the draft. They reason that any selective service system without UMT to keep a growing trained reserve would naturally increase the length of time each draftee would have to serve.

Congressman HILLINGS, of California, himself only 28 years of age, the youngest Representative in Congress, reflected the opinion of youth when he said: "UMT is an essential realistic approach to peace. Military service alone is not detrimental, but in effect gives an individual a more balanced perspective of and tolerance for the beliefs of people with whom he associates."

The second youngest Representative, Congressman BENTSEN, of Texas, substantiated the views of youth by reference to his own experience as an enlisted man. It was his observation that men in the service matured more rapidly but were not altered in their moral standards.

Both Congressmen were of the opinion that their colleagues feel substantially that UMT and the 18-year-old draft are very advisable under the circumstances. It is quite significant to note that over 50 percent of the Members of both Houses of Congress (59 out of 96 Senators and 224 out of 435 Representatives) have seen military service.

These same Congressmen feel that the preponderance of mail against UMT and the 18-year-old draft is coming from mothers who have sons who would be directly affected by the pending legislation. And these adult views, constituting votes, count quite heavily with Congressmen. They also feel that hearing directly from youth itself could produce a wholesome effect on Congress.

It could be that while youth is trying to educate their elders they might very well take a lesson from them in forcefully making their views part of public opinion.

As a Defense Project the St. Lawrence Seaway Is Substantially Worthless

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. JAMES E. VAN ZANDT
OF PENNSYLVANIA
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES
Thursday, April 5, 1951

Mr. VAN ZANDT. Mr. Speaker, the following editorial from the January 15, 1951, issue of the Springfield (Mass.) Union reveals that as a defense instrument the St. Lawrence project is substantially worthless from the point of view of both power and navigation.

The editorial follows:

THE DEFENSE LABEL

Among other things, the President advocates an immediate start on construction of the St. Lawrence seaway. He says the navigation features and the power capacity of the St. Lawrence project are necessary for the national defense.

It seems that all one has to do to justify increased taxes, swollen national debt, and usurpation of enterprise by bureaucracy is to talk of the necessity for national defense. As a defense instrument the St. Lawrence development is substantially worthless, from the point of view of both power and navigation.

The 570,000 kilowatts of firm power which could be developed on the American side of the river would be scarcely a drop in the bucket; certainly not the indispensable thing for national defense that has been pictured by the more ardent of the advocates. Again, there's no need to point out that, small though the St. Lawrence development would be in the total picture, it would, nevertheless, represent an ideal objective of aerial warfare, particularly when combined with the bottleneck features of transportation to and from the Great Lakes Basin.

The St. Lawrence proponents cheerfully pass up the hundreds of millions of dollars and the many thousands of defense personnel necessary to guard this concentrated facility against attack from the air and from the Gulf of St. Lawrence. It may be trite to note that one well-placed bomb would wreck the entire project. Army engineers have stated that one bomb could destroy the Panama Canal. The St. Lawrence is a more accessible target.

There is only one way to provide power capacity for national defense, beyond what would be created by the natural operation of economic process. That way is to create the capacity and hold it idle against the day when more power may be needed than can be dug up by conversion of industry and by operation on a three-shift basis.

As a hard-headed, practical matter, if we must have idle capacity in preparation for war, the best way to have it is as extra reserve capacity in the diversified power plants scattered throughout the country, reasonably close to the munition industries. Even the advocates of the St. Lawrence seem to recognize the fact that the project would not create idle power capacity, since, in their enthusiasm for a really good story, they envisage a managed economy whereunder industry would be brought to the region from less subsidized parts of the country, and all the capacity utilized right up to the hilt under a preferential process of definitely socialistic character; and this quite regardless of defense needs.

We have then an interesting device whereby, in the guise of equipping us to fight a war for freedom, an additional collectivist undertaking is advanced.

No nation, not even ours, has a fund of resources beyond its needs. What we squander must come out of what we should usefully employ. What we waste on a fictitious defense must be at the expense of our real ability to take care of ourselves or must mean adoption of a lower standard of living. Every capital expenditure put into the hands of Government is, with the personnel related to it, just so much of our strength frozen into the rigidity of superorganization.

It is regrettable that the President has lent his ear to the public power gang. They are bent on complete collectivization of electric power supply and they are confident they can get it. Only the votes of the citizens of this country can stop them. Only public respect for enterprises that are competent, only public appreciation of the superior services private companies render, self-supporting taxpayers, and public disfavors for agencies that waste public resources in unjustifiable projects can produce those votes.

Saving Money for the Post Office Department

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. JOHN J. SPARKMAN

OF ALABAMA

IN THE SENATE OF THE UNITED STATES

Thursday, April 5 (legislative day of Monday, March 26), 1951

Mr. SPARKMAN. Mr. President, a few days ago there appeared in the press a news article dealing with the suggestion of an 8-year-old boy of Mobile, Ala., which has enabled the Post Office Department to effect a considerable saving.

I ask unanimous consent to have the article, together with a brief editorial which appeared in a recent issue of the Washington News, printed in the RECORD.

There being no objection, the article and editorial were ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

IDEA OF MOBILE YOUNGSTER TO SAVE POST OFFICE SOME MONEY

WASHINGTON, March 28.—An 8-year-old down in Mobile, Ala., has brought about a money-saving change in the stamping of air mail.

He is Gregg Buckalaw, post office box 1378, Mobile.

He recently wrote to Postmaster General Jesse M. Donaldson suggesting that the "via" be dropped from the phrase "via air mail" which post offices everywhere rubber-stamp on items for plane delivery. "Via" is Latin for "by way of."

Donaldson has advised Gregg that his suggestion is good and is being promptly adopted.

The youngster wrote, with an accompanying illustration:

"You can save a lot of money by doing this. You can save by taking the via off the air-mail letters. You can save almost a third of rubber and it is a critical war material besides.

"Yours truly,

"GREGG BUCKALAW."

The Postmaster General replied:

"The postal service belongs to all the people and serves all the people, and one of the reasons why the Post Office Department can give so much service for so little is that people like you are interested and take time to write letters to me, suggesting ways for improving the service and reducing expenses.

"I am issuing instructions that hereafter all rubber stamps purchased by the Post Office Department for endorsing letters and parcels to be sent by air will read "air mail," omitting the word "via," which after all is entirely unnecessary.

"Sincerely yours,

"JESSE M. DONALDSON."

SAVING NOT ESTIMATED

Donaldson made no estimate of how much money will be saved.

At Mobile, Gregg told reporters he came across the idea by curiosity.

A few weeks ago he received an air-mail letter from his brother Vardy, a student at the University of North Carolina.

His attention centered on the marking "via air mail."

"What does the 'via' mean?" he asked his father, who is an accountant.

Buckalaw explained the Latin meaning.

"Why don't they just say 'air mail'?" young Gregg wanted to know.

The father explained that the stamp was a standard procedure set up by the Post Office Department.

"Can't they change it? They could save a lot of money by leaving off one word," Gregg continued.

It wasn't such a bad idea at that, his father decided. He suggested Gregg write Donaldson.

Two days later he presented his penciled letter for his parent's approval.

It began: "Let me tell you how the post office can save a lot of money and help the war effort * * *."

Gregg, a third-grader, said he was proud his suggestion had been approved and he was exceptionally happy over his personal letter from the Postmaster General.

[From the Washington Daily News]

IT'S THAT EASY

Sometimes, saving the people's money is so simple that an 8-year-old boy can grasp it.

In fact, one did. Gregg Buckalaw, of Mobile, Ala., wrote United States Postmaster General Donaldson suggesting that the "via" be dropped from "via air mail" stamped on items for plane delivery.

"You can save almost a third of the rubber," Gregg pointed out, "and rubber is a critical war material besides." Gregg's right. Lord knows how many thousands of hand stamps were to be bought for the country's post offices next year with that wholly needless word.

The Post Office Department is going to adopt the idea, and Gregg got a nice letter. He ought to be fetched to Washington and turned loose with a nice, shiny new Boy Scout ax.

Assignment of Troops to Europe

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. HENRY CABOT LODGE, JR.

OF MASSACHUSETTS

IN THE SENATE OF THE UNITED STATES

Thursday, April 5 (legislative day of Monday, March 26), 1951

Mr. LODGE. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to have printed in the Appendix of the RECORD an editorial entitled "Troops to Europe," which appeared in the Boston Post on April 4, 1951.

There being no objection, the editorial was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

TROOPS TO EUROPE

In expressing a belief that President Truman should consult the Congress before sending more than four divisions of troops to Europe the Senate did not expressly set that limit, but served notice on the President that appropriations for a larger force would be difficult to get if as Commander in Chief the President flouted the wishes of the Senate.

This somewhat cautious action effectively ties the President's hands in dealing with any sudden emergency which may arise in Europe, and is characteristic of the thinking which prevails in the Senate when it is obsessed with an approaching national election.

A coalition of Republicans and southern Democrats put over the handcuffed measure even as the President of France, Vincent Auriol, warned a joint session of Congress that right without might is powerless and that isolation is death. Neutralism, the Frenchman declared, is a moral absurdity and geographical and historical nonsense.

President Auriol spoke from a full heart and bitter experience as the Senate was ready to vote on the handcuff measure that would limit our contribution to article 3 of the North Atlantic Treaty to four divisions.

Votes, however, are not found in the exposed marches of Western Europe where the full fury of the Red hordes may one day burst upon the Western World with the fury of barbarism. Votes are here in the United States, in the caucus rooms of the Congress and in the delusive yearnings for peace without present risk.

The Soviet Union has existed in a state of total mobilization through all its existence. Readiness for war is the foundation of its whole economy. In two more years the United States will be in a position to stand forth as a mighty nation fearless of the threat of war constantly brandished by the Soviet Union.

The handcuff resolution in the Senate is a tragic example of expediency. At the moment we haven't got four divisions to send to Europe, nor will such a force be available for many months. Yet, to serve public notice on the Soviet Union, that four divisions is the limit of our contribution to the common defense is like presenting them with a prefabricated plan of operation on how many divisions they will need to overwhelm the forces in Western Europe.

It is the case of Guam all over again. Back in the days when Guam was the anchor of our strategic position in the Pacific the Congress refused to fortify the island and strengthen it as a Gibraltar of the western Pacific. After Pearl Harbor the monstrous mistake was conveniently forgotten, smothered under the rush of war plans. It can be the same sort of ghastly error of judgment on troops to Europe.

Why and What Are We Fighting For in Korea?

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. JOHN J. SPARKMAN
OF ALABAMA
IN THE SENATE OF THE UNITED STATES
Thursday, April 5 (legislative day of Monday, March 26), 1951

Mr. SPARKMAN. Mr. President, a few days ago there appeared in the Huntsville (Ala.) Times-Sun a full page advertisement inserted by the local post of the American Legion. It is entitled "Why and What Are We Fighting For in Korea?" I think it is a very fine statement. In it is included an article written by Hal Boyle, of the Associated Press, dealing with the same subject.

I ask unanimous consent to have the advertisement printed in the Appendix of the RECORD.

There being no objection, the advertisement was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

HAL BOYLE, OF THE ASSOCIATED PRESS, GIVES THE ANSWER, IN OUR OPINION, AS TO WHY AND WHAT ARE WE FIGHTING FOR IN KOREA?

We believe these truths to be self-evident:

1. That communism seeks the overthrow of all democratic governments.

2. That the Kremlin seeks world domination.

3. That Kremlin communism is and has been actively working within our own borders for the destruction of our form of government.

4. That Kremlin communism is and has been waging an all-out underground war cleverly designed to achieve world domination without a shooting war.

5. That the Kremlin Communists are preparing, as rapidly as possible, for an all-out shooting war with the objective of world domination.

6. That the time for all freedom-loving people to take a stand against the Kremlin is now.

7. That the place where this stand is to be taken must be determined by the United Nations to which we must remain loyal.

8. That our forefathers purchased and paid for their freedom with their own personal sacrifices and efforts.

9. That the freedom we inherited from our forefathers can be maintained only by our own personal sacrifices and efforts.

Our young men of this great Tennessee Valley are again being called upon to devote their efforts and make personal sacrifices in order that we may continue to enjoy our cherished freedom. As many of them had done before, and, as the young men of many generations before them, they have responded willingly and have done and are doing a fine job of upholding the high standards which the world has come to recognize as "made in America." We are always justly proud of our young men, but we are especially proud of our young men now serving under the United Nations colors against the most vicious enemy and under the most difficult circumstances known to our history.

Comrades, we of Post 37, American Legion, salute you, and we salute your families you have left behind—for the truly American spirit and courage they have shown in recognizing and resisting the efforts of local propagandists to spread dissatisfaction and dissension among them with false and misleading statements in regard to the Korean war. We appreciate that "they also serve who sit and wait."

HAL BOYLE SAYS

(Reprinted from Huntsville Times of Friday, March 23)

"NEW YORK.—Somewhere in Korea 3 weeks ago an American soldier picked up an enemy propaganda leaflet.

"Even since then the questions it raised have haunted him and members of his infantry squad.

"The faded leaflet—it is on my desk now—is a greeting from 'The Chinese People's Army Volunteer Forces' to the American troops. It wished them a merry Christmas and a peaceful New Year and asked:

" 'Why are you slaughtering the Korean people and burning their homes down—freezing and dying 5,000 miles from home where you belong with your families? Why aren't you enjoying a turkey dinner like the Wall Street financiers who sent you here to fight for their profits?

" 'We do not want to fight you, and we bear you no ill-will, knowing that you, like us, are ordinary laboring people and that you have been duped by American warmongers and their Wall Street bosses.

" 'We only want you to go home, so that we Korean and Chinese people can build the lives we want and live in peace.'

"Somewhere in Korea Sgt. Donald Caine of the Eighth Cavalry Regiment sat down and wrote a letter in pencil. He put the leaflet in the envelope and mailed it to me.

" 'We realize that enemy propaganda is one of their greatest weapons,' he wrote. 'But in our position how can we help but believe parts of this? So we'd like for you to help us get an answer to some of these questions.'

"I don't feel I'm the one to give the answers. But here is my reply to Sergeant Caine and the boys in the Fourth Squad of the First Platoon of the First Battalion of the Eighth Regiment of the First United States Cavalry Division, fighting somewhere in Korea since last July.

" 'That leaflet would trouble any honest man if it were true. But it isn't true. And it isn't simply an earnest plea for peace, written by one soldier to a soldier on the other side.

" 'It is the effort of a skilled propagandist. He wants to confuse you, to make you homesick, to make you doubt your cause and feel your sacrifices are useless and unnecessary.

" 'If he should succeed in making a majority of American soldiers feel this way, we will have to pull out of Korea entirely. And, in time, I think that means we will have to fight a third world war in our own homeland—and our own families will become the refugees.

" 'You aren't fighting for the profits of Wall Street financiers—or just to save Seoul or Taegu. You're fighting for a chance to keep war forever away from your own town—Main Street, United States of America.

" 'Of course, it is true the average Chinese soldier doesn't in his heart bear you any real ill will. You probably don't bear him individually any ill will either. Soldiers in any war rarely hate each other on a personal basis.

" 'I know the word "freedom" may sound ponderous and hollow in ears filled with the noise of crunching mortars. But it is a basic word—basic as hunger and fear. And freedom is your goal. Eventual freedom in the world from war and fear and hunger.

" 'You came into Korea under a blue and white flag of the United Nations, pledged to bring unity and freedom to that country. Why is the Chinese so-called volunteer there? He came under the Red flag of real slaughter—the slaughter of the long dream of Korean independence.

" 'And if he wins there, it won't be just Korean independence that will disappear. Step by step the Red armies of China and Russia will march across other countries unable to defend themselves alone, and gradually swallow the world piecemeal.

" 'That would be quite all right, too, if it meant a better life finally for us all. But communism hasn't been able to do that anywhere. Freedom has always brought more happiness than has slavery. And it is better to fight for a free world than a slave one.

" 'It is a lie that the Korean people want you to go home. They want you to stay and help them win a real peace. They dread the Chinese, and you know it.

" 'The truth is you are a military pioneer, fighting for the first time on a barricade defending all mankind's yearning for a final world peace. It's always lonely on a barricade, but no soldiers ever fought to hold a higher wall of hope.

" 'And if you hold it, the race of man will honor you forever.' "

Wheat for India

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. FRAZIER REAMS
OF OHIO
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES
Thursday, April 5, 1951

Mr. REAMS. Mr. Speaker, under unanimous consent to extend my remarks in the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD, I include an editorial from the Toledo Blade of March 19, 1951, on the subject, Wheat for India:

WHEAT FOR INDIA

Both President Truman and former President Herbert Hoover have urged that Congress lay aside all question of the international politics involved and sanction the gift of some 2,000,000 bushels of wheat to relieve famine in India. Yet Congress continues to put off action, and in so doing lends substance to suspicion abroad that America's vaunted humanitarianism applies only to countries whose governments dance to the political tune we call. In this instance congressional indifference to the India wheat bill will be attributed to pique caused by the Nehru government's opposition to our Korean policy in the United Nations.

India first made overtures in January, suggesting proudly—but unrealistically considering the state of its pocketbook—that a wheat shipment be financed by a long-term loan. The President placed his recommendations before Congress in early February. The Senate Foreign Relations Committee has not even scheduled a hearing yet. The House Foreign Affairs Committee has approved the shipment, but its bill is bottled up in the Rules Committee.

America has always prided itself on its generosity in relieving the distress caused by natural disasters—earthquake, flood, and famine—in other lands. These actions, prompted by no thought of gain, political or otherwise, have been responsible for storing up a vast reservoir of good will toward the United States which the most violent propaganda of our enemies has been unable to exhaust.

The longer Congress delays favorable action on wheat for India the more it gives the appearance of putting a price tag on American benevolence. The longer it delays the less will be the gratitude with which seemingly reluctant help is received. If it delays much longer, it will perhaps be necessary to label our gift "Not to be opened until the next famine."

Friendship for Russians

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. BRIEN McMAHON
OF CONNECTICUT
IN THE SENATE OF THE UNITED STATES
Thursday, April 5 (legislative day of Monday, March 26), 1951

Mr. McMAHON. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that there be printed in the Appendix of the RECORD an editorial entitled "Friendship for Russians," which appeared in the Washington Post this morning.

There being no objection, the editorial was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

FRIENDSHIP FOR RUSSIANS

A number of distinguished Americans—distinguished, among other things, for their realism about the Soviet Union and their unrelenting opposition to American Communists—have formed an organization to promote friendship with the Russian people "over the heads of the Kremlin regime." Calling themselves "Friends of Fighters for Russian Freedom," they set forth two objectives—to mobilize American support for anti-Communist elements inside Russia and to provide material aid for refugees from that land and for Red army deserters. Behind these purposes lies the same sound impulse that led Senator BRIEN MCMAHON recently to propose a Senate resolution (which Secretary Acheson the other day commended most heartily) expressing the friendship of this country for the Russian people as distinct from their despotic and aggressive government.

There is need for expressions of this sort both for the clarification of American thinking on the subject and for a rectification of America's position as interpreted by the rest of the free world. The notion has become current abroad—fanned energetically by Soviet propaganda—that we are implacable foes of everything Russian and likely to embark upon a war as a result of our unreasoning hatred. We have no doubt that this is very far from the feeling of most Americans. As a people we have an abhorrence of all forms of tyranny—in part because we know that dictatorship, whether of the so-called right or the so-called left, degrades the human spirit; in part because we know, too, that dictatorships are made inevitably dangerous to free peoples by reason of the inner tensions that compel them to seek expansion.

But love of liberty is a universal human attribute. The fatal weakness of dictatorships is that, however rigid their rule, men living under them will always seek an opportunity to escape or to revolt. Many are doubtless seeking such an opportunity behind the iron curtain today. There is ample evidence of it from those who have been able to cross the line and seek asylum among freemen. (You find few men going the other way.) They deserve asylum when their good faith can be established; they deserve the friendship of the free; they deserve a helping hand and a word of hope—not alone for their sake but for our own as well. The enmity of America is toward oppression—not toward the victims of oppression.

Farmers Will Stop Communism

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. CLYDE R. HOEY
OF NORTH CAROLINA
IN THE SENATE OF THE UNITED STATES
Thursday, April 5 (legislative day of Monday, March 26), 1951

Mr. HOEY. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to have printed in the Appendix of the RECORD a very thoughtful and informative article entitled "Farmers Will Stop Communism," by Charles Morrow Wilson, which appeared in the April issue of the Progressive Farmer.

There being no objection, the article was ordered to be printe ! in the RECORD, as follows:

FARMERS WILL STOP COMMUNISM

(By Charles Morrow Wilson)

My acquaintance with Soviet Russia began on a September morning in 1923 down in Conway, Ark. I was a junior at the State university, and I had been working that summer for a south Arkansas cotton planter who was also a cotton buyer. On this particular morning the boss sent me to meet the early train at Conway and a stranger who would be on the train, a foreign cotton buyer.

When the train pulled in, one passenger got off. He was a blocky little man who wore a black derby hat and a blue serge suit several sizes too big for him, and walked with a noticeable limp. When I introduced myself, he lifted his derby and waved it at me, then shoved a leather dufflebag at me, meanwhile holding his briefcase.

I asked him where he wanted to go first. "To luck at de gotten." He replaced his hat and added, "And tuck vid gotten farmers." It was easy to translate this. He wanted to see the cotton and talk with cotton farmers.

I began learning something about my unusual guest. His name was Alex Gumberg. He was then head of the original Soviet Russian trading organization, Amtorg. He had come to buy American cotton for supplying the first set-up of Soviet state textile mills. As of that time, he was the No. 1 cotton buyer of all creation; in 1 year he had bought 27,000,000 bales in five countries. Interestingly he had accepted no commission.

By very gradual degrees the Russian told me he had been one of the original 1917 Revolutionaries. He had been first an assistant to Kerensky, the great liberal who tried unsuccessfully to make Russia a democracy, and then of Lenin, one of the fathers of statism. But Gumberg believed in democracy and for that reason had already set out to become an American citizen.

HE SAW COMMUNISM'S WEAK SPOT

He was born in the wheat-growing Ukraine, the son of a country school teacher. Thereafter his family moved to Georgia, Russia's far south province. I asked him why Russia could not produce its own cotton in this great and fertile south province. He answered very frankly that the revolutionaries were unable to control the farmers; that they had already shot or liquidated too many of the good farmers of the potential Soviet cotton belt and couldn't get the limited acreages already grown to the state mills. He confided another opinion I have never forgotten—he believed the Soviets' inability to get along with the capable farmers would turn out to be the downfall of the whole Soviet experiment.

My friendship with Alex lasted for 16 years, or until his death in 1939. After this one-time revolutionary had made a world-respected agency of Amtorg, he helped found the Russian-American Chamber of Commerce. Next the Chase National Bank made Gumberg head of its pioneering department in Russian trade. After that, Alex became one of the principal brain trusters and executive employees of the Atlas Corp., the renowned investment corporation which during the 1930's owned and operated virtually every namable type of property from turkey or apricot farms to sugar-beet mills, plane factories, city hotels, and Madison Square Garden. Alex Gumberg became an American citizen and a very loyal one. Franklin D. Roosevelt mentioned him as one of the "most enlightened minds of the century."

GUMBERG A GOOD AND JUST BOSS

When I went to work for the Atlas Corp. Alex was my boss, and he was a good and just boss. We used to talk over his earlier cotton-buying adventures in Dixie, and Alex kept hoping that Soviet Russia would eventually find and prove its place as a principal farming nation.

Meanwhile his relations with the high moguls of Sovietdom remained friendly. He was an honor guest at the social shindigs which marked America's formal recognition of Soviet Russia and Stalin sent him special Christmas greetings and occasionally a keg of caviar.

One Christmas Eve Alex inveigled me into serving as a Russian-style Santa Claus, because at the time I was the only one momentarily available and thin enough to slip into the gold furred elaborately bemedaled costume and the high shiny boots of the Russian St. Nicholas. After the toasts and vodkas that night, Gumberg joined me for a glass of water. He remarked that every high-ranking U. S. S. R. man at the party was "a city slicker"; that the great danger and the ruinous weakness of the Soviet still lay in the Kremlin's failure to understand and get along with the three-fourths of Russians who are country folks. He predicted flatly that farmers would trip Stalin and stop communism, since the best Russian farmers still saw the Kremlin gangs as "just another wave of imperialism."

This comment impressed me. At the time, 1936, the most brilliant Soviet employee in the United States was Jean Ahrens, the U. S. S. R.'s consul general to New York. Ahrens, a handsome Paris-educated son of a former Moscow banker, had already made a brilliant record as a Stalin industralist. He had established and managed one of the earlier Soviet show factories. For this he had won promotion to consul general to our greatest city where he was seeking to build trade for the U. S. S. R. in the United States.

DEVOTED TO STALIN CAUSE

Unlike Alex Gumberg, who had never really approved Stalin and the red czars of the Kremlin, Ahrens was a devoted Stalin man. One day Ahrens asked me to his palatial New York office for tea and set out to convert me. Under cross questioning he admitted, like Alex Gumberg, that lack of know-how in getting along with the farmers was the most serious danger to Kremlin futures. "For that reason," Ahrens continued, "and as a friend, I want you to show me something about farmers in the United States—how and why they click."

Plainly that was a big assignment. But my boss in the Atlas Corp. approved, and in the spring of 1936 Ahrens and I made an extensive auto junket together, beginning in upstate New York. The first day we visited a gathering of county agricultural agents. Ahrens liked and admired the group immensely. "We need men like that back in Russia," he explained. "We need them here, too," I answered.

Next day we visited some nearby seed farms. Ahrens admired the work and the accomplishments but insisted that improving plants and distributing them is a job for the Government. A seed farm proprietor explained that as an American businessman he produces and sells superior seeds at a fair profit, thereby placing them in the line of public good.

Ahrens seemed confused. The seed farmer added that the United States nursery and seed industries, respected and relied on throughout the world, have grown great and endure by private enterprise and competitive marketing; this while respecting science and respecting governments. Ahrens scratched his head and began jotting notes on the back of a pocket calendar.

Later that day we visited a prominent vegetable farm near Utica. The farmer was a highly vocal anti-New Dealer. He spoke precisely what he thought. Ahrens commented that in Russia farmers are liquidated for saying less than that about their government.

"Maybe that's another reason why the Kremlin can't get along with farmers," I suggested.

Ahrens was thoughtful. We went back to a village hotel and as we ate supper the Kremlin man began writing a report to his superiors. Maybe he wrote too much. Three days later a "secretary" who looked more like a paid gunman, overtook us in western Ohio and hauled Ahrens back to New York and Washington. The following week the consul general war returned to the U. S. S. R.

RUSSIAN FARMERS DISSATISFIED

Early the following year I went into Soviet Russia's Ukraine on a business trip and was permitted to get a quick glimpse of the "collective farms." The latter were doing badly. Soviet food, even in the favored "political" restaurants, was deplorable. Party workers were permitted to speak of "faulty distribution." But even a tourist could see what the real reason was—it was obviously bad farming and worse leadership of farmers.

At that time (1936) the Kremlin reported that in all the U. S. S. R. there were about 11,000 major state farms which employed about 2,400,000 men and women. Far greater in total were the 240,000 artels or collective farms on which lived about 18,000,000 farm families. As of 1938, the Kremlin boasted that 99 percent of all Russian agriculture had been sovietized.

NINE MAJOR FAMINES

Then as now the U. S. S. R. was trumpeting that supplying food is an obligation of the state. But the state had not fulfilled that obligation. The Kremlin had officially admitted nine major famines during the 1930's. We know that the founding of collective farms at gun's point brought vast blood purges and tragic declines in food production.

Only recently one of Stalin's least censored spokesmen, Dr. H. E. Sigerist, gave me this information:

"During the 1930's and again after World War II, the U. S. S. R. was obliged to employ force in founding or reorganizing the collective farms. Even after the terrific effort of the first 5-year plan, the country still faced a very serious food emergency. Party members sent out over the entire countryside employed every known medium of propaganda to educate the peasant and convince him of the superiority of the new agricultural system. Yet, then as before and since, a regular war had to be fought with these peasants who openly sabotaged the state's farm program. They preferred to feed their grain to the animals and to slaughter the cattle and hogs rather than deliver them to the collectives."

FIVE MILLION "ERASED"?

There is no way of finding out exactly how many Russian farmers have been executed, murdered or otherwise erased for failing to toe all the furrows laid out by the Kremlin Party planners. One respected Associated Press correspondent has estimated the total as 5,000,000 prior to 1950. The Kremlin has officially reported at least seven mass purges of Russian farming people during the past 15 years and has boasted that the soukhozes, one time champion farmers of the Russians, are now wiped out.

Kremlin propagandists still bellow the praises of the bewhiskered little German college professor named Karl Marx, though they change or "reinterpret" what the latter wrote—more or less at will.

Even so, Kremlin pundits cannot get around the fact that Marx neither knew nor cared about farming. He played on industrialism as the major revolution of his times and its many errors and injustices in a profit-greedy, amateur era of new factories and newly rich people before labor gained any of the rights it enjoys today. Marx preached revolution against an industrial revolution. But the little man with long whiskers failed to consider the agricultural backgrounds of industrialism.

The Soviet revolution was distinctly a city man's brain storm which grew in and spread from the three principal cities of that huge, disjointed nation called the Union of Soviet Socialist Republics. But the Kremlin has kept on holding gun butts and leveled sights over its great rural provinces.

COMMANDS IN 117 TONGUES

The Kremlin still publishes or broadcasts its commands and propagandas in 117 different languages and dialects, in order to be understood by all or most of the Russians. Meanwhile Russian farmers have never had any real voice in government.

In the latening 1930's, while United States tourists, I among them, were being permitted to catch brief and carefully supervised glimpses inside Soviet Russia, the Kremlin, while admitting that the collective farms were having serious trouble feeding their own people and villages, much less exporting foods, were flooding the propaganda mills with stories about perennial wheat, rubber-bearing dandelions, air transport of breeding livestock, and other great attainments of Soviet agriculture. No doubt some of those stories were reliable. But on the whole the U. S. S. R. bread baskets were not.

COULDN'T WIN OWN PEOPLE

Ironically Kremlin propagandists were working hard, expensively, and in some part brilliantly to win friends among other farmers when they couldn't win their own. Actually they never really succeeded in winning farm friends or influencing farm people beyond U. S. S. R. boundaries.

Too Much Interference and Help From the Government

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. JOHN C. STENNIS
OF MISSISSIPPI
IN THE SENATE OF THE UNITED STATES

Thursday, April 5 (legislative day of Monday, March 26), 1951

Mr. STENNIS. Mr. President, the Kemper County Messenger, a weekly newspaper, is edited and published in my home town of DeKalb, Kemper County, Miss., by Mr. Lamar Sledge, who is ably assisted by his wife, Mrs. Frances Sledge. In the March 22, 1951, issue of this grass-roots rural newspaper, Mrs. Sledge has a column of special value which I think most aptly and clearly states some of the cardinal virtues of sound Americanism, whose practice made our Nation great, and without which we cannot continue on a sound basis. I should like to have the entire membership of the Congress read her column, and should also like to have it shared by all the people of the Nation. I therefore ask that it be inserted in the Appendix of the RECORD.

There being no objection, the article was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

I am interested in some old-fashioned Americanism because for some time I have been alarmed to see our people and our free enterprise hampered by too much interference and help from the Government. I am like an old hen. I don't believe in helping chicks out of their shell. I want an opportunity for my boy and girls to attain a place in this world of ours by their own industry and ability, and not on a subsidy from a Government that can tell them what to teach in school, how to conduct their business or what church to belong to, as long as they respect the God-given code of moral conduct.

Too much help from anyone: parents, friends, government, is a curse to the recipient.

Our people seem to pride themselves on an illusion of poverty, afraid to admit to having material possessions earned by their honest labor, for fear a new tax might take it away. * * *

That is what has happened to us since WPA, etc. made it profitable to be too poor or too trifling to support your family. I'm sick of it. I'm glad I have never seen my children hungry or cold, and would be ashamed to have to have help to support them as long as I have health and average intelligence.

Thirty-third Anniversary of Lithuanian Independence

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. JOHN W. McCORMACK
OF MASSACHUSETTS
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Thursday, April 5, 1951

Mr. McCORMACK. Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my remarks in the RECORD, I include the following resolution unanimously adopted at a mass meeting held in the auditorium of the South Boston High School on February 18, 1951, under the auspices of the American Lithuanian Council, Boston chapter, approximately 2,000 American Lithuanians of Boston and vicinity being present to commemorate the thirty-third anniversary of the independence of Lithuania and to protest against the despotism, tyranny, and genocide being practiced in and upon Lithuania and its people by barbarous Soviet Russia:

Whereas the Soviet Union, by deception, fraud, and Machiavellian politics, desecrated and profaned as well as crushed Lithuania as a government and as a nation, perfidiously undermining its right to existence and to be free and independent in the family of nations; and

Whereas the Soviet Union, in its bloodthirsty zeal to subject the entire world to the dictates of international communism, is extirpating the Lithuanian nation by heretofore unheard of atrocities; and

Whereas these bolshevik acts of abnominable and outrageous cruelty have not been curbed up to now, nor cognizance taken thereof in international fora, and the concomitant genocide goes unchallenged; and

Whereas about 1,000,000 Lithuanians have been taken from their homes and have been either annihilated or cast into the wild wastes of Siberia to perish;

Now, therefore, we here assembled to rededicate ourselves in espousal of a free and independent Lithuania, certify our recognition of the benefits unbounded of the liberty which we enjoy in this great bulwark of freedom, the United States of America, and hereby resolve:

1. That our emphatic and unmitigated protest be recorded in connection with the unwarranted subjugation of Lithuania and unjustified enslavement of its people and progressive extermination of its race.

2. That the President of the United States and its Congress be entreated to induce all international comity and authority to terminate as soon as possible the awful transgressions being engaged in by the Bolsheviks against the sovereignty and people of Lithuania and to compel the withdrawal of the Communist hordes from the territory of Lithuania, simultaneously reestablishing Lithuania as an independent nation with Vilna as its capital.

3. That the prevailing lethargy concerning the genocide going on in Lithuania be rent asunder and that the United Nations and the civilized world as a whole intercede to lend support for the eradication of this barbarity and toward reestablishment of an independent Lithuania.

4. That the American people as well as all other freedom-loving peoples be enlisted in the ranks against the Asiatic barbarians and their savage bolshevism wherever they establish their ramparts, to the end that all nations, including Lithuania, be free and rid of Bolshevik enslavement.

5. That copies of this resolution be forwarded to the President of the United States, to all Members of the Congress of the United States, to the Secretary of the United Nations, to the Papal Delegate, and to the representatives in the United States of the Governments of Great Britain, France, Italy, Sweden, Denmark, Norway, Portugal, Belgium, Poland, Finland, Estonia, Latvia, and to the American press.

Universal Military Training

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. M. G. BURNSIDE
OF WEST VIRGINIA
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES
Thursday, April 5, 1951

Mr. BURNSIDE. Mr. Speaker, there have been statements made on this floor regarding the position of the American Legion on selective service and universal military training.

To make that organization perfectly clear, I include the following telegram in the RECORD:

WASHINGTON, D. C., April 4, 1951.
Hon. M. G. BURNSIDE,
House Office Building, Washington D. C.:

Request by cable from Rome to forward following message from National Commander Erle Cocke, Jr., to you: "Recent tour of Korean battlefront and American installations elsewhere in Asia and Europe confirms belief universal military training would have prevented untold casualties, saved many American lives, and will strengthen our future defense against communism. The American Legion urges support for universal military training and is strongly opposed to any amendment that would defer it or separate it from present bill."

Elements of Soviet Labor Law

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. PAUL H. DOUGLAS
OF ILLINOIS
IN THE SENATE OF THE UNITED STATES
Thursday, April 5 (legislative day of Monday, March 26), 1951

Mr. DOUGLAS. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to have printed in the Appendix of the RECORD part 1 of an article on elements of Soviet labor law, which appeared in the Monthly Labor Review for March 1951. This analysis well describes the iron rule of the Communist state which lies behind the facade of union organization and collective agreements in Russia. It is a helpful study of the wide differences between Soviet labor laws and industrial procedure, and those of our own free society. I ask for its insertion in order that the facts therein set forth may be available to all those who carry on the war of ideas and truth against the outlandish claims of apologists for Communist tyranny.

I am advised by the Public Printer that the manuscript is estimated to make 2½ pages of the RECORD, at a cost of $205.

There being no objection, the article was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

ELEMENTS OF SOVIET LABOR LAW—PART I

"Soviet Russia does not know of any 'free' contract of employment, nor of any legal relations usually connected with the concept of the employment contract * * * In Soviet Russia labor duty is the basis of labor relations."[1]

Thus did a contemporary Soviet authority on labor law characterize the situation in 1920. He was not referring to forced labor, so widely used in Soviet Russia, especially after 1930, but to the Soviet equivalent of "free" labor, the subject of the present article.

Generally speaking the concept put forward in the quotation is largely held today by the Soviet state; it governs to a great extent the functions of the trade unions and reflects the attitude of the Communist Party. Over the years it resulted in separate labor laws which are punitive rather than protective.

True, in 1920, private enterprise had been effectively barred under the policy known as militant communism. This was superseded in 1922 by the so-called new economic policy (NEP),[2] under which private enterprise, within certain limits, was readmitted and freedom of the employment contract was accorded some recognition. But this policy came to an end about 1929 with the inauguration of the first 5-year plan, which, according to Stalin, had been framed and executed to eliminate capitalist elements and to create an economic basis for a Socialist society.[3] Since then private enterprise has been banned.

THE NATURE OF SOVIET ENTERPRISE

When private enterprise finally disappeared in Russia the great majority of persons engaged in industry and commerce—from top executives to manual laborers—became employees of a single owner—the government.[4] In that sense there is no contrast between capital and labor in the Soviet Union. The Soviet Government claims that there is a "unity between the interests of the toilers of the Soviet Union and those of the Soviet Socialist State," as an official textbook on labor law stated in 1946.[5] However, such unity can hardly be demonstrated in reality. Soviet industrial organization shows that the fixed relationship between labor and state management took the place of the free relationships between labor and capital in capitalist countries.

Government-owned industry and commerce now operate on a different basis from that of the first years of the Soviet regime (1918–21). At that time, private enterprise and profit-making were outlawed without offering a substitute for satisfaction of personal ambition or an opportunity for extra earning.

In contrast, the policy adopted after the drive began for total socialization was popularly called "whips and cookies." On the one hand, concessions are made to the ever emerging personal ambition; but on the other, criminal law is put into operation in an effort to check the inefficiency of the entire economic system.

Government agencies engaged in business operate on a "commercial" basis (Khozialstvenny raschet) and enjoy a degree of formal independence and enter into contracts with each other and with private persons. Although they are government agencies they are supposed to act with the competitive vigor of a private enterprise (the principle of "Socialist competition"). This "independence" should not be overrated. As a Soviet text puts it: "The commercial basis is merely a special method of management of the national economy."[6] Planned assignments of higher bureaus set definite limits to their independence, to say nothing of continuous supervisory control by various government agencies and political control by the secret police and Communist Party.

Nevertheless, the management of a Soviet quasi corporation is as interested in obtaining the lowest unit labor cost as its capitalist prototype. A single executive is appointed by the head of the bureau under whose authority the enterprise (called "trust" in industry and "torg" in commerce) operates. He hires and fires, allocates wages, imposes penalties, and grants bonuses. Bonuses are paid from a special director's fund based on a percentage of the profits or savings. His own bonus also depends upon the efficiency of the enterprise. In case the output falls below standard quantity or quality, he is liable to imprisonment up to 8 years.

THE SOVIET WAGE PRACTICE

Private profit making is barred and the earnings of the bulk of the population are practically limited to wages and salaries. But the governmental scale of compensation for work, whether in money or comfort, aims to offer a substitute for profit making to stimulate efficiency. A system of wages and salaries is designed to allow wide latitude for differentials in wage, salary, and bonus payments. To this end the principles of piecework and bonuses for efficiency, without any guaranteed minimum wage, constitute the basis of compensation for work in Government industry, in collective farming, and in cooperatives.

Regardless of whether the employee is paid by time or by piece, he must attain a standard of output established by the management. If he fails to do so through his fault he is paid according to the quality and quantity of his output.[7] Progressive scales of piecework and bonuses for extra efficiency are issued by the government for individual industries and industry groups.

Numerous honorary titles—"Hero of Labor," and others—and medals carry with them distinct material benefit, such as tax exemption, right to extra housing space, etc. There are also personal salaries and personal pensions awarded without reference to any scale, and Stalin prizes amounting to as much as 300,000 rubles in a lump sum.

All this affords professional, managerial, and skilled labor remuneration in money and comfort greatly exceeding that given to the ordinary laborer. For example, a scale of salaries and wages for electrical-power plants, established in 1942 and still in force as late as 1946, ranged from 115 to 175 rubles monthly for janitorial services, to 1,000 to 3,000 rubles for a director.[8]

In 1934, Stalin frankly declared the underlying philosophy of his policy as follows: "Equalization in the sphere of demands and personal life is reactionary, petty bourgeois nonsense, worthy of a primitive ascetic sect and not of a socialist society organized in a Marxian way." [9]

However, material benefits thus promised evidently proved to be insufficient stimuli for good work.

Heavy responsibility is imposed upon both workers and management. Inefficiency involves not only loss of material benefits and possible loss of job, but prosecution in court as well. Workers are subject to penalties imposed by managers for loafing on the job and to court action for absenteeism and unauthorized quitting of the job. From 10 to 25 years in a forced labor camp,[10] with or without confiscation of property, can be imposed for "misappropriation, embezzlement, or any kind of theft" of the property of the principal employers, the government, or public bodies. Prior to 1946 the death penalty could be invoked.[11] In case of damage to or loss of property of the employer—tools, raw materials, fuel, even work clothes—if due to employee negligence can result in deductions from wages, in some instances in an amount 10 times the value of the property.[12]

MANAGERIAL PRESSURES

A series of laws penalize inefficient management for such things as poor quality or small volume of output, failure to penalize workers for absenteeism, and other violations of labor discipline.[13]

A potent incentive to the efficiency of the individual establishment is the principle that earnings depend in part upon the efficiency of the whole enterprise (principle of check by ruble). Business success brings definite individual profit; business failure incurs heavy punishment for those holding administrative posts. Although the total amount of regular wages to be paid in an individual enterprise is established by central government bureaus (wages funds), bonuses are dependent upon the profits or savings of an individual enterprise.

THE ROLE OF TRADE-UNIONS

Under such an arrangement there is no less reason for the rise of labor conflicts than under capitalism. But under the Soviet system labor is deprived of the main effective devices by which it may protect itself in a labor dispute in the capitalist world. Neither the constitution nor any law or decree mentions the right to strike and the strike is tacitly outlawed.

In general, all the channels through which labor can pursue its objectives in the capitalist world—legislation, courts, administrative agencies, the press, and trade unions—are in Soviet Russia agencies of the principal employer of industrial labor—the state.

For a time when private enterprise was tolerated under NEP (1922–28) the Soviet leaders visualized the protection of the interests of labor in this conflict through trade-unions. But the unions were regarded as an arm of government and of the Communist Party rather than as an independent force. Still they were to be an arm specialized in protection of labor. As the drive for socialization progressed, this special protective quality of the unions was pushed to the background. Instead, the notion of the identity of interests of the workers and the Soviet state was put forward and the primary function of Soviet labor unions is to serve the interests of the State.

THE PROMISE OF 1922

The eleventh congress of the Communist Party in 1922, when the NEP was inaugurated, recognized that if government enterprise operates on a commercial basis "inevitably certain conflicts of interests on the issue of labor conditions in the enterprises, are created between the working masses and the directors, managers of the government enterprises, or the government bureaus to which the enterprises are subordinated." Consequently the resolution "imposed upon the trade-unions the duty to protect the interests of the working people." [14]

Thus, the labor code of 1922, then enacted, relegated to the collective agreements between management and trade-unions the settlement of all the basic working conditions, including wage rates, standard of output, shop rules, etc.

Nevertheless, even then, both before and after this period, the trade-unions were not considered as a force independent from the Communist Party or the Soviet Government. The ninth congress of the party (1920) had stated that the tasks of trade-unions lie primarily in the province of economic organization and education. The trade-unions must perform these tasks not in the capacity of an independent, separately organized force but in the capacity of one of the principal branches of the Government machinery guided by the Communist Party.[15] The tenth congress went further and in 1921 passed the resolution, drafted by Lenin, and stressing the role of the trade-unions in Soviet Russia as a school of communism.[16] The fifteenth congress in 1925 stressed that trade-unions were created and built up by our [Communist] Party.[17]

"The most important task of the trade-unions," says the official textbook on civil law of 1944, "is the political education of the toiling masses, their mobilization for building up socialism, and the defense of their economic interests and cultural needs."[18]

"Formally," says the official textbook on administrative law of 1940, "the trade-unions are not a party organization but, in fact, they are carrying out the directives of the party. All leading organs of the trade-unions consist primarily of Communists who execute the party line in the entire work of the trade-unions." [19]

THE REALITY AFTER 30 YEARS

Thus the trade-unions were transformed from a labor-protecting arm into an arm for execution of government policy, and achievement of production goals. According to Soviet jurists, "the Socialist industrialization of the country required that labor law * * * serve the successful struggle for productivity of labor and strengthening of labor discipline.[20]

Such transformation of the trade-unions into a government arm, enforcing official economic policy, began soon after the onset of the first 5-year plan. Accordingly, the sixteenth congress of the Communist Party directed in 1930 that the trade-unions, striving in collective agreements for improvement of the standard of living of the workers, must take into account the financial status of the enterprise with which the agreement was made and the interests of the national economy. In making the agreement, the resolution insisted, each party must undertake definite obligations in carrying out the financial and production plan of the enterprise. The unions in particular were obligated to guarantee, on behalf of the workers, the productivity of labor contemplated by the plan.[21]

The central agency of all the Soviet trade-unions—their central council—was granted the status of a government department in 1933. It officially took the place of the People's Commissariat for Labor, which was then abolished, and the Council was also charged with administration of social insurance. But then the Central Council of Trade Unions lost the character of a representative body of trade-unions even in terms of the Soviet democracy. Under law this council must be elected by the Congress of Trade Unions which is designated as "the supreme authority of the trade-unions of the Soviet Union." Nevertheless, since the ninth congress in 1932 no such congresses were convoked for 17 years, during which the whole Soviet social order and the position of labor were radically changed.

When the tenth congress convened in 1949, no explanation was asked or offered for the delay. The congress adopted a new statute which reaffirmed the total control of the Communist Party over the trade-unions:

"The Soviet trade-unions conduct their entire work under the direction of the Communist Party—the organizing and directing force of the Soviet society. The trade-unions of the U. S. S. R. rally the working masses behind the party of Lenin-Stalin." [22]

Among numerous tasks assigned by the new statute to the trade-unions the generalized political objectives are described in the first place at great length. For example, the trade-unions "strive to enhance in every way the Socialist order in society and State, the moral-political unity of the Soviet people, the brotherly cooperation and friendship between the peoples of the Soviet Union. They actively participate in the election of the agencies of governmentl power. They organize workers and clerical employees for the struggle for the steady development of the national economy."

In contrast, "the duty to protect the interests of the working people" which had been emphasized by the party congress in 1922 is not expressly stated. It may have been considered unnecessary because the statute assumes that "in the conditions of the Soviet Socialist order the state protects the rights of the working people." But in any event the labor-protection tasks of the unions are couched in cautious language.

At the very end of the above quoted passage it is mentioned that the unions "look after (zabotiatsia) the further rise of the material well-being and the full satisfaction of the cultural needs of the toilers." At another place the unions' monopoly to represent the workers is stated with a hardly accidental lack of specificity: "[Unions should] act on behalf of workers and clerical employees before the governmental and social bodies in matters concerning labor, culture, and workers' everyday life."

Collective bargaining, provided for in the labor code of 1922, was discontinued in 1933. As the official soviet text on labor law explained in 1946: "The collective agreements as a special form of legal regulation of labor relations of manual and clerical employees has outlived itself. Detailed regulation of all sides of these relations by mandatory acts of governmental power does not leave any room for any contractual agreement concerning one labor condition or another." [23]

In plain English, this means that the Soviet leaders chose to abandon the last vestige of contract in relations between labor, even as represented by party-controlled trade-unions on the one hand and State management on the other, for the sake of outright government regimentation. Capitalist free collective bargaining was frankly declared unfit in the Socialist surroundings of the Soviet Union.

However, in 1947 a campaign for making new collective agreements suddenly was ordered after a lapse of 14 years.

AGREEMENTS WITHOUT BARGAINING

Collective agreements were declared the most important measure "to achieve and exceed the production plan, to secure further growth of the productivity of labor, improvement of the organization of labor, and the increase of responsibility of management and trade organizations for the material condition of living of the employees and cultural services rendered to them." [24] Nevertheless, the new policy is far from introducing free collective bargaining. Certain matters are definitely excluded from any negotiation and agreement and are reserved for government regulation.

The new rules positively require that "the rates of wages, of piecework, progressive piecework, and bonuses as approved by the government must be indicated" in the agreement. It is expressly forbidden to include any rates not approved by the government. In other words, wage rates are excluded from bargaining, but if included in the agreement are no more than applications of the governmental schedule to the establishment for which the collective agreement is drawn. This is true, to a large measure, of other points covered, particularly standards of output. The official act and the jurisprudential writings insist that the primary purpose of such agreements is to translate the abstract terms of the general plan for economic development into specific assignments and obligations within each particular establishment. They appear to be merely a form in which the orders of the government are made more precise.

A Soviet writer of authority comments:

"It is understood that the present-day collective agreements could not but be different by content from collective agreements which were made at the time when the rates of wages and some other conditions of labor were not established by the law and government decrees.

"The purpose of the present-day collective agreement is to make concrete the duties of the management, shop committees, workers, technical, engineering, and clerical personnel toward the fulfillment of the production plans and production over and above the plan as well as to raise the responsibility of business agencies and trade unions for improvement of material living conditions of workers and cultural services rendered to them." [25]

As before, the new regulations are based on the assumption that the interest of the workers are the same as the interests of production in a Socialist state and that the collective agreements are designed to be the juridical form of expression of this unity.[26] Accordingly, a model agreement is drafted by each ministry upon consultation with the central offices of the appropriate trade-unions. Then the model agreement is sent as a fait accompli to the establishments concerned.

While such collective agreements are not the result of collective bargaining, it may be observed that when the Soviet Government faced the task of postwar rehabilitation of its economy, it preferred to give decreed labor conditions the appearance of an agreement.

THE DOCTRINE OF NORMATIVE ACTS

Negotiation and mutual agreement are in fact proscribed in the Soviet Union in many important respects. Government regulation of wages and other basic conditions of labor took their place. However, it does not mean that labor is thus protected by law as we understand it. True, a Code of Labor Laws still exists on the statute books of the republics of the Soviet Union. But it was enacted in 1922 when private enterprise was within some limits tolerated and the Government was not the sole employer in industry and commerce. At that time the code sought to regulate labor relations on the basis of free contract and protect labor by methods resembling advanced democratic labor legislation.

However, these provisions of the code were either repealed or for the most part became inoperative being superseded without a formal repeal by various laws and decrees.

Under the totalitarian concept of government power, the accepted relationships of the administrative and legislative branches of the government do not apply. Although the terms "constitution," "legislative act," and "administrative decree" are used in Soviet law, the authority attached to each of these sources of law in the Soviet Union is different from that associated with these terms in the democratic countries. A constitutional provision may be set aside by an administrative decree and the newly enacted rule is incorporated into the constitution only at a later date. For example, the 7-hour working day was provided for in the 1936 constitution (sec. 119).

However, on June 26, 1940, the Presidium of the Supreme Soviet, an executive body in terms of the constitution, decreed the 8-hour normal working day. This edict became operative immediately. It was ratified by the Supreme Soviet in August 1940, but without following the procedure prescribed for constitutional amendment. Not until 7 years later was section 119 constitutionally amended.

The Soviet jurists are fully aware of such practices. In discussing the sources of Soviet labor law in the treatises on this subject, they seek to blur the distinction between the authority of a constitutional provision, a legislative enactment, and an administrative decree or directive. In a recent (1949) standard treatise,[27] designed for use in university law schools, a doctrine of "normative acts" (rule making) as the source of Soviet labor law is promulgated. Normative acts are in general terms defined as "acts by which the will of the ruling class is 'elevated to law.'" This not too clear definition is fortunately followed by an enumeration of the specific acts issued by Soviet authorities which, according to the author fall under the definition. These are "laws" enacted by the Supreme Soviet (Soviet equivalent to legislature), "edicts" by its presidium (a body of 47 members constituting the Soviet collective President), "normative resolutions" (i. e, rule-making resolutions) of the Council of Ministers (cabinet), joint resolutions of the Council of Ministers and the Central Committee of the Communist Party, regulations issued by individual ministers and by the Central Council of the Trade-Unions.

In other words, any decree or order by any of the central governmental authorities is law. No matter what it is called and by what body it is issued, it prevails until the action of another authority supersedes it.

The survey of recent trends in the Soviet legislation thus far made suggests the conclusion that the disappearance of private enterprise from the Soviet economy has not been followed by the increase of rights of labor in labor law. If compared with the time when private enterprise was tolerated, the legal status of labor has worsened. Another striking feature of the Soviet regulations on labor are the numerous penal provisions.

Congress Fails the Youth of America

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. CLARE E. HOFFMAN
OF MICHIGAN
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES
Thursday, March 15, 1951

Mr. HOFFMAN of Michigan. Mr. Speaker, given the authority to direct the destiny of our Nation, concededly the most prosperous and, from a productive and military standpoint, the most powerful in all the world, Congress has permitted the executive department to impose upon the people policies which have resulted in three world wars, none of which has contributed either to our happiness, prosperity, or security.

The youth of the land in ever-increasing numbers are thinking along the lines of a letter received this morning, which reads as follows:

MCCHORD AIR FORCE BASE, WASH.,
March 29, 1951.

Hon. CLARE HOFFMAN,
House of Representatives,
Washington, D. C.

DEAR SIR: In June 1941 I was drafted for a year's training in the military forces of the United States. That year ended in January 1946. Those of my friends who did not serve in the Armed Forces made good money, got themselves a home, good positions in life, and are getting along well.

After getting out of the service I reenlisted in the Reserves with the thought in mind that in case of an all-out war I would be called back in the branch of service I had received training in. Meanwhile, I tried to get a job and get a much-delayed start in life at the age of 27.

In September 1950, I enrolled in a correspondence course to better myself in my job. The day after my first lesson came my orders calling me to active duty for 1 year were received. Naturally I was a bit put out, but figured I would study while I was in the service and then go to work when I got out.

Now the majority of the rumors have it we are to be extended for another year's duty. I am now 32. If I get another year's delay it is going to put me seriously behind. This also applies to practically every 12-month recall reservist, I've talked to. We can't understand why we are being held in the service contrary to orders which evidently don't amount to anything more than to get one in the service. Getting out is different. Yet there are several thousand involuntary reservists who were not called up. If we are extended, it is going to reduce our faith in the word of the President as well as our desire to get the job done. I don't mind telling you, if I am forced to spend another year on active duty the Government won't get its money's worth out of me. It's not that I dislike work, it's the principle of the thing.

If I had wanted to make the service my career, then I would be in the Regulars. Since I would like to live my life as a civilian, I feel that I ought to be able to, barring an all-out war, which we certainly aren't engaged in at the present. If we were, then all Reserves ought to be called in as well as veterans, not in the Reserve category.

Speaking for the 4,000 airmen on 12-month recalls, which I am sure the service could get along without by September, anything you can see clear to do toward assisting legislation in our favor would be most gratefully appreciated.

Your past record of achievements and fairness is of the highest, and I am confident you will do what is just.

Sincerely yours.

New Plan May Tap Oil Field in Ocean

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. SAMUEL W. YORTY
OF CALIFORNIA
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES
Thursday, April 5, 1951

Mr. YORTY. Mr. Speaker, before the Federal Government saw fit to expropriate the submerged oil-bearing lands lying within the seaward boundaries of the State of California, our State had fostered orderly and scientific development of the oil resources beneath these lands. Since the attempted grab by the Federal Government of this area, which the Federal Government conceded that we owned from the time of our admission into the Union until a few years ago, development has been hindered by legal confusion.

The Federal Government's suit in the Federal Government's Supreme Court against the State of California is still pending because, even though it has authorized the Federal grab, the Supreme Court has been unable to determine the boundary lines of the expropriated area. If our State leasing agency were permitted to proceed in the public interest without Federal interference, it could foster additional development likely to add to our known petroleum reserves.

The attached article, which appeared in the Los Angeles Times on April 2, 1951, demonstrates the type of development that is being hindered by the Federal Government's stubborn persistence in defying the will of Congress in an attempt to hang onto the expropriated area. The article will, I am sure, prove of interest to the Members, and I am asking that it be included in our RECORD:

NEW PLAN MAY TAP OIL FIELD IN OCEAN—SHAFT-TUNNEL-CAISSON SYSTEM PROPOSED FOR RICH RESERVOIR

A revolutionary method of extracting petroleum from bay and tideland areas may be used in developing the giant oil field which geologists say is located directly off the Long Beach shoreline.

The vast petroleum deposit lies roughly between the beach city's strand and the outer harbor breakwater which parallels the shoreline at a distance of 3 miles.

Geological data indicate the oil-field reserve to be in the neighborhood of 500,000,000 barrels.

VAST STOREHOUSE

Geologists say the great storehouse of black gold is, in truth, an easterly extension of the rich Wilmington-Long Beach Harbor field which currently is tapped by some 2,000 producing wells, all drilled from dry land and harbor fills.

The unprecedented method of developing oil fields which lie beneath water involves use of a technique familiar to mining engineers. It has been worked out by Hillman A. Hansen, 52, Long Beach engineer-geologist.

The plan envisions sinking of a vertical shaft into the earth to a depth of 400 feet below the bottom of the bay. From this depth a network of tunnels would be driven laterally. These tunnels would conform to a predetermined pattern.

SUBTERRANEAN NETWORK

When completed the subterranean network would, in effect, be a subway system which engineers would put to good use.

Drifting out from each side of the subway tunnels would be short-access tunnels leading into caissons of steel and concrete.

The caissons, 34 feet in diameter and 120 feet high, would provide room for installation of standard oil-well drilling equipment.

It would be within these cylindrical caissons that the oil wells would be drilled.

Each caisson, according to plans, would accommodate the drilling of 20 wells in an adjacent 100 acres of "field," as projected downward from the surface of the Harbor waters.

WELLS WHIPSTOCKED

The wells would be whipstocked (an oil-field term for directional drilling) so that each would draw upon 5 acres of the projected producing area.

The master plan envisages construction of 50 or more of the subterranean caissons.

The underground network of tunnels and caissons would be air-conditioned. Electric power would motivate the drilling equipment.

Technological developments, such as the modern shut-off valves and sparkproof electric motors like those used on seagoing tankers, make the tunnel-and-caisson method of oil-field development both safe and practical, engineers claim.

ECONOMICAL METHOD

"It would be economical, too," Hansen said, "the cost actually figuring out to be less than any other method which has been advanced for developing this oil field."

The recently announced intention of the Iranian Government to nationalize its oil fields and petroleum reserves has been cause for concern among the United States, British, and Dutch interests which have led the way in developing the petroleum storehouse of the Middle East.

Some have interpreted the Iranian move with an eye to Russia and its known thirst for oil. The Iranian repercussions echo loudly in this country and etch sharply the question of United States domestic oil reserves.

Addressing a gathering of geologists here a week ago, Dr. Kenneth O. Emery, of southern California, estimated that 40,000,000,000 barrels of oil lie beneath waters adjacent to the southern California coast line. He pointed up the urgent need for a method to extract this oil.

OTHER METHODS ADVANCED

The tunnel-and-caisson method has awakened great interest in engineering circles and is considered possibly the best approach to the problem yet devised.

Two other suggested methods of drilling the Long Beach offshore field have been advanced. These are (1) constructing a series of concrete islands which would dot the bay with drill sites, and (2) attaching so-called blisters (drill sites) to the existing offshore breakwater.

In 1947 the city of Long Beach investigated the island-platform proposal thoroughly. A report to the city council at that time outlined need for 70 concrete islands, each costing an estimated $1,000,000.

OBJECTIONS CITED

While the proposed island-platform plan would meet the engineering needs of the drilling problem, it was pointed out that the plan would be prohibited by State law on the grounds that it would constitute obstructions to commerce and navigation within the port.

Experts agree that the outer harbor breakwater would be a suitable base for anchoring drill sites, but point out that it would permit too limited development of the oil field and result in the loss of millions of barrels of oil.

"All you could do by drilling from the breakwater," an engineer explained, "would be to effect development of a narrow band along the southerly flank of the field. Geologically speaking, it is axiomatic that drilling an oil field along one side or flank alone throws the entire pressure system of the field out of balance.

"In this instance it would result in the loss of millions of barrels of oil through salt-water encroachment."

AREA EXTENDS TO SEA

The bulk of the oil produced in the Wilmington-Long Beach field comes from sands at an average depth of 3,100 feet. Geologists say they have every reason to believe that this same oil-rich level extends throughout the field directly off Long Beach.

Military experts have studied Hansen's tunnel-and-caisson method and have expressed pleasure with its bombproof aspects.

Conversely, the same military men consider the island-platform and breakwater drill sites as highly vulnerable to attack and see them as being capable of converting the entire Los Angeles-Long Beach Harbor area into a sea of flaming oil and contaminating the air with billions of cubic feet of noxious gas.

Meanwhile, Hansen continues his 10-year study into the problem of drilling bay and tideland oil fields. He firmly believes that he has come up with the logical answer in tunnels and caissons.

The legal and political barriers obstructing development of this great offshore field will be resolved shortly, he believes, by the urgency of national defense.

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. JOHN W. McCORMACK
OF MASSACHUSETTS
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES
Thursday, April 5, 1951

Mr. McCORMACK. Mr. Speaker, in these times when peace must be the prayer of all of us, we should recognize the vital need to live according to our highest standards. The future of the country will depend ultimately more upon the virtues of our citizens than upon the sins of our enemies. For our aspiration, Easter day brings home to us the ideals of character such as I have tried to convey in the accompanying poem, which I am glad to submit to you for inclusion in the RECORD, composed by James Patrick McGovern, a long-time member of the District of Columbia bar and a captain of the American Expeditionary Forces in the First World War:

RESURRECTION

Deep in the currents of the heart there flows
A fervent, dauntless quest of all mankind,
Like life in death when conquering Christ arose—
The mortal and immortal intertwined.
Today, however dark and dull the spring
Of hope and faith through thoughts and deeds impure,
Masking sins with words of hollow ring,
Corrupting men by bribe and sinecure,
New seasons flower and warm hearts aspire,
The true and beautiful glow by their worth,
And virtue's self is such a cleansing fire
These powers shall create our land's rebirth
Of brotherhood, with peace eternal given
By Him to come to us on earth from heaven.

Resolution Against Compulsory Health Insurance Adopted by the Citizens' Association of Chevy Chase, D. C.

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. JOHN T. WOOD
OF IDAHO
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES
Tuesday, April 3, 1951

Mr. WOOD of Idaho. Mr. Speaker, I want to present for the earnest consideration of my colleagues the following resolution adopted by the Citizens' Association of Chevy Chase, D. C., at their regular meeting on March 19, 1951:

RESOLUTION AGAINST COMPULSORY HEALTH INSURANCE

At a regular meeting, March 19, 1951, the Citizens' Association of Chevy Chase, D. C., adopted the following resolution proposed by Mr. Dean P. Kimball, as chairman of a special committee on the subject:

"Resolved, That this association oppose the enactment of H. R. 54, the so-called national health insurance bill, for the following reasons:

"1. It will destroy the close personal relationship between patient and doctor. In this connection it should be pointed out that in time it will practically destroy the private practice of medicine. All doctors will, in practical effect, if not technically, become mere employees of the Federal Government.

"2. It will result in poor medical service as compared to that we now have. The compensation of the doctor may depend on the number of treatments or visits for which a set fee will be charged or the number of patients on his list. Treatment on a mass-production basis with too little time for each patient will be the result.

"3. It will cost the average family far more than it pays for medical service now and will add thousands of employees to the Federal Government and millions of dollars to the cost of Government. While the present bill calls for 3 percent of salaries to $4,800, some have estimated that it will eventually cost 12 percent of the first $4,800 of a person's earnings, or $576 a year to meet the costs of the plan. It may go even higher.

"4. It is not limited, as has been claimed by its supporters, to caring for cases requiring costly and extended medical or hospital treatment, but purports to take care of every minor illness. It is socialism at its worst, concerning as it does one of the most intimate and personal aspects of life, that of doctor and patient.

"5. There is now available insurance and other forms of mutual or group aid at moderate cost to cover costly hospital and medical service.

"6. It removes one of the spurs or incentives to sober, careful, and prudent living by offering medical care for every type of ailment whether willfully brought on by misconduct or a disregard of the rules of health."

I hereby certify that the undersigned is the secretary of the Citizens' Association of Chevy Chase, D. C., and as such verify and attest to the above resolution having been adopted by the Citizens' Association of Chevy Chase, D. C., at its regular meeting held in the Chevy Chase Community Center, March 19, 1951, and having been included in the minutes of said meeting.

Attest:

HENRY HALLAM,
Secretary, the Citizens' Association of Chevy Chase, D. C.

Home Folks Are Not Fooled

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. CLARE E. HOFFMAN
OF MICHIGAN
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES
Thursday, March 15, 1951

Mr. HOFFMAN of Michigan. Mr. Speaker, that the people who elected us are becoming aware of what has been happening here in Washington during the past few years is apparent from a letter from a housewife which reads as follows:

DEAR SIR: After reading your paper, The People's Opportunity, I have decided to put a few of the things down on paper that we in our family have been thinking about and discussing in recent years.

1. Mr. Truman said recently that we are in an emergency. I agree, but think that we were thrown into it at the time the idea was advanced that the world owes everyone a living—without first earning it. The CCC, PWA, WPA, and all the other jobs that were created, as well as the relief set-up that was used, really wrecked our economy. It spoiled a lot of workers who had been willing to earn their living before. We personally have not been able to hire farm labor that was worth their board, let alone wages, since then. People on relief would not let their children pick beans or cucumbers, even when we offered 25 cents a bushel for pickers. They could afford to increase their families, while people who earned their living and paid taxes to keep them could not afford larger families. It takes some people 15 or 20 years to wake up, apparently.

2. Old-age benefits: It used to be that people started saving for their old age when they were young. The ones who did not went to the county farm when they could no longer keep themselves. I notice we still have county farms, but people do not try to save; they plan on being kept after they are 65. I don't mean all of them—there are still some who refuse to become parasites—but in increasing numbers we have watched it happen. Many of those people would be a lot better off if they were working. All they have to do is sit around and try to figure out how they can get more for less. Also, at one time we knew of eight in one county who were getting paid to pass out the checks. One person who was alive could do that for a county.

3. The AAA or PMA or whatever it is now called is another big laugh. The fertilizer they furnished for farmers wouldn't go through the drills. It took three times as long to spread it as it would decent fertilizer. The marl they got was so bad it looked like gravel. They brought a load here; we refused it. We would rather get our own gravel. Their office force gets in each other's way, too. Last fall the township worker told us they now tested soil, for 20 cents a sample. The conservation group has been doing it free for years. Why can't they hire an efficiency expert and stop having four or five agencies trying to do the same thing and getting in each other's way? Judging from the waste in our county, it certainly must be monumental when it gets to Washington.

The people who suffered and started this country certainly would be sick and disgusted to see it now. Where has government, for the people, of the people, and by the people gone? I have heard many farmers say they want no subsidies or price supports. Supply and demand have worked before, certainly one man, or group of men, cannot order Old Mother Nature, or human nature, either. During the last war several string butchers, who raised no stock themselves, but spread several stock diseases all over got subsidies enough to buy three or four farms, while the farmers who did the work took the risks and had large amounts of money invested got no subsidies.

4. Their basketball scandal is another thing. Everyone has known for years that schools and colleges have paid athletes to go to their schools. One that we know of was later hired to coach and teach in a high school. He admitted himself, that the students knew more than he did. What can we expect of our children, when such things go on all the time? What has happened to our schools? When my mother started teaching, she had gone through the eighth grade, then took teachers' examinations. Now when children get through the eighth grade, how much do they really know? We should have trade schools to find and develop their talents, so that they will be self-supporting and self-respecting as they grow older. We certainly have people enough that we won't have to import workers if we can get back to the idea that we owe ourselves and our country an honest day's work for a day's pay.

5. We are getting tired of taxes, too, when it is just thrown away. We, in our household work, plan, and save for things we really need. All the money that has been used to build roads in the jungle, given to England when she is still trading with Russia and Communist China is worse than wasted. It is working against us and our boys in Korea. Both of our sons, 20 and 21, enlisted more than a year ago. They are both in Korea, wondering, with all the other boys there, why they are there. What can our young people have respect for, believe in, or build their lives on?

All we have to do is go back in history. Why did the Pilgrims come over here? Who paid the Indians bounties on American scaps? Who hired Hessians to fight us? Who sent arms, money, and ships to the South during the Civil War? They boast that their policy never changes—apparently it has not, and will not as long as we are spineless, jellyfish, and turn our pockets inside out for them. They have it over on us—they can change their government and policy by a "vote of confidence." What would happen here, if we had the same set-up?

I think we have had weak Presidents ever since Teddy Roosevelt. If we had had his "Speak softly and carry a big stick" we wouldn't be in the mess we are in now.

Personally, I wouldn't hire anyone to work for me who had been a failure before. I doubt if any good businessman would, either. Let's get an efficiency expert, open all the doors and windows, have a good job of spring housecleaning, and then start over.

6. The Communists have been turned free. I am enclosing 25 cents to start a fund to buy gasoline to load them on a plane (after they have paid back to the Government what their trials cost) and unload them in North Korea. Since that is the kind of government they want, it is cruel to keep them here in this country. I am sure there are enough people who feel as I do. They will gladly contribute to such a cause.

7. I am enclosing some material which we have collected from recent papers and magazines. People really are waking up to the dangers we have been harboring for quite some time. I think Congress and the other elected Members would do well to think a little farther ahead than the ends of their noses.

Mrs. W. R. Rowe.

Mr. Speaker, in my reply to the foregoing, among other things the following was written:

Am sending back the 25 cents, as I know of no practical way of putting it to use. If it was $25,000,000, it is just possible we might counteract the propaganda paid for by British money.

Wheat for India

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. J. PERCY PRIEST
OF TENNESSEE
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES
Thursday, April 5, 1951

Mr. PRIEST. Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my remarks in the RECORD, I include the following editorials from the Christian Science Monitor:

[From the Christian Science Monitor of March 14, 1951]

HUNGER DOESN'T WAIT

Three months ago Madame Pandit, Ambassador of India to the United States, presented to the State Department a request by her Government to buy 2,000,000 tons of grain in the United States on long-term credit in order to relieve imminent famine.

This was transmitted to Congress, and 1 month ago, after endorsement of the idea by former President Hoover, President Truman supported the request with a special message. He recommended, however, since there was doubt of the ability of India to assume such a debt and since it clearly could not pay in cash, that an immediate grant be made of the first 1,000,000 tons and terms then be studied for meeting the remainder of the need.

The House of Representatives Foreign Affairs Committee reported a bill about 10 days ago to authorize appropriations up to $190,000,000 for the full amount of grain if need be. But apparently there is serious question whether the House will get an opportunity to act on this measure with the promptness that a subject involving human survival deserves.

Placing of the bill on the House calendar rests with the House Rules Committee, which early this session was given renewed power of blocking legislation it did not favor. Some persons then were doubtful of the desirability of concentrating that authority in a few members. If the Rules Committee now should prove willing to "play politics with human misery," even misery on the opposite side of the globe, the effects on international friendship for the United States in a crucial area could become very, very injurious and costly.

[From the Christian Science Monitor of March 20, 1951]

THAT GRAIN FOR INDIA

Question quite naturally has been raised, "If India was willing to buy the 2,000,000 tons of wheat it has requested from the United States, why does the administration propose instead to make an outright gift of the grain?"

India is buying 4,000,000 tons of grain from the United States, Canada, Australia, Argentina, and other countries at market prices. In doing this and paying the ocean freight the Indian Government is using up all the foreign exchange it can safely spare. Its balances are not in dollars but in sterling, which Britain cannot convert. And India still is importing slightly more goods than it finds it possible to pay for by exports.

In these circumstances would it be hard-headed to bind that country to a schedule of payments for grain it cannot buy with cash? President Truman has recommended that 1,000,000 tons of wheat be authorized immediately as a grant to India, after which Congress could look into whether the entire second 1,000,000 tons is needed, whether it can be obtained elsewhere, whether it or part of it could be paid for, and whether stipulations should be attached to that part of the deal.

There are questions legitimately to be asked of the Indian Government. One is whether trade jealousy toward neighboring Pakistan is partly responsible for India's food plight. In 1949–50 India could have obtained 600,000 tons of surplus wheat from Pakistan. This year, though, Pakistan has none to spare and only a small surplus in prospect this spring. India also is criticized for devoting land to jute or cotton which might raise grain.

If study should show that India eventually can pay for part of the presently needed grain, then by all means the second half of the wheat program from the United States should be made partly or all on a loan basis. Stipulations might be added that India should obtain all available grain from nearby sources and should direct its agricultural program toward food rather than non-food crops.

But the need of many million Indians for food this month and next is urgent. The initial grant from America's great surplus of wheat should be voted by Congress with all possible dispatch.

[From the Christian Science Monitor of March 24, 1951]

TIME IS NO ALLY HERE

Recently this page mentioned that action on the bill for authorization of aid to India in the form of grain waits on the willingness of the Rules Committee to place that bill on the calendar of the House of Representatives.

The proposal, with some details left to further legislation, has been approved by the House Foreign Affairs Committee. It is backed by the administration, by former President Hoover, by bipartisan support in both Houses of Congress, and by most editorial opinion expressed on the subject.

It takes about 6 weeks to load a ship, sail to India, and unload. And some of the ships to be used are coming out of "moth balls." Meanwhile India has had to cut its ration for 125,000,000 people from 12 ounces to 9 ounces a day, and can fill the ration quotas only as ships arrive. Approximately 45,000,000 persons depend solely on the grain ration. How much hunger do the gentlemen of the House Rules Committee want to take the responsibility for?

Aid to Blind Person in Securing Government Employment

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. CHARLES E. POTTER
OF MICHIGAN
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES
Thursday, April 5, 1951

Mr. POTTER. Mr. Speaker, under permission granted to extend my remarks, I wish to include an article which appeared in the Government Employees' Exchange of March 14, 1951, and which gives a graphic account of the progress made by the Civil Service Commission in its efforts to aid blind persons in securing Government employment. I commend this article to my colleagues for their information:

TRANSCRIBERS, REPORTERS EXAMS FOR BLIND MARK PROGRESS FOR CSC

A dictating machine transcriber exam for the blind only and a shorthand reporter exam for which the blind may apply are two of the latest steps in the two-pronged handicap program of Dr. Verne K. Harvey, noted Medical Director of the Civil Service Commission.

Dr. Harvey's program, based on a realistic evaluation of physical requirements, is keyed to give the handicapped person a chance to do a job and at the same time help ease the Government personnel shortage.

The dictating machine transcribers will transcribe on a typewriter. The exam opened February 7 and closed March 2. As of February 27, with still a few days to go, 74 persons had applied for the exams, Dr. Harvey told a Government employees' exchange reporter.

Dr. Harvey explained that the exam has two parts: a performance test and a general abilities. For the performance test the applicant will transcribe from a record dictated by the Civil Service Commission and will be rated on accuracy and speed. The applicant must type at least 40 words a minute with a maximum of nine mistakes. Requirements are flexible so that if greater speed is attained more errors will be allowed.

On the general abilities test questions will be read to the applicant and recorded by a sighted person. The entire examination will take about 2 hours.

Some vacancies are open in these jobs, Dr. Harvey told the Exchange, and as the typist shortage becomes critical, agencies are expected to use up the register. A dictating machine is actually a time-saving device for the administrator, Dr. Harvey noted.

BLIND REPORTER

For the shorthand-reporter examination, for which a sighted person ordinarily uses shorthand or a stenograph machine, any machine that noiselessly records the voice of the shorthand reporter is acceptable. The blind use a machine with a cover that goes over the nose and mouth and a strap that goes around the head. A flexible tube leads to the recording device. The facepiece fits snug so no sound gets in but the reporter's voice. The reporter must take 5 minutes' dictation at 175 words a minute for the test. One hour is allowed for transcribing. The jobs are from grade 6 to 9, paying from $3,450 to $4,600 annually.

The blind reporter speaks in natural English, records the name of the speaker and everything said. Simply recording a meeting is not feasible, Dr. Harvey said, since people forget to state their name, and at important moments all talk at once and the recording becomes a babble.

Dr. Harvey emphasized that on these tests the blind have the same standard of accuracy as a sighted person. Much of the philosophy behind his widely praised handicap program came out in his statement: "To have a sound handicap program you must expect the same performance out of the handicapped as the nonhandicapped. The alternate is an aid program which is a type of welfare work. I don't believe these handicapped people are looking for that in working for the Government. They want to prove that they can do the job."

Blind employees gainfully employed were first used on a large scale by the Government in World War II, Dr. Harvey said. Before that the only openings were special jobs at FSA set aside by law for the blind. When Dr. Harvey first introduced the use of blind employees, some personnel chiefs were skeptical. Personnel men came by the dozens to see the work of the blind girl, Miss Caroline Hastings (now Mrs. McNichols), working as a transcriber at CSC. They went away convinced that the blind could do the job.

There are at least 30 to 35 blind people employed by the Government in Washington at present. Fifteen of these are in the special blind service section at the Library of Congress. VA employs eight in its central office and four in its regional office. Others are: Bureau of the Budget, one; CSC, fourth regional office, one; ICC, one; Immigration and Naturalization Service, one; Agriculture, one; and FSA, one or two. Most of these are typists, the Bureau of the Budget has a blind analyst.

United States Must First Win the Subversive War

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. SAMUEL W. YORTY
OF CALIFORNIA
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES
Thursday, April 5, 1951

Mr. YORTY. Mr. Speaker, we all know that this Congress has a tendency to reflect the immediate moods of the people. We therefore find ourselves rushing defense legislation during each crisis, and relaxing into complacency whenever the immediate threat to our security seems slightly lessened. That this tendency is not new is demonstrated by the excellent editorial by Mr. Manchester Boddy, of Los Angeles, which I should like to call to the attention of the House:

[From the Los Angeles Daily News of March 30, 1951]

UNITED STATES MUST FIRST WIN THE SUBVERSIVE WAR

Recently over a national radio network Gen. William J. Donovan, former Director of the Office of Strategic Services, and now a working member of the Committee on the Present Danger, went back 2,000 years to wise old Demosthenes, the Greek orator, who thus delivered himself to the people of fourth century B. C., Athens:

"Shame on you Athenians * * * for not wishing to understand that in war one must not allow oneself to be at the command of events, but to forestall them. You Athenians are the strongest of all the Greeks, in ships, cavalry, infantry, and revenue, and you do not make the best of them.

"You make war against Philip like a barbarian when he wrestles—if he suffers a blow, he immediately puts his hand to it. If he is struck again, he puts his hand there too; but he has not the skill or does not think of parrying the blow aimed at him or of evading his antagonist. You, likewise, if you hear tell that Philip has attacked the Chaeronea, you send help there; if he is at Thermopylae, you run there; and if he turns aside, you follow him, to right or left, as if you were acting on his orders. Never a fixed plan, never any precautions: you wait for bad news before you act."

IRAN IS PERFECT EXAMPLE

General Donovan points to recent developments in Iran as a perfect example of how communism is waging its war of aggression.

"A news article of March 15," he says, "states that the Soviet Union has been courting Iranian officials for 6 months with presents, such as release of captured Iranian border guards and the signing of a $20,000,000 barter treaty.

"Iran produces 6 percent of the world's oil. It is the most valuable of the non-American supply sources which serve the western nations. It is a vital strategic area and therefore a sought-after military price. There has been open speculation on the possibility of a Stalin invasion and what we should do in that event.

"But why should Stalin run the risk of a shooting war? Instead he called up Tudeh, the Soviet-controlled political party, to lead a movement in the Iranian lower house to nationalize the Anglo-Iranian Oil Co., despite the fact that it is 53 percent British owned and is operated under a concession that does not expire until 1993.

"Watch the succeeding steps. Moscow has already paved the way to obtain a trade agreement, an agreement which could give her use and control of these British wells and refineries. If this cold war tactic proves successful, Stalin will have out-maneuvered us again, without the necessity of taking over the Government, let alone a military invasion. * * *

"We have only just begun to grasp the special nature of Communist organization and methods," continues General Donovan. "The real strength of the Soviets lies in their world-wide organization, highly developed techniques and communications, and in the discipline of leaders especially trained in the Lenin school in Moscow."

CANNOT LOWER OUR GUARD

"All of this should teach us that we are faced by an enemy against whom we cannot lower our guard—a foe that is always alert—and ruthless—and tenacious. Against such a foe we must exercise sustained effort, perhaps for many years. Soviet tactics may change even to the point of temporary retreat, but the objective is always the same—a world empire.

"Only by our understanding of the manner in which the fight will be carried to us will we be able to deal with it. We can't sit back and hope to be let alone. There is no place for complacency, or indifference, or fear—we can't buy our way out or dream our way out, nor should we be misled by seeming successes until we have totaled the score on a global scale.

"We must win this subversive war. It is necessary to win it because in winning it we would have the edge in the shooting war, if that war should ever come. It is essential to win it because in the winning we may make a shooting war impossible. Therefore, we must be strong enough to compel the peace."

For a long time General Donovan has been urging a "fight fire with fire" policy. Instead of waiting for the Reds to start new trouble in Indochina or Iran or Berlin or Malaya to keep the Western Powers off balance and in a state of continuous confusion, he thinks our side should do a little "behind the curtain" work and keep the Kremlin guessing.

Well—that's the kind of global war we are in, and even though we are prepared to fight an old-fashioned shooting war, we may very well find that the "new" technique—about which old Demosthenes orated 2,000 years ago—will continue to be the main characteristic of continuing warfare.

Cut the Budget

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF

HON. S. J. CRUMPACKER, JR.

OF INDIANA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Thursday, April 5, 1951

Mr. CRUMPACKER. Mr. Speaker, a few weeks ago, after President Truman presented us with a staggering $71,000,000,000 budget and then had the effrontery to dare Congress to cut it, I called upon my colleagues to join me in accepting this challenge by voting for rigid economy in nondefense spending. I pointed out that Mr. Truman was asking the American people to make sacrifices in their daily living, through increased taxes, but that he himself was refusing to make political sacrifices by suspending his give-away schemes for socializing America. I called attention to the estimate of Senator BYRD, of Virginia, that at least $7,000,000,000 could be trimmed from the budget without impairing the defense effort in any way. And I promised the taxpayers of the Third Indiana District that I, for one, would not vote to increase taxes a single penny until every bit of fat had been trimmed from the President's budget.

My remarks on this subject were subsequently printed in several newspapers in northern Indiana, including the Michigan City News-Dispatch. A few days later I was pleasantly surprised to see an article in that newspaper which I quote in full herewith:

HIGH TAXES IRK YOU?—HE DOES SOMETHING ABOUT IT, WILL YOU?

Everyone talks about high taxes but few do anything about it. Few, except William Welk, that is.

Welk, a prison guard who lives at 219 East Eleventh, read with approval in his February 28 News-Dispatch that third district Congressman SHEP CRUMPACKER was urging his colleagues to accept President Truman's dare and cut the $71,000,000,000 budget. The story gave Welk an idea.

Carefully he typed the story neatly on several sheets of paper and beneath it a note to the Congressman telling him that the persons whose names and addresses appear on subsequent sheets agree with his stand. Then Welk began getting signatures in his free time.

In 1 week, more than 700 persons signed the sheets with their names and addresses.

"There are Democrats and Republicans alike on these lists of names," he said.

Now he has received some help to add at least that many more signatures before sending the lists to Washington. Blank lists for signing have been placed at the News-Dispatch and chamber of commerce offices for anyone who feels the same way to sign.

Mr. Speaker, the document referred to in the above article is now in my possession. It is beautifully bound and is inscribed as a "testimonial of confidence and appreciation" extended to me for my stand in support of Government economy. It bears the signatures of more than 1,500 citizens of Michigan City, including many leaders in civic affairs.

My purpose in calling this incident to the attention of Congress is to emphasize a simple fact that many of us here may be inclined to overlook. That fact is that there is a tremendous ground swell of feeling in this country against the spendthrift policies of the Truman administration. There is a great popular demand for a program of rigid Government economy of the kind proposed by Senator BYRD in the Senate and by Republican leaders in the House. The people are aware that the distinguished Senator from Virginia spoke the truth when he said recently:

> The 5 years that have passed since World War II ended may well go down in history as the most irresponsible 5 years of the great American Republic. • • •
> In those 5 years has been squandered the greatest prosperity ever to come to any nation; the Federal Government has collected far more taxes than ever before; it has spent far more money on purely domestic-civilian programs than ever before; it has spent far more money abroad than ever before; it has spent far more money for defense than ever before without achieving preparedness; and it has failed to curtail the greatest public debt any nation has ever known.

Mr. Speaker, it is futile to look to President Truman for leadership in this fight to restore a sound American economy. Mr. Truman is committed to a program of more and more spending, and higher and higher taxes. The leadership must come from Congress. The people are looking to us to do more than pay mere lip service to economy. They are expecting us to work for it and to vote for it.

At the time Mr. Truman presented his record budget to Congress I pointed out that there were vast opportunities for savings in nearly every civilian-domestic item. Several of the President's proposals were designed to initiate pet projects of the administration and fulfill political, vote-buying promises made to various pressure groups. Good illustrations of this type are proposed appropriations to socialize farming and medicine. These appropriations, in my opinion, should be rejected outright.

A second step we must take is to serve notice on our military leaders that unnecessary waste, duplication, and inefficiency in the defense program will not be tolerated. Appropriations for the Army, Navy, and Air Force are not sacred. They must be carefully scrutinized. Their actual expenditures, reaching astronomical figures, must be the subject of continuing and constructively critical review.

No one for a moment wants to deny our fighting men the best in training, equipment and care. No one wants to scrimp on weapons or ammunition or on any of the essential items which comprise the framework of a sound defense structure. But anyone who has ever served in the Armed Forces knows that military supply officials are not noted for their financial prudence. They need to have applied to them the firm hand of those whose responsibility it is to total up the bill which is to be submitted to the people.

Without intending to imply any criticism of our Nation's military leaders, I am convinced that substantial savings could be effected in the defense effort without in any way impairing the soundness of our defense effort.

For example, with millions of pounds of Government-owned butter and eggs stored in caves around the country, it recently was disclosed that the Quartermaster General has been contracting to buy butter and eggs on the open market at current high prices. There was no effort at cooperation between the Army and the Commodity Credit Corporation, which has been selling these same foodstuffs at a nominal sum or, in some cases, giving them away. Proper liaison between Government agencies would have prevented this inexcusable waste of public funds.

I appreciate the fact that mistakes are bound to occur when mobilization preparations are hurried as they are at this time. My only point is that the constant vigilance of Congress could do much in this field to protect the public purse.

In conclusion, Mr. Speaker, I wish to repeat that Congress should have as its goal a reduction of at least $7,000,000,000 in Federal spending. This reduction, in my opinion, should have priority over any new or additional taxes in our effort to obtain a balanced budget.

As further evidence that demands for Government economy are widespread, I wish to place in the RECORD at this point, a petition from another county in my district, Elkhart County, which I believe eloquently expresses the majority viewpoint of the American people:

ELKHART, IND.

HON. SHEPARD J. CRUMPACKER, JR.,
House Office Building,
Washington, D. C.

DEAR MR. CRUMPACKER: The undersigned, all residents and voters of Elkhart County, Ind., desire that you be advised of our reactions to the recent proposed Federal tax increases.

No one of us desires to evade or avoid our just share of the tax burden. That is a price we must all pay for the privilege of citizenship in this wonderful country. However, we cannot, and we will not, tolerate any increase in taxes at the present time for any other reason than to rearm this country and our allies to meet aggression.

The proposed budget of the President contains, as you know, many provisions for increases in the allotments for the President's social reforms, or shall we say, socialistic program. We are definitely opposed to the expenditure of any more funds to increase the scope of Federal control in this country.

The economic stability of this country has been shaken and disturbed and is in danger of being completely disrupted. You appreciate, better than we, that such a result would throw us to our knees before Russia without even having had an opportunity to defend ourselves.

We appeal to you, and we advise you as our elected representative, to do all in your power to curb these foolhardy proposals, and to guard every dollar that must be expended. The future of our country is at stake. We will need every dollar our economy can raise to succeed in the conflict ahead. We expect you to do all you can to conserve the tax dollars we must all sacrifice.

Forget the Dams and Give the Triple Cities Flood Walls

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. EDWIN ARTHUR HALL
OF NEW YORK
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES
Wednesday, March 7, 1951

Mr. EDWIN ARTHUR HALL. Mr. Speaker, probably the most disgraceful exhibition of cheap politics on record has been displayed for the past 4 or 5 years in the valleys of Chenango and Susquehanna in New York's Southern Tier.

A continuous, deliberate campaign of misinformation and deceit against the wishes of the people of Binghamton, Johnson City, Endicott, and Vestal in regard to adequate flood control has been and is still being waged by undercover agents of sabotage.

It all started as an attempt in certain high places back home and in Washington to discredit the Hall proposal of flood-wall protection for the greater Endicott-Vestal area of the Susquehanna River.

No sooner would I make a public utterance of what everybody in Broome County knows to be true, namely, that these walls are the first line of defense against floods, than a hue and cry would be raised by sundry experts that the only possible solution was the building of dams miles up the Susquehanna and Chenango above Binghamton.

This campaign of rule or ruin has accomplished the blocking of my proposal and has already caused damage to a billion dollars' worth of public and private and industrial properties in our neighborhood in the 1948 flood.

It is apparent that the saboteurs of the Hall plan preferred the satisfaction of defeating this logical flood-wall project rather than saving the triple cities from floods.

These same smart alecks are now gleefully jubiliant over the prospect of local flood works being shelved with preference directed to our national defense program.

They grin and grimace at my suggestion to call our flood walls a defense priority when I demand that the Army engineers build them anyway.

Not content in wrecking proper safeguards in the interest of our Triple Cities population, they have extended their campaign of harassment to the rural folk of Chenango, Delaware, Otsego Counties.

The tremendous torrent of protesting letters I am now receiving from committees and people in the areas of Mount Upton, South New Berlin, Rockdale, Afton, Unadilla, and other nearby communities, tells me the enemies of proper flood control are on the march.

There is no reason why the rural areas of Unadilla, Butternuts, or any other point in the Susquehanna and Chenango watersheds should be destroyed by a massive dam-construction program in place of the erection of our Triple Cities flood walls.

You can put me down as standing solidly on the side of the citizens of both the metropolitan and rural areas in this fight against the hypocrites and monekywrench throwers trying to build these mighty dams ahead of the Hall floodwall projects.

I say to these finaglers, leave the rural people alone, do not ruin their lands, their homes, their properties just because you are determined to deprive the Triple Cities of flood walls.

Is there more gravy in juicy contracts for building dams than for the flood walls? You know there is, and so do I.

Be patriotic Americans for a change. Forget the profits, the dollars you will line your pockets with if the dams are built.

Forget the dams and get busy on our flood walls, which ought to reach solidly clear from Conklin and Kirkwood away down past West Endicott and Vestal, nearly to the Tioga County line.

You people up there in Chenango, Otsego, and Delaware Counties can rest assured I will fight these birds to the finish. I will not take this dam building lying down. My preference is floodwall construction down where the trouble is in the Triple Cities, and I do not believe in wrecking your houses either.

Korean Policy and Our Diplomatic Relations in the Far East

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. JAMES T. PATTERSON
OF CONNECTICUT
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES
Thursday, April 5, 1951

Mr. PATTERSON. Mr. Speaker, Johr C. Caldwell, former Embassy attaché at Seoul, Korea, gave an address Tuesday afternoon in Derby, Conn., to the Sarah Riggs Humphreys Chapter, DAR, an account of which was carried in Wednesday's edition of the Ansonia Sentinel.

His remarks, which were confined to Korean policy as promulgated by the State Department and our diplomatic relations in the Far East, merit far greater circulation than given by their printing in a local newspaper.

Mr. Caldwell, a first-hand observer, related astonishing tales of our failure to recognize the basic differences in oriental and occidental behavior. One portion of his address relates to the obvious incompetency of embassy personnel and to the tragic failure of State Department intelligence in foreseeing the invasion of South Korea.

This is the most forthright account I have yet encountered of the complete inability of the State Department to represent the people of the Unitd States in its foreign policy.

The story is one of shame—it cries out for corrective action.

The news account follows:

CALDWELL SAYS SNOBS, INCOMPETENTS, ALCOHOLICS REPRESENTED UNITED STATES AT SEOUL; TELLS OF GRAVE MISTAKE MADE AT YALTA

Diplomatic mistakes caused us to fail in spreading the principles of democracy in Korea, John C. Caldwell, former United States Embassy Attaché at Seoul, Korea, told a large gathering of members of Sarah Riggs Humphreys Chapter, Daughters of the American Revolution, at the meeting held Tuesday afternoon in Library Hall.

"We had a wonderful opportunity to teach the people what democracy was," he said, "but we left the people confused. Part of our failure is a matter of personnel," the speaker declared. "I don't believe there are many Communists in the State Department despite what Senator MCCARTHY says, but there are people who are not doing a good job of selling America to the people of the world," averred the former United States Embassy attach'.

"Today people are of tremendous importance, especially the people who represent us abroad. The Voice of America employs 10,650 people, and the President wants to raise this to 13,000."

WRONG PERSONNEL

"Unfortunately, alcoholics, incompetent people, and people who believe in the Gook philosophy are representing us. A person who has a Gook philosophy is a person who believes that people who live differently or not as well as he does are a low-class people. Our representatives in Seoul showed in their everyday actions that they disliked the people with whom they worked. Half of our people detested the Koreans and showed it. They knew nothing of the people, their habits or customs. The Communists in their propaganda say we are snobs and we live up to their propaganda."

NO TRAINING

Mr. Caldwell went on to say that the United States Government gives no training to the people attached to the State Department.

"There is no way of testing aptitudes. We send them to Washington, D. C., for 3 weeks to learn State Department protocol. They learn how to correctly address the Ambassador and how to drop their calling cards in order of importance. We teach them nothing about the country to which they are going, the customs or the people. A salesman is not a good salesman unless he is interested in his prospect. Incalculable damage has been done by sending incompetent personnel as America's representatives in foreign lands."

CHRONIC ALCOHOLIC

He told of a man in the State Department at Seoul who was third in importance. This man was a chronic alcoholic, the speaker averred, who was treated for alcoholism and released, readmitted for treatment and again released. He attempted suicide, was again treated and released and is still on duty representing you in Korea.

Mr. Caldwell, born in China of missionary parents, said he came to this country for the first time when he entered college. He declared that Korea was the big story of 1950 and the side show of 1951. Korea will continue to be of great interest to America and Russia. The latter, he said, thought it could win a large part of the geography of the world with America doing nothing to stop her. He continued that he was afraid that Korea will continue as a danger spot for a good many years.

He wondered if we would learn a lesson from our mistakes in Korea—diplomatic mistakes which cost the Americans 60,000 in casualties and a total of 1,000,000 casualties of all nations.

AN OLD COUNTRY

Korea is an old country, the speaker said, with a history that goes back 4,235 years. It has been fought over and grasped at by neighboring countries for a long time. In the nineteenth century, Japan, China, and Russia fought for its control, with the Japanese winning out early in the twentieth century. Russia has always been interested in Korea, with both Stalin and Lenin expounding the theory that if the billion and a half people of the Far East could be indoctrinated in communism these people could provide the raw manpower to completely control the western capitalistic nations.

YALTA MISTAKE

The greatest mistake America made was made when we gave entry to the Far East to Russia at Yalta. We were anxious for Russia to get into the Asiatic war, he declared. Our Intelligence Department was not operating very well at the time. Japan was near defeat. We did not need Russia, Mr. Caldwell pointed out.

The idea at Yalta was that we would enter South Korea to disarm the Japanese and Russia would do the same in North Korea, so the thirty-eighth parallel came into being simply because it was a line which more or less divided Korea in half. But no thought was given to the fact that two-thirds of the population lives in the south, which is almost completely agricultural, and one-third the population resides in the north, which is where all the industries are located.

DISARM JAPAN

The thirty-eighth parallel was to be in existence only until the Japanese had been disarmed. A United States-U. S. S. R. commission was set up to agree on a government for Korea, but Russia would not agree to anything proposed. Finally, in 1948, the United Nations sent a commission which tried to work with Russia, but was denied the right to go north of the thirty-eighth parallel.

GOVERNMENT

Finally it was decided to elect a government in the American zone, and in May 1948 an election was held, Mr. Caldwell informed his listeners which was a free election, more democratic than in my home State, Tennessee. Dr. Syngman Rhee became President. The South Koreans had more freedom in 1948–50 than ever before. More than 2,000,000 refugees came in from North Korea, over mountain passes at night, under great risk, to get into South Korea.

The military government, established in 1945 and continuing until 1948, left as soon as the South Korean Government was established despite the interest and demands of the Korean people. Our Department of State took over all operations in South Korea, and it is the Department of State which can keep us out of war, or, by a bad job, get us into war, the speaker emphasized.

LARGE ESTABLISHMENT

"As soon as our troops left in the summer of 1948 we built a very large diplomatic establishment, the largest ever maintained overseas. Larger than in great capitals of the world. In Seoul we had an establishment of 1,800 Americans. There were 11 hotels, 10 bars, a beauty parlor, barber shop, taxis, and liquor store. The United States Government owned 375 homes. Good salaries were paid, with 100 employees getting $10,000 per year, plus a house, rent free, plus two servants paid for by the State Department, plus free utilities and fuel. Still, Seoul was considered a hardship post, and we were paid 25 percent extra for having to live in a hardship post."

Mr. Caldwell said that he believed State Department employees should be comfortable, but I think when we have luxury then we create a chasm between ourselves and the people we are supposed to serve. The Koreans have a very low standard of living, and the Communist tries to capitalize on the needs of the people. The Communists always point to America as rich, imperialistic America, and how we lived created a wonderful Communist line. And how they used it. They told the people we were only interested in making money and more money. There should be some lessons we should learn on how to develop diplomatic relations in the future.

FAULTY INTELLIGENCE

"On June 25 we heard that the invasion had started. We had joked about the time when the Communists would invade, take us all prisoners, and send us to Siberia. State Department intelligence had reported that the Communist morale was low, that there was no connection between the Korean Communists and Moscow, that the North Koreans had not good military equipment, and that the South Korean Army was so strong it could stop any invasion." He pointed out that this information was received through our intelligence despite the fact that Seoul was only 25 air miles from the thirty-eighth parallel and that the North Koreans had evacuated whole villages, widened highways so that tanks could get by, strengthened buildings."

INCREDULOUS AMBASSADOR

"Our Ambassador at Seoul refused to believe the story of the invasion for hour after hour and refused to allow the evacuation of our women and children. He would not allow American planes to evacuate our women and children because he feared it might provoke an incident. Finally he ordered the evacuation and there was only one boat in the harbor at Inchon, a boat with a capacity for 12 people and it carried 682 women and children to Japan. Many had to be taken off the boat on stretchers—all the result of faulty intelligence. In this battle against communism we must have honest intelligence in State Department operations," the speaker declared.

SIX KNEW

He continued that although we had not believed the invasion rumors, the British, with a staff of only six people, had sent out evacuation orders 3 weeks before. The South Korean Government had warned us of the coming invasion as had the government of Chiang Kai-shek. "We were so full of wishful thinking, so hopeful that the North Koreans would believe we were their friends instead of the Russians being their friends, that we believed that there would be no trouble.

"I was in the State Department for 8 years and have heard top officials declaim on the merits of Chinese Communists, declaring that we would find no real tie between the Chinese Communists and Russia. The North Korean or Chinese Communist in the Far East is part of international communism. This trouble in Korea started at Russia's direction. Our whole history for the last 5 years in dealing with communism has failed miserably."

ONE LOCATION

Mr. Caldwell told of the Voice of America, whose purpose it is through radio, newspapers, motion pictures, and information centers to sell our point of view. He said that 33 persons were engaged in Korea simply selling our point of view, to teach the Koreans about democracy and American aims. Our first mistake was that the 33 engaged in various phases of selling America to the Koreans all were located in Seoul. The Koreans are largely agrarian. They live on farms and very few get to Seoul. Yet no real effort was made to reach the millions of people on the farms.

The people are illiterate but intelligent, Mr. Caldwell said. He told of the library of 16,000 volumes maintained at Seoul and of the 200 periodicals received every month, among which were Vogue and Harper's Bazaar. He said we were trying to teach democracy to a people who couldn't read English.

One of the unfortunate things is, the speaker said, that the State Department operates the same no matter where it is, in Norway, England, Iran, or Korea. So inflexible is the list of reading material that the list for London, England, is the same as it is for Seoul, Korea.

EXHIBIT

He told of a group of students who asked him if he could get an exhibit of public housing to show in Korea because of the desperate housing shortage. A "magnificent exhibit" of Peter Stuyvesant Village in New York City was flown to Korea, all fine brick buildings. The people become frustrated, he said, when they see this sort of exhibit when they have only straw and mud to work with. The students came to Mr. Caldwell and told him that the exhibit was fine, and that, perhaps, in a hundred years something like that might be built in Korea, but could something be brought in which would be of help today.

He told of asking for a motion picture on college life, expecting a film on a small college. Instead a documentary film on the University of California was sent to be shown to students who have no textbooks and who must study in frame buildings without heat.

COMMUNISTS WORK FOR US

Mr. Caldwell said that we failed in our intelligence and we failed to sell the people our aims and what democracy really means but, he continued, "I don't think all is lost. Where we have failed the Communists have won it for us." The occupation of southern Korea by the Communists has caused the Koreans to be violently against communism. He said that in letters from friends in China he is informed that the anti-Communist feeling is greater than ever before. They know that the economic and farm reforms do not work.

EVANGELICAL ZEAL

In conclusion Mr. Caldwell said that he hoped that from our mistakes we can learn how to reach the people and that now is the time to win or lose the people of the Far East. He said what is needed is the evangelical zeal which marked the work of the missionaries. He told of his father who 51 years ago went to China as a missionary and of his wife's father who went to Korea as a missionary 40 years ago, when conditions were bad and living arrangements poor. He declared that those missionaries had succeeded because they believed in what they were selling, Christianity. They learned to like the people. Mr. Caldwell emphasized that if we could get the State Department to believe in what we are attempting to sell and to use the evangelical zeal that marked the missionaries "then we can win this great fight against communism."

Safe Alternative to a Big Army

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. SAMUEL W. YORTY

OF CALIFORNIA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Friday, April 6, 1951

Mr. YORTY. Mr. Speaker, I should like to direct the attention of the House to the following thoughtful statement relative to universal military training which appeared as an editorial in the Evening Star yesterday:

SAFE ALTERNATIVE TO A BIG ARMY

Chairman VINSON, of the House Armed Services Committee, is right. This country cannot afford either the economic or military consequence of being without universal military training in the threatening era which stretches ahead into the indefinite future. A military training system is a necessary adjunct of a strong and ready Reserve program to back up the standing army. With such a system we can run the calculated risk of maintaining a small Regular Defense Establishment, knowing that in an emergency there will be trained manpower instantly available to augment the standing Armed Forces.

Without an adequate trained Reserve the only safe plan would be to build up a much larger Regular Army than is currently planned. There is a limit, however, to the defense burden which our economy can support.

The bill before the House differs from the Senate-approved bill in several minor respects and one major one. The House version would reduce the present draft age of 19 to 18½, while the Senate bill would lower it to 18. Draft service is lengthened from 21 to 26 months, as compared with the Senate requirement for 24 months' service. The House bill has no limit on the number of men who could be inducted, whereas the Senate placed a 4,000,000 limit on military manpower. A major difference between the bills is that the House measure places a definite 3-year limit on the drafting of men for actual service. The Senate defeated a somewhat similar limitation proposed by Senator TAFT.

While the 3-year time limit would be restricted by the language of the House bill to only that part of selective service which channeled men into the Regular Armed Forces, leaving UMT unaffected. The Star believes it would be a mistake to raise any legal barrier to further induction of men in this unsettled period. Since the program contemplated under the legislation would involve a tapering off of inductions for active service, it is not clear what is to be gained by setting a deadline on further inductions. If, as is hoped, conditions grow no worse than they are today, or if they improve, inductions for actual service will have reached a minimum by 1954 or before, making statutory restrictions more or less academic. If, on the other hand, the world situation worsens before 1954, it would be foolhardy to place the induction system under the handicap of a deadline.

In any event, the House should take care to see that any time limit which may be adopted does not apply to universal military training. UMT is a long-view security program that should be set up on a permanent basis. It should continue to supply a reservoir of trained manpower in time of peace as well as during emergency periods. The very existence of such a reservoir would help to keep the peace.

In the True Tradition of the Free Press

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. ALBERT P. MORANO
OF CONNECTICUT
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES
Friday, April 6, 1951

Mr. MORANO. Mr. Speaker, under permission granted to extend my remarks, I wish to call attention to a statement from Senator CHARLES TOBEY, of New Hampshire, elicited by Mr. Fortune Pope, editor of the Il Progresso, national newspaper serving the Italian-American population of the Nation.

To me, unity among the various minority groups that form our population is a cherished and desired state. Therefore, I was pleased at the action of Mr. Pope in clearing up a serious misunderstanding concerning Italo-Americans, which arose from the Senate crime investigation hearings in New York. I say serious because at this time, while the Nation is girded to stepping up preparations for full mobilization, unity is of the utmost necessity.

Fortune Pope, as a spokesman for the Americans of Italian origin, performed a public service in keeping with the best traditions of the great free press, in traveling to Washington to meet with Senator TOBEY to clarify certain points made by the Senator on radio and television, regarding Italian immigrants to this country.

In eliciting the following statement from Senator TOBEY, Mr. Pope has done a distinct service to Americans of Italian origin whose exemplary citizenship has contributed greatly to America's growth, and to the American people as a whole:

RADIO STATEMENT OF HON. CHARLES TOBEY, UNITED STATES SENATOR FROM NEW HAMPSHIRE

In the light of certain misunderstandings which have arisen from the recent crime investigation hearings in New York, I am grateful to WHOM and the Progresso for this opportunity to clarify those misunderstandings.

Issue has been made about a letter which I read into the record at one of the recent television sessions of the crime committee hearings.

I read that letter to convey the thought that the overwhelming majority of the Italian-American citizens are good men, such as the writer of that letter, and just because a small percentage of these people have done wrong, it casts no reflection on the many honest, hard-working, patriotic Americans of Italian extraction who have contributed their talent and industry to make our country strong and great. My sole purpose in reading this letter was to pay tribute to those fine Americans who—in contrast to a small minority—have given their best to the arts and industries and civic life of these United States.

I felt the spirit of that letter conveyed these thoughts and that it did not need to be clarified by any statement from me. However, if it was misunderstood, I am glad to clarify the point that I was trying to make. I count many Americans of Italian extraction among my close and intimate friends.

The last thing I would have in mind or do would be to cast aspersions on any racial group. I would consider that entirely un-American.

The strength of our country lies in the fact that here are woven into the fabric of American citizenship the blood of all nations, blended into our national life, making for strength and unity.

Good Italian-American citizens, as well as the good citizens of other minority segments of our population, have not had their good record damaged by the handful of evildoers who were called to testify before our committee. I know that I speak for all the members of the committee in assuring you of the heartfelt sincerity with which I say this.

Topics of Concern to the Marine Corps

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. CLARK W. THOMPSON
OF TEXAS
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES
Friday, April 6, 1951

Mr. THOMPSON of Texas. Mr. Speaker, in the debate on the current draft extension and universal military training measure, there have been occasional references to the United States Marine Corps. Things which I have heard have been uniformly complimentary. Of particular and timely interest has been the comment on the excellent job done by the civilian component—the Reserve of the United States Marines.

In this, I take particular pride because of my long association with the Reserve and because during the closing phase of World War II and for some months thereafter I was director of the Reserve. As such I had a part in the planning of the organization which has functioned so magnificently and with such telling effect during the Korean troubles.

Every since I became a marine in 1917 I have asked myself the question which so many others have asked and are still asking: Why do marines fight they way they do? I have just read a letter sent by the Commandant of the Marine Corps under date of February 7, 1951, to all general and commanding officers in the corps. It is an exceptional document and should be read by everyone in any way connected with the armed services. It would also be of value to everyone who is in a position of authority or leadership over others.

In this letter of the Commandant to his officers, we may have found an important key to the question: Why do marines fight the way they do?

The Commandant's letter follows:

DEPARTMENT OF THE NAVY,
HEADQUARTERS,
UNITED STATES MARINE CORPS,
Washington, D. C., February 7, 1951.

From: Commandant of the Marine Corps.
To: Distribution List.
Subject: Topics of concern to the Marine Corps.

1. Since it is obviously impracticable to hold the Commandant's annual conference of general officers under the current circumstances, the medium of this letter is employed to acquaint all Marine Corps general officers and other commanding officers with the Commandant's views on a number of matters of concern to the entire Marine Corps.

2. This, unquestionably, is one of the most critical periods in the history of the Marine Corps. Following demobilization and further progressive administrative reduction from 1945 to June 1950, we have again embarked on a program of expansion in a new period of national emergency. The First Marine Division and the First Marine Aircraft Wing have already demonstrated in Korea that marines of today can equal the outstanding performance of their predecessors. The actions of the Marine Corps in the months and years ahead may very possibly have some measure of influence on the destiny of the country. These actions, beyond question, will determine the future of the Marine Corps.

3. The reputation of the Corps—the manner in which it is looked upon by the American people whom it serves—is a priceless asset. It was established by faithful and unswerving service rendered with a high order of professional competency at all times. A great part of it was due to success of marines in battle. A significant fraction comes, however, from the fact that habitually marines discharge any job assigned in a satisfactory manner. The public has come to associate competence and efficiency with the Marine Corps and it is a responsibility of every marine to uphold this reputation. The Marine Corps will never become so large or impersonal as to be indifferent to the activities of the individual marine. The success of the Corps in the past has been the result of the collective efforts of many individuals. Success in the future will be attained by the same type of effort.

4. Attitude: In any period of expansion, it is difficult to retain a personal, individual approach to the men. To do so requires extraordinary effort on the part of every officer and noncommissioned officer. It is expected that whatever effort is necessary will be made; whatever measures are required will be taken. Should the time ever arrive when the individual marine becomes—or is permitted to believe that he has become—only a number of an MOS, then the Marine Corps will, in fact, have commenced to decline. In the 6 months from July 1950 to January 1951, the Marine Corps doubled its strength. With expansion of that order, it is far from simple to instill in every marine the proper sense of responsibility and pride in the Corps. Nevertheless, it is a job that must be done.

5. Interservice relations: As a military service of this Nation, the Marine Corps has certain clearly defined functions. The Marine Corps' justification is dependent entirely on the manner in which these functions are carried out. An implied responsibility is that of complete and wholehearted cooperation with the other services. The American people definitely, and quite properly, expect this to be done. Neither that nor any other worthwhile purpose is served by interservice controversy. Accordingly, it is expected that every possible measure will be taken to work in harmony with the other services. The emergency facing this country will require work and sacrifice on the part of every American. The immediate task of the Marine Corps in this emergency is to develop and maintain combat forces in being. This requires the complete and undivided effort of every marine. Perfecting and maintaining the proficiency of the Marine Corps is our full-time job. Relations with other services can and will be conducted on a basis of mutual cooperation and without sacrifice or compromise of Marine Corps principles. Marine participation in interservice controversy in any form acts to the detriment of the Marine Corps and to the entire national defense structure, and is a disservice to both.

6. Economy: The extensive program of expansion on which the services have embarked is by no means to be interpreted as indicating that previous measures of economy can be relaxed. While it is true that there will be more money, more men, and more matériel in the coming months, it is also true that the need to do the most with the least is far greater than it has ever been before. In order to realize the greatest possible return, it will be necessary to adhere to the most rigid measures of economy. Assignment of personnel to noncombatant units will continue to be on a basis of strict austerity. Every allocation of funds, personnel, and matériel to supporting functions must be carefully and continually screened to insure that it is made on the basis of minimum needs. The past efforts of the Marine Corps to make the most of its available means have been uniformly successful. The need for these efforts is even more pressing today than it was in the past. The immediate goal is to develop, in the shortest possible time, formations within the Fleet Marine Forces with the personnel, matériel, and training required to permit them to carry out Marine Corps combat missions. The urgency is such as to prohibit diversion of any of our limited resources to less essential tasks. Every noncombat activity must carry its full share of the burden required to place our maximum effort in the Fleet Marine Forces. Adherence to this policy is a command responsibility.

7. Success in combat can be attributed in great measure to leadership, training, and discipline. In its efforts to produce and maintain combat forces in being, the Marine Corps must direct its attention to these important factors.

(a) Leadership: The development of troop leaders is a continuing process. In a period of expansion such as this, there must be continual screening for men who can be trained to make good leaders. They must be trained with meticulous care. There is no better training device than that of constant demonstration of good leadership practices. There are indications that at least some junior officers and noncommissioned officers are either unaware of or completely indifferent to many of their fundamental responsibilities.

One of the most significant of these is the binding obligation to employ the authority of their rank solely for its intended purpose. There have been instances in which this authority has been so perverted as to result in the physical mistreatment of individual marines. Abuse of authority can undermine and eventually destroy a military organization. In such circumstances, the fault is not alone with the officer or noncommissioned officer concerned. It is clearly indicative of failure on the part of more senior officers, particularly in the matters of leadership and supervision.

(b) Training: Training is, of course, preparation for battle. Thus, it is the most important function of troops not engaged in combat. It is important that the men understand that the training is designed not only to improve their individual performance in combat but also to enable them to function effectively as members of teams in combat wherein malperformance by one individual may endanger all others. While training in the Fleet Marine Forces obviously provides the most direct benefits, nevertheless training conducted at posts and stations is vitally important. It must be properly planned, energetically pursued, and carefully supervised. It must not be considered merely as a perfunctory duty. Every marine is available for assignment to the Fleet Marine Forces and he must be trained continually to permit him to carry out such an assignment. General Order No. 10 (shortly to be superseded by General Order No. 83) outlines a sound course of training to accomplish this purpose.

(c) Discipline: The validity of the Marine Corps standards of discipline has been repeatedly demonstrated. These standards are not to be relaxed or qualified during this period of expansion.

(d) Appearance: In the circumstances such as those currently existing, there is often a tendency to relax normal standards in the personal appearance of individual marines. This same tendency is noted in the appearance of equipment (particularly motor transport) and in the general maintenance of buildings, grounds, and facilities. This deterioration of standards must be avoided. The remedy lies in additional effort on the part of every officer and noncommissioned officer.

8. Recruiting: The Marine Corps expansion to date has been accomplished by using Reserves and voluntary enlistments. The great majority of the Reserves have now been mobilized. It is to the best interest of the Marine Corps to continue to make maximum use of voluntary enlistments as long as it is possible to do so. Every Marine Corps activity can assist the recruiting program by encouraging voluntary enlistment by every practicable means.

9. Inquiries addressed to the Commandant from Members of Congress and from parents and interested friends of marines have, of course, increased tremendously since July. The general pattern established by these inquiries is, in a measure, indicative of the manner in which various command responsibilities are being discharged. Some of the most often mentioned topics are listed below in order that all commanders may insure that the conditions referred to do not exist in their commands.

(a) Food: The fact that at least some complaints about food are received under almost all circumstances does not justify complacency. In spite of the high cost of food there is no reason why entirely adequate messes cannot be maintained. The problem of units in the combat area is, of course, a special circumstance. In other situations, an adequate mess can be provided if the commander gives to it a sufficient amount of his personal attention and supervision. The manner in which food is prepared and served usually determines whether the mess is good or bad. This is the area which requires the greatest attention and supervision and which shows the greatest results of such effort. It is worth noting that at least one complaint was received which stated that one mess was preparing far too much food with a resulting extravagant waste.

(b) Mail: In the question of mail, the problems faced by units in the combat area are of a special nature and not within the purview of these remarks. The morale value of mail is readily recognizable. For all units within the continental United States there is no apparent reason why mail should not be distributed rapidly and regularly though reports to the contrary have been received.

(c) Reserves:

(1) There have been many reports that some reserves are dissatisfied and disgruntled. This seems to be due to a lack of understanding of why they were mobilized and due also to the confusion incident to the large-scale mobilization last fall. There are repeated reports that the reservists, even now, are not receiving proper training. There are other reports which clearly indicate that the reservists do not understand their rights and privileges regarding insurance, family allotments, and other administrative procedures.

(2) While it was reasonable to expect that at least some of these problems would exist during the first few weeks of mobilization, their existence at this date would appear to be inexcusable. Measures should be taken immediately to clarify problems of this kind. Commands which have already carried out orientation courses should institute an immediate recheck to insure that there is no misunderstanding. It must be recognized that these men left their civilian pursuits, their families, and their homes on very short notice. If they are to serve properly as marines, it is necessary that they have an understanding of why they were called to active duty. The importance of their work as marines must be made clear.

(3) The authority under which the reserves were mobilized provided that they would serve for a period of 21 months. Under the terms of the Naval Reserve Act and the National Security Act, the Secretary of the Navy has the authority to extend this period of duty for the duration of the emergency. If the international situation should worsen, this authority would probably be invoked. It most certainly would be in the event of a declaration of war. At the present time, Marine Corps personnel plans are predicated on the assumption that all reservists who so desire, will be released at the end of their 21-months tour. As indicated above, this is, of course, subject to change. As soon as it is practicable to establish a definite program for the return of reservists to inactive duty, all commands will be informed.

(4) It would seem quite obvious that a reservist could scarcely be expected to believe that he is providing an important service to his country on active duty unless he is actually receiving thorough training, and unless, after he is trained, he receives an assignment commensurate with his rank.

(5) It is a basic responsibility of commanders to insure that every marine is fully conversant with his rights, privileges, and responsibilities relating to pay, insurance, and family allotments.

(d) Commercial enterprises: Several reports have been received regarding the improper activities of commercial enterprises on posts and stations. Regulations covering this matter are quite explicit. The presence of large groups of men presents a possible sales opportunity which energetic representatives of commercial enterprises are not likely to overlook. Every possible precaution must be taken to insure that the Marine Corps is not, even by inference, a party to commercial enterprises except through the medium of post exchanges, and that no such enterprise operate on a Marine Corps post or station except as provided by current regulations.

10. The Marine Corps has an important job to do in the future. We can well be proud of our past accomplishments, but that record, no matter how bright, will not serve as future justification for the Marine Corps. By our actions now and in the future we must demonstrate that we are worthy of our status as a military service in this Nation's defense structure.

The National Grange Believes Selective Service Is Meeting Fully Emergency Defense Needs

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. GEORGE B. SCHWABE
OF OKLAHOMA
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES
Friday, April 6, 1951

Mr. SCHWABE. Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my remarks in the RECORD, I include the following letter:

NATIONAL GRANGE,
Washington, D. C., April 5, 1951.

Hon. GEORGE B. SCHWABE,
House Office Building,
Washington, D. C.

DEAR CONGRESSMAN: The National Grange believes that the selective service is meeting fully and to spare the emergency defense needs of the Nation; and the military concedes this. We have faith in our people, in democracy, and in Congress to support selective service to the fullest necessary extent as long as danger threatens; and we wish the armed services had this faith and would not try to pass peacetime UMT under the cloak of the present grave danger.

House bill 3364 meets our officially declared stand on this profoundly vital problem in that—

1. It discards universal military training and calls for the fullest necessary use of selective service, with lowered physical and mental tests if needed;

2. Calls for induction at age 19 instead of 18, and for maximum of 24 months' service, or of not over 2 years of a boy's school life, and for release to reserve status if national safety requires it;

3. Provides that Congress by concurrent resolution can change service requirements or suspend the draft when the danger is passed, and for a preservation of selective service machinery but a definite termination date for the draft which automatically gives you as an individual Congressman the right to review your present stand;

4. And provides for a democratically and economically sound occupational deferment based on obtaining maximum national service in the field in which each man is best fitted to serve his country.

The National Grange has no official stand on the provision of House bill 3364 for service in racially segregated units.

We sincerely hope, for the sake of adequate provision for the present emergency, and for the preservation of democracy and the right of Congress to reflect that democracy, that you will support a bill carrying the four numbered items mentioned above.

We sincerely hope and pray also that every Member of the Congress will put forth all possible efforts to bring about a safe and sound reduction of armaments for all nations alike, for a strengthening of law and order and a Christian peace for the world.

Sincerely yours,

J. T. SAUNDERS,
Legislative Counsel.

Proposed Luxury Tax on Meat

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. WILLIAM G. BRAY
OF INDIANA
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES
Friday, April 6, 1951

Mr. BRAY. Mr. Speaker, a plan to place a luxury tax on meat in order to force the low-income group to eat grain instead of meat was quietly launched through the professional staff—not the committee members—of the Joint Committee on the January 1951 Economic Report of the President.

Such a plan is un-American and demonstrates how callous a bureaucracy can become toward the wage earners of our country. This report bases the feasibility of this plan principally on the studies and testimony of J. Kenneth Galbraith, professor at Harvard University, who has also held many high positions with various Government commissions and agencies having to do with the control of American living, and the testimony of Harold B. Rowe, of Brookings Institute, also a prominent figure in the Washington control bureaucracy for many years.

In order that there can be no misunderstanding as to the intent of this group, I will quote briefly from the report and the hearings before the committee. On page 365 of the hearings, Mr. Rowe, mentioning Mr. Galbraith's statement, said:

A justification could be made for the use of a sales tax upon meat to restrain the competitive demand that moves toward that product as incomes increase, particularly among the lower-income groups.

The report itself, on page 52, says:

This means that taxes on certain luxury foods might not be amiss. * * * Meat, it has often been pointed out, is in reality a luxury food.

This plan to prevent the wage-earning group in America from having meat, points out that they can get their calories by eating the grains. The low-income groups are specifically mentioned. The meat then can be consumed by those who can afford to pay the tax.

This clearly demonstrates the depth to which a regimented bureaucracy will go. Yes; the low-income group can eat mush and live, but that is not the diet or philosophy of living that has made America great. In the late days of the last war bureaucratic muddling made meat almost unobtainable in a land of plenty. Production in industries where great physical stamina was needed, such as mining, suffered sharply because workmen could not get the meat needed for a wholesome diet.

In England the socialized regimentation of business and labor has by devious means kept the wage earner from having a wholesome, balanced diet, including meat, so that now they have not the strength and will to resent the regimentation of their lives by the bureaucrats.

The British socialized government now pays their butchers not to sell meat. The Attlee government has cut the British meat ration down to about 1 pound a month.

The butchers under this program cannot make a living, so the Socialist government has put them on the payroll to be supported by public taxes.

It is quite possible that America might some day find itself in a similar condition. If this plan to put a luxury tax on meat is put into effect, fewer and fewer people can buy meat. Less and less meat will be produced and we will enter into an era of economic scarcity where only the wealthy can eat meat. That may be the goal of those who would regiment our lives. An economy of abundance has made America the greatest country on earth. We must keep it that way. To do otherwise will destroy our high standard of living.

If communism comes to America, it will because of economic, social, and moral decay from within, not by conquest from abroad.

Iron Ore and the St. Lawrence Seaway

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. JAMES E. VAN ZANDT
OF PENNSYLVANIA
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES
Friday, April 6, 1951

Mr. VAN ZANDT. Mr. Speaker, much attention has been given in recent years to the dwindling deposit of high-grade iron ore in Minnesota's Mesabi Range.

The Troy (N. Y.) Record on December 18, 1950, answers the propaganda of advocates of the St. Lawrence seaway in the following editorial:

IRON ORE AND THE SEAWAY

Much attention has been given in recent years to the dwindling deposit of high-grade iron ore in Minnesota's Mesabi Range. The situation has caused concern because the Minnesota deposit, one of the greatest in the world, has been the country's principal supply for iron ore.

The last few years have brought a widespread hunt for new iron-ore deposits, a hunt which has taken representatives of our steel companies to many foreign countries. Relatively early explorations brought the developments of big mining operations in Chile. More recently have been the still bigger operations in Venezuela.

Recently there has been considerable comment on the big Labrador deposits. Since then public attention has been drawn to a comparable project—Steep Rock—in the Province of Ontario above Lake Superior. Each of these operations involves the extraction of high-grade ore in huge quantities.

The Labrador and Steep Rock projects could be competitive. The ore from Steep Rock could readily reach our inland steel mills by ship through the Great Lakes and the Welland Canal. The ore from Labrador could do likewise, if the St. Lawrence waterway were ever built.

The ore from Chile had been brought to the east coast. The ore from Venezuela will also come to the east coast.

Despite all this activity the Mesabi Range must not be ruled out of the picture prematurely. The Mesabi Range people have known for years that their high-grade ore would give out eventually. They have known, too, that they have "uncounted billions of tons" of taconite which has a low iron-bearing content. They have been devoting much time and effort in trying to find an economical method of extracting iron ore from taconite.

A news story from Duluth indicates that a method has been found. Details are not disclosed. But the dispatch says that the outlook "staggers the imagination of even a people accustomed to miracles in mining." All of this is doubly good news at this time. Stiff competition among iron ore producers could bring a downward trend in steel prices. The possibility of continuing to meet most, if not all, of this country's iron ore demands from continental sources in these unsettled times is reassuring. Also, it should bring to an end the dispute over the St. Lawrence seaway for which the Labrador deposit was the only legitimate argument.

Point 4 Without the Taxpayers

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. DONALD L. JACKSON
OF CALIFORNIA
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Friday, April 6, 1951

Mr. JACKSON of California. Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my remarks in the RECORD, I include the following editorial from the Los Angeles Times of March 20, 1951:

POINT 4 WITHOUT THE TAXPAYERS

Point 4 never dies. President Truman proposed this switch on the give-away program in his inaugural address in 1949, and since that time all the global planners have been conning the atlases, finding far places where the American taxpayers' money may be spent for the greater glory of one thing and another.

Of course, all this spending of public funds is supposed to help the United States; the appeal is always to our enlightened self-interest. The more we spend abroad, the stronger our position. The seventeenth century barber-surgeon operated on the same principle; he bled his patients nearly white to cure them of all their ills, from pox to flux.

BLEEDING THE PATIENTS

The latest program for activating point 4 was produced under official auspices. The President has received it from Nelson D. Rockefeller, who headed the board that drew it up. It is big, both in outlook and in money. Without looking very deep one can find $950,000,000 in proposed appropriations.

The Rockefeller board first of all would consolidate our international charities, following the logic of a local Community Chest, in an organization called the Overseas Economic Administration. This OEC would absorb the Marshall plan (ECA) and a score of other give-away programs administered by various United States agencies. The OEC would spend $500,000,000 on railroads, harbors, irrigation projects, and on health and training programs. The board also proposes a United States contribution of $200,000,000 (to a fund of $500,000,000) for the construction of public works by an international development authority.

GUARANTY ON LOSSES

The board wants private enterprise to join it in building a better world, and to get American businessmen interested it proposed to guarantee them against losses in countries whose currencies are even shakier than our own. As a hedge against the vagaries of foreign currencies it would establish a $100,000,000 authority in the Import-Export Bank to take the risk out of foreign investment, and would toss another $150,000,000 into a $400,000,000 international finance corporation, which would be a department of the bank, to make loans to private enterprise for businesses abroad.

Other guaranties would be made to induce American business to go abroad in larger amount—largely against the predatory tax policies of the "friendly" countries which our tax money and our private enterprisers would be aiding.

The first question that occurs is how long would private, more or less free, enterprise remain so under this Government protection? The scheme might increase American investment abroad; indeed, it ought to, for the American investor would be shielded from almost all losses. His would not be risk capital, which is what keeps private enterprise progressing. He would take no more risk than he would in buying a United States Government bond; the American taxpayers would assume all the risk.

The second question is, How much private enterprise or initiative or imagination would adhere to such a scheme? The Government, taking all the risks, would tend to direct the foreign investment. Private businesses would be Government concessions, which Government would give or refuse. Who would want to take a chance with a strictly private enterprise abroad when he could get into something which the Government would guarantee—if, of course, the Government had planned it?

All this global planning would seem more reasonable if there were no alternative which did not depend on the American taxpayer. But there is one, and it works.

EXAMPLE OF ARAMCO

Lorania K. Francis has been reporting in the Times from Dhahran, Saudi Arabia, about the operations of Aramco, the great American oil-producing corporation. Aramco is doing in Saudi Arabia all the things that can be dreamed of under point 4 except to make the Saudi Arabians clients of the American taxpayers. As a result of Aramco's self-interested ministrations Arabs are healthier, wealthier, and wiser, the last in the sense that they are learning American technology by working at jobs where it is applied.

Aramco's guaranty is that oil can always be sold at a profit. It needs no point 4 subsidy. Its risk lies in its relationship with the Government of Saudi Arabia. It was willing to take that risk. It has established better relations with the Arabs, officially and unofficially, than our army of bureaucrats has been able to do with any of the peoples on whom they pour ECA money.

In Arabia point 4 is operating without the American taxpayers. Why not give some thought to creating the political climate which will allow more of the same to develop?

Statement of Motion Picture Industry Council

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. FRANCIS E. WALTER
OF PENNSYLVANIA
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Friday, April 6, 1951

Mr. WALTER. Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my remarks in the RECORD, I include the following letter and statement:

MARCH 27, 1951.

Hon. JOHN S. WOOD,
House of Representatives,
Washington, D. C.

DEAR SIR: The Motion Picture Industry Council has instructed me to convey to you the enclosed resolution expressing support of the hearings of the House Un-American Activities Committee, confident that the hearings will be distinguished by their fairness and objective inquiry.

The council, as can be noted from this letterhead, is composed of the key management, guild, and union groups in the production branch of the motion-picture industry.

We hope that this expression of support will contribute to the work undertaken by the committee and the objective which we all share—the exposure and destruction of the international Communist conspiracy.

Respectfully,

ART ARTHUR,
Executive Secretary.

OFFICIAL STATEMENT OF THE MOTION PICTURE INDUSTRY COUNCIL REGARDING HEARINGS OF THE HOUSE UN-AMERICAN ACTIVITIES COMMITTEE, MARCH 21, 1951

The Motion Picture Industry Council reaffirms its consistent opposition to communism, its works, its members, its methods. It wants to emphasize that, with the overwhelming majority of the American people, it believes that a clear and present danger to our Nation exists. The MPIC offers its strength and support to any legally constituted body that has as its object the exposure and destruction of the International Communist Party conspiracy.

Today, in Washington, the House Committee on Un-American Activities has begun hearings to determine the extent and effect of Communist infiltration in the motion-picture business. The MPIC supports this investigation.

But MPIC would be derelict in its duty if it did not point out that the public has been given an exaggerated and distorted impression of the degree of this Communist infiltration.

The MPIC hopes that all members of this industry who have been subpenaed will tell the truth, the whole truth, and nothing but the truth. It deplores those who stand on constitutional privileges to hide that truth.

or those who refuse to recognize the authority of the Congress.

To those men and women of this industry who are former members of the Communist Party or of any other subversive or Communist-controlled organization, and who openly admit such membership or association, and who conclusively prove that they have repudiated utterly and forever that relationship, the MPIC offers its commendation and encouragement.

When the whole history of the Communist movement in this country is written, it will establish beyond doubt that in every walk of life and in many sections of America there were otherwise honorable and well-intentioned persons who were taken in and used by the Communist Party.

It is not enough for such persons to repudiate their previous actions or associations. They best can prove the sincerity of their repudiation by joining their fellow Americans in the fight for freedom, secure in the knowledge that it is in the historical American tradition to judge a man by his acts and his acts alone.

Aid to India

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. FRANK M. KARSTEN
OF MISSOURI
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES
Friday, April 6, 1951

Mr. KARSTEN of Missouri. Mr. Speaker, under leave granted me to extend my remarks in the RECORD, I include the following editorial from the St. Louis Star-Times:

MAN ON THE DOORSTEP

President Truman has asked Congress to move quickly on India's urgent plea for wheat to avoid famine. He has suggested that the House and Senate immediately approve the grant of 1,000,000 tons of wheat to India. After that grant the legislators can, if they insist, settle down to debate or delay over the second 1,000,000-ton grant that is needed.

But the men in Congress seem completely unmoved by the appeal.

It is difficult to understand the congressional reasoning.

In the realms of high policy and of intricate ideology the problem is complicated, of course. One must carefully weigh the fact that Prime Minister Nehru has been an outspoken critic of the United States policy toward Communist-ridden China. One must consider at length the fact that the United States cannot afford to subsidize the whole world by grain grants; at the end of such a path of open-handedness lies bankruptcy, for not even this Nation's resources are inexhaustible.

But on the level of the thing called humaneness the problem seems essentially simple. There's a man at the door, asking for a bit of food. It's possible to argue with oneself that the man is perhaps a Socialist and should not be encouraged in his political convictions. It's possible to argue that, if he gets a meal here, he will take the next 50 cents he happens upon to buy whisky. It's possible to suggest that the family can't be handing out food to every panhandling passerby, or the family will soon be down to an empty refrigerator. And still the man will be standing there, hungry, asking for just a little food.

The man at the door is India. India's food supply has been depleted by drought. Never mind the political consequences of that depletion; never mind the probability that Nehru's government, if it fell because of famine, would be replaced by a Communist regime. The simple fact, the important fact is that people are starving in India—starving while this Nation sits tight on a surplus of wheat available to avoid starvation.

Shall we turn the starving man away from the door? Shall we stand pat on the statement that we have given quite enough through organized charity and can't be contributing to every supplicant on the stoop? Shall we condemn thousands of fellow human beings to the horrible death that comes with starvation and content ourselves with counting over the millions of bushels of grain we have in storage?

India is the man on the doorstep.

Iowan Analyzes Commercial Rentals in Connection With Proposed Rent-Control Extension

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. H. R. GROSS
OF IOWA
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES
Friday, April 6, 1951

Mr. GROSS. Mr. Speaker, I am herewith inserting in the RECORD a letter written to me by Mr. Russell C. Cowin, owner and operator of several commercial properties in Waterloo, Iowa.

I believe Members of Congress will find Mr. Cowin's detailed analysis of the problems of those owning rental properties most informative, especially in view of the fact that rent-control legislation will likely be presented within the next few weeks.

The letter follows:

WATERLOO, IOWA, March 30, 1951.

Hon. H. R. GROSS,
Representative, Third District of Iowa,
Washington, D. C.

DEAR SIR: I feel that if the Congress is called upon to contemplate provisions for the control of rentals on commercial properties, any bill offered for their consideration by Tighe Woods or his legal or advisory department should be subjected to the severest scrutiny. We understand that Mr. Woods claims an increase of 78 percent in rentals in the last decade. Let me assure you that the taxes and maintenance costs have far exceeded that figure. Enclosed you will find a comparative tax assessment on some local commercial property, which figures can be verified by tax receipts in our possession.

The inequities and the injustices of the residential rent-control laws have been most enlightening and, to my mind, can be summed up very briefly and pointedly. Had the same rules, procedures, and controls been applied to the renting of a horse instead of a house, every humane society in the United States would have caused the lessee to be thrown in jail. Very briefly, you cannot give another party control of your property under rules which force you into the courts to prove the obvious abuse of that property and still make it worth owning.

This feature, however, would become of secondary importance in the case of commercial property.

In the first place, it has been many years since any enterprise was forced into bankruptcy because of the rent they paid. As our retailing system is now conducted, the major portion of commercial rentals are based directly on the volume of sales secured by the tenant. For many years there has been no other basis to negotiate a lease. We have been faced with rising costs and rising taxes and anticipated further rising costs and taxes from year to year for over a decade, and no owner could be advised as to any other way of writing a lease that was fair also to the tenant, except to base it on sales. With only one exception that I know of, every major lessee in the country has been willing to enter into and negotiate leases on this basis. That exception is the Great Atlantic & Pacific Tea Co., who do negotiate on 1 percent per month on investment. In that connection, let me call your attention to the fact that the maximum percentage lease on supermarket locations, at least in your congressional district, is based on 1 percent of gross sales. Now follow this closely: The building, the parking lot, the local taxes, the structural and owner's liability insurance, the special assessments, and the structural maintenance on what is considered to be a satisfactory leasing agreement from the owner's point of view in this particular line of enterprise all come out of 1 cent on $1 in sales. Could Mr. Woods save the housewife anything on her grocery bill with that. Other lines of endeavor require a larger portion up to 2½ percent, 5 percent, and even in some types of enterprise, 10 percent; but in every case, the distribution is based on our retail experience and recovery needs.

If Mr. Woods is willing to investigate the history of office building returns, the information is available to him to show that the cross-section of office buildings in the country in the last 50 years have not netted 4 percent on the investment. As far as warehousing goes, let me say that the history is fairly good on it, but here, too, unless the owner were tied in with the operation, the history of profit from this enterprise does not indicate a favorable return. As far as factory or production-type structures is concerned, the history is indeed depressing.

In my experience, the most generous, careless, easily outmaneuvered tenant for any type of space has been various departments of the United States Government, and that only in recent years.

Now the major question at hand in most of the 48 States in relation to the control of commercial rentals is the problem of the taxing bodies up to and including the State level. In Waterloo, Iowa, 50 percent of the property tax is drained off by the local school board. An interesting sidelight on this particular matter is that they anticipate a 2½-mill increase in their levy under a special legislative provision. As every Congressman should know, the city administrations throughout the country are bankrupt because of the inadequacy of their share of the tax slice to provide for their obligations to the community. The point I am making is that, like the policy of our local assessor, who is of exceptional caliber, most tax assessments are based on the return of the property. The worth of the ground and the structure, of course, enter in, but his final assessments are, in every case, made on the return from the property. I am inclined to think, in all fairness, that this is entirely proper, although it is not at this time provided for in the statutes, but I sincerely believe that if the Federal Government jeopardized this last source of local taxing sources, our last hope of avoiding a breakdown will disappear.

Conceivably, the large chains would be behind Mr. Woods in his hope of expanding his bureaucratic powers, and from these sources may come the pressure on the Congress. Frankly, I haven't analyzed the position that large banking and insurance institutions might take, but, offhand, it would appear that they would be much opposed to jeopardizing their financial positions where the safety of a major portion of their investments was involved.

In summarizing, there are two simple, essential facts: The first is the interference with the final hope of the local taxing bodies, and the second is the fact that the gentleman from the rent control bureau would not save the eventual purchaser a penny on his grocery bill or his fair-traded clothing item or hardware item, but he would very probably concentrate the difference in the hands of the big businesses and the big-volume organizations located beyond the reach of the government of the State in which they sell their merchandise.

The undersigned is in the commercial and industrial rent field and, as far as your congressional district is concerned, feels adequately qualified to discuss and analyze the commercial rental situation as it now exists and has existed, at least in that district.

Respectfully submitted.

RUSSELL C. COWIN.

What Aims in Korea?

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. DANIEL A. REED
OF NEW YORK
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Thursday, April 5, 1951

Mr. REED of New York. Mr. Speaker, the questions propounded in the Freeman of April 9, 1951, for Mr. Truman and Mr. Acheson to answer are timely, and the American people should have a forthright answer to each question.

Under leave to extend, I am inserting the article, which contains the questions from the Freeman of April 9, 1951, as a part of my remarks:

WHAT AIMS IN KOREA?

In our last issue we commented on a long letter which Dean Acheson had written for publication in answer to a young marine's suggestion that our foreign policy was a bit fouled up. Since what the young man chiefly objected to was our involvement in Korea, his letter provided the Secretary of State with an excellent opportunity to define the specific objectives—if any—which Mr. Acheson and the President hope to attain through the fighting in that area. It was high time, indeed; for neither the President nor Mr. Acheson had as yet taken the country into his confidence on that question.

Mr. Acheson ignored this opportunity, and contented himself merely with repeating a few high-sounding generalities. The major questions in the minds of the American people, of our men in Korea, and of their families, remain unanswered. Because both Mr. Truman and Mr. Acheson act as if they were completely unaware of what these questions are, we list some of them here. The people who are doing the fighting, and those who are paying for it by their sacrifices, are entitled to prompt, precise, and forthright answers.

1. Are we fighting to push the Chinese Communist forces in Korea back to the thirty-eighth parallel, and to stop there regardless of whether or not that is an advantageous strategic line?

If so, why did we sacrifice thousands of our troops in driving the North Koreans to the Manchurian border? And why should we seek to hold an arbitrary geographical line which from a military standpoint may or may not be defensible?

2. Are we fighting to establish whatever line in Korea, short of the Manchurian border, is in the opinion of the competent military authorities strategically most defensible?

3. Are we fighting to drive the Chinese Communist forces out of Korea and across the Manchurian border, in order that the whole of Korea may be placed under United Nations authority?

If that is the objective, how can it be attained so long as our forces, on instructions from the Department of State, may not pursue the enemy into Manchuria, but must wait inactive at the border while he regroups, reequips and reinforces his armies, without fear of attack or observation, until he is strong enough for another offensive?

That is precisely what happened when our troops chased the fleeing North Koreans to the Manchurian border. The enemy was permitted to regroup, rearm and obtain reenforcements from Communist China; preparations which our Army was not even allowed to find out about because, under State Department instructions, it was not permitted to send reconnaissance planes over the border to observe enemy troop concentrations. Nor were our fighter planes flying along the Manchurian border, under fire from Chinese Communist antiaircraft batteries on the other side of the river, even permitted to attack those batteries.

Thus rendered immune by State Department orders from molestation or observation by our forces, the enemy built up a formidable army which erupted into Korea and nearly drove our troops into the sea, with heavy casualties.

4. Are we fighting merely to maintain a military stalemate in Korea?

The maintenance of a military stalemate would mean that we should attain no military objective. We should merely maintain a tenuous and dangerous hold in Korea, which would continue to cost several thousand lives each month. The only conceivable advantage of maintaining a military stalemate in Korea would be to preserve the remaining shreds of our diplomatic and military prestige in the Far East and to provide time for negotiations with the declared aggressor, Red China, with a view to some compromise—probably involving admittance of Red China to the UN, and in any case probably involving a betrayal of our troops who have fought and died in Korea.

5. Are we fighting to destroy the enemy forces?

Communist China has openly admitted intervention on a large scale—estimated at 300,000 to 500,000 troops—in support of North Korean Communist forces. The bulk of the Communist armies which nearly drove our troops into the sea consisted of Chinese Communist soldiers equipped by Soviet Russia.

Red China's armies have been estimated at 4,000,000 men. Their equipment is limited only by Soviet Russia's ability and willingness to supply them. When Chinese Communist troops are hard-pressed, all they have to do is to withdraw into the "privileged sanctuary" of Manchuria, there to regroup and rearm in the safety insured them by our State Department and the UN. Under these circumstances, how could the limited number of troops we can make available for the Korean operation wage a successful war of manpower attrition against Red China backed by Soviet Russia?

Furthermore, while some 300,000 to 500,000 Chinese troops are engaged in killing our boys in Korea, our Government is using the Seventh Fleet to protect the Chinese mainland against diversionary attacks from Formosa by the Free Chinese, which would relieve the pressure on our troops. In other words, the Seventh Fleet is being used to protect the Chinese Communist flank, and to enable the Chinese Red generals to concentrate on killing American boys in Korea.

Why should we not use our fleet to blockade our Chinese Communist enemy, and our air power to destroy military and industrial objectives and transportation facilities in Red China and Manchuria? Why should we not allow Free Chinese forces to make diversionary attacks on the mainland, thus reducing the capacity of Red China to kill our troops in Korea? This would have the added advantage of preventing the Communists from consolidating their hold over all of China so that when the Korean action is finished they can throw all of their weight against Southeast Asia, which Dean Acheson and Dr. Jessup insist we must hold at all costs.

6. What are the intentions of the United Nations?

The United Nations in June 1950 declared the North Koreans guilty of aggression and authorized General MacArthur to organize and lead a United Nations force against them. It also called upon all member nations to aid the United Nations forces in every way possible and to refrain from aiding the aggressor. As a result of this action, an international force was organized to defend South Korea. So far the United States has furnished about 90 percent of the UN troops and suffered about 90 percent of the casualties.

Although the UN, 106 days after the Chinese Communists openly entered the Korean War, at last declared that they had "engaged in aggression," it has still not authorized effective action against Red China. Also, despite the fact that all member nations were called upon to refrain from aiding the aggressor, Soviet Russia (still a member in good standing) has supported the North Koreans and Red China with supplies and equipment, particularly jet planes, tanks and other items which they could not conceivably have procured from any other source.

No war against aggression can be carried on successfully so long as the UN, on whose authority it is being conducted, spends months in discussing what, if anything, should be done about the aggressor, while refusing to allow UN troops to fight him on equal terms.

7. Who is to pay for reconstruction?

Both North and South Korea, particularly South Korea, have suffered vast destruction in consequence of Communist aggression. This destruction and the surging tides of battle have rendered millions of Koreans homeless and destitute. Does the UN intend merely to push the aggressors back to the thirty-eighth parallel, then condone the aggression and leave the nations of the free world—primarily the United States—to shoulder the burden of reconstruction while the aggressors escape any penalty for the devastation they have wrought? If this is so, if nonaggressor nations are to be expected to pay for the damage caused by aggressors, then the basic purpose of the UN is made a mockery, and a premium is placed on aggression.

President Truman and Secretary Acheson cannot escape responsibility for our losses in Korea. Having allowed the UN ample opportunity to declare a workable policy with respect to the open aggression of Communist China, and having failed to elicit any clear-cut authorization to meet the military issue, they were under a solemn obligation to serve notice on the UN that if it did not, by a fixed date, allow its forces to attack Communist China as a declared aggressor, the United States would reserve the right either to take such action as it might deem necessary in order to protect its own troops, or to withdraw them from the UN forces in Korea.

It is the failure of Truman and Acheson to define our own objectives in Korea, and their instructions hamstringing our troops there, which have caused our unnecessarily heavy casualties. Truman and Acheson will continue to be responsible for the cruel and senseless waste of American lives and treasure until they either permit our land forces there to defend themselves effectively, or admit the ghastly failure of their Asiatic policy by withdrawing our land forces from that theater of war.

Yes, Mr. Speaker, Mr. Truman had his way in the Korean misadventure which, up to this date, has cost 57,000 casualties among our fighting forces. Now, then, what would have happened had there been no Congress? I am inserting an article which appeared in the Republic Bulletin on March 26, 1951:

IF WE HAD NO CONGRESS

If Truman had his way, this country today would be under a complete system of socialized medicine, like Russia and England.

If Truman had his way, every farm in America today would be under the quotas and allocations of the Brannan plan—socialized agriculture.

If Truman had his way, there would be no Federal legislation on the books today to imprison Communist spies, traitors, and saboteurs in the Government departments.

If Truman had his way, Red China today would be a member of the United Nations, to vote with Russia and her iron curtain prisoners on every ballot against world peace.

If Truman had his way, under the Government reorganization scheme last year, this country would be saddled today with a Cabinet department of health and welfare under that great medical genius, lawyer Oscar Ewing.

If Truman had his way, all America's secrets in atomic energy would have been traded freely with our allies.

If Truman had his way, every nation in the world would have direct call on the United States Treasury for technical assistance and economic development loans, under his point 4 program.

If Truman had his way, there would be no Taft-Hartley provision today requiring the official registration of Communists in labor unions. He vetoed one.

If Truman had his way, every major river in America today would be a part of some new TVA, with State and local government submerged by Federal bureaucrats.

If Truman had his way, every school in America today would be under direct daily supervision of the Washington do-good bureaucracy—socialized education.

If Truman had his way, housing and home building today would be a complete Government monopoly, with subsidies for socialized housing.

If Truman had his way, there would have been no investigation of communism in the State Department and other Federal agencies. His "red herring" statement of August 1948 would have ended the Alger Hiss case.

If Truman had his way, total Federal spending since 1946 would have been about $75,000,000,000 more than it has been to date. That is the accumulative cost of all the new programs proposed, but turned down by Congress.

These are the things Congress saved us from during the last 5 years. Had it not been for the defenders of constitutional government in the House and Senate, Truman would have had his way in all these things. He urged each of these programs at least once, some several times. In other cases he vetoed acts of Congress, which promptly were enacted over his veto. How much we owe Congress.

In one major decision President Truman had his secret way—without consulting Congress. He, by his own decision, plunged our boys into war with the Mongolian hordes in Korea. He now seeks blanket authority to send American boys to new wars the world around, at will.

Today only Congress stands between that program and the American people.

Our prayers should be with Congress.

Federal Judge Irving R. Kaufman

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF

HON. LOUIS B. HELLER

OF NEW YORK

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Wednesday, February 28, 1951

Mr. HELLER. Mr. Speaker, I wish to take this opportunity to say a few words about Federal Judge Irving R. Kaufman, who presided at the first atomic-spy trial recently concluded in New York. Generally described by courtroom attachés as a "tough judge," Judge Kaufman has conducted the trial in a most exemplary manner.

It goes without saying that this case will go down in the annals of American history because of its nature, importance, and historical value. Judge Kaufman ably summed it up when, following the jury's verdict of guilty against three American citizens who conspired to steal atom secrets, he said:

I must say that, as an individual, I can't be happy because it is a sad day for America when citizens lend themselves to the destruction of our country by the most destructive weapon the world has known. I cannot find words to describe this loathsome offense.

Judge Kaufman is a fraternity brother of mine in Tau Epsilon Phi fraternity. During the years that I have had the pleasure to know him, I found that he has a keen and analytical mind. He is always fair and judicial, and has made a wonderful record since he has been on the bench.

Born in New York City in 1910, Judge Kaufman received his preparatory education at Fordham University and his LL. B. from Fordham Law School. For a period of 5 years until 1940 he was an assistant United States attorney for the southern district of New York, then entered private law practice as a member of the firm Noonan, Kaufman & Eagan. In 1947 he became special assistant to the United States Attorney General, in charge of lobbying investigation, and served in this position until October 1949, when he was appointed to the southern New York Federal court. His appointment was subsequently confirmed by the United States Senate.

He has served with great distinction. We of New York are very proud of him, his record, and the role he played during the recent trial.

History-making as the decision handed down by Judge Kaufman may be, it was a most difficult and responsible decision which required a great deal of forethought, deliberation and soul-searching. I am not surprised to learn that the jurist, who is a deeply religious man, went to his synagogue several times during the past few days to seek spiritual guidance in final formulation of his epochal decision.

The statement which he has prepared in conjunction with the sentence he has imposed will, likewise, be of great historical importance. I am, therefore, placing in the RECORD the full statement of Judge Kaufman as published in the New York Times on April 6, 1951, and a news item on the jurist also published in the same issue. I commend these to the attention of the Members of this House. They are as follows:

JUDGE KAUFMAN'S STATEMENT ON SENTENCING BOMB SPIES

In view of the importance of the sentence I am about to impose, I believe it is my duty to give some explanation respecting them.

At the outset, I would like to say a few words about the law under which these defendants are about to be sentenced.

THE LAW

It provides for the following punishment: If the espionage or the conspiracy to commit espionage is committed during time of war, the punishment might be death or imprisment for not more than 30 years. If the espionage or conspiracy to commit espionage is committed at any other time the maximum punishment is imprisonment for not more than 20 years.

This section, under which the defendants were prosecuted and convicted, was enacted in 1917, at which time the Russian international spy ring did not present the threat to all of us which it does now. Today, it is a well organized, well directed ring, with tentacles which reach into the most vital places.

The incongruent penal provisions of the statute are spotlighted by the 20-year maximum imprisonment provision for commission of the offense of espionage during peacetime. I ask that some thought be given to that for a moment, for it most likely means that even if spies are successful in the year 1951 in delivering to Russia or any foreign power our secrets concerning the newer type atom bombs, or even the H-bomb, the maximum punishment that any court could impose in that situation would be 20 years.

I, therefore, say that it is time for Congress to reexamine the penal provisions of the espionage statute.

In the case before me, the conspiracy as alleged and proven commenced on or about June 6, 1944, at which time the country was at war. Overt acts were committed during the period of actual hostilities. Therefore, the maximum penalty is death or imprisonment for not more than 30 years.

Espionage, as viewed here today, does not reflect the courage of a Nathan Hale, risking his life in the service of his own country. It is rather a sordid, dirty work—however idealistic are the rationalizations of the persons who engaged in it—with but one paramount theme, the betrayal of one's own country.

SEES SPIES UNDER NO DELUSIONS

Citizens of this country who betray their fellow countrymen can be under none of the delusions about the benignity of Soviet power that they might have been prior to World War II. The nature of Russian terrorism is now self-evident. Idealism as a rationale dissolves.

The issue of punishment in this case is presented in a unique framework of history. It is so difficult to make people realize that this country is engaged in a life and death struggle with a completely different system. This struggle is not only manifested externally between these two great forces, but this case indicates quite clearly that it also involves the employment by the enemy of secret as well as overt outspoken forces among our own people. All of our democratic institutions are, therefore, directly involved in this great conflict. I believe that never at any time in our history were we ever confronted to the same degree that we are today with such a challenge to our very existence. The atom bomb was unknown when the espionage statute was drafted. I emphasize this because we must realize that we are dealing with missiles of destruction which can wipe out millions of Americans.

The competitive advantage held by the United States in super weapons has put a premium on the services of a new school of spies—the homegrown variety that places allegiance to a foreign power before loyalty to the United States. The punishment to be meted out in this case must therefore serve the maximum interest for the preservation of our society against these traitors in our midst.

SENTENCE OF JULIUS AND ETHEL ROSENBERG

It is ironic that the very country which these defendants betrayed and sought to destroy placed every safeguard around them for obtaining a fair and impartial trial, a trial which consumed 3 weeks in this court. I recall the defendant Julius Rosenberg testifying that our American system of jurisprudence met with his approval and was preferred over Russian justice. Even the defendants realize—by this admission—that this type of trial would not have been afforded to them in Russia. Certainly, to a Russian national accused of a conspiracy to destroy Russia not 1 day would have been consumed in a trial. Yet, they made a choice of devoting themselves to the Russian ideology of denial of God, denial of the sanctity of the individual and aggression against free men everywhere instead of serving the cause of liberty and freedom.

Your crime is worse than murder. Plain deliberate contemplated murder is dwarfed in magnitude by comparison with the crime you have committed. In committing the act of murder, the criminal kills only his victim. The immediate family is brought to grief and when justice is meted out the chapter is closed. But in your case, I believe your conduct in putting into the hands of the Russians the A-bomb years before our best scientists predicted Russia would perfect the bomb has already caused the Communist aggression in Korea with the resultant casualties exceeding 50,000 Americans and who knows but that millions more of innocent people may pay the price of your treason. Indeed, by your betrayal you undoubtedly have altered the course of history to the disadvantage of our country. No one can say that we do not live in a constant state of tension. We have evidence of your treachery all around us every day—for the civilian defense activities throughout the Nation are aimed at preparing us for an atom bomb attack.

Nor can it be said in mitigation of the offense that the power which set the conspiracy in motion and profited from it was not openly hostile to the United States at the time of the conspiracy. If this was your excuse then the error of your ways in setting yourselves above our properly constituted authorities and the decision of those authorities not to share the information with Russia must now be obvious.

The defendants are American citizens who profited from our system of free higher education. I additionally must assume that the basic Marxist goal of world revolution and the destruction of capitalism was well known to the defendants, if, in fact, not subscribed to by them, when they passed what they knew was this Nation's most deadly and closely guarded secret weapon to Soviet agents.

NATION MUST BE SECURE

In the light of this, I can only conclude that the defandants entered into this most serious conspiracy against their country with full realization of its implications. The statute of which the defendants at the bar stand convicted is clear. I have previously stated my view that the verdict of guilty was amply justified by the evidence. In the light of the circumstances, I feel that I must pass such sentence upon the principals in this diabolical conspiracy to destroy a God-fearing nation, which will demonstrate with finality that this Nation's security must remain inviolate; that traffic in military secrets, whether promoted by slavish devotion to a foreign ideology or by a desire for monetary gains, must cease.

The evidence indicated quite clearly that Julius Rosenberg was the prime mover in this conspiracy. However, let no mistake be made about the role which his wife, Ethel Rosenberg, played in this conspiracy. Instead of deterring him from pursuing his ignoble cause, she encouraged and assisted the cause. She was a mature woman—almost 3 years older than her husband and almost 7 years older than her younger brother. She was a full-fledged partner in this crime.

Indeed the defendants Julius and Ethel Rosenberg placed their devotion to their cause above their own personal safety and were conscious that they were sacrificing their own children, should their misdeeds be detected—all of which did not deter them from pursuing their course. Love for their cause dominated their lives. It was even greater than their love for their children.

What I am about to do is not easy for me. I have deliberated for hours, days, and nights. I have carefully weighed the evidence. Every nerve, every fiber of my body has been taxed. I am just as human as are the people who have given me the power to impose sentence. I am convinced beyond any doubt of your guilt. I have searched the records, I have searched my conscience, to find some reason for mercy, for it is only human to be merciful, and it is natural to try to spare lives. I am convinced, however, that I would violate the solemn and sacred trust that the people of this land have placed in my hands, were I to show leniency to the defendants Rosenberg.

It is not in my power, Julius and Ethel Rosenberg, to forgive you. Only the Lord can find mercy for what you have done.

The sentence of the court upon Julius and Ethel Rosenberg is that for their crime they are sentenced to death. The sentence will be executed according to law in the week beginning on Monday, May 21.

SENTENCE OF MORTON SOBELL

While I have not the slightest sympathy for you or any of your associates, I must, as a judge, be objective in the examination of the evidence in this case. I do not for a moment doubt that you were engaged in espionage activities however, the evidence in the case did not point to any activity on your part in connection with the atom-bomb project. I cannot be moved by hysteria or motivated by a desire to do the popular thing. I must do justice according to the evidence in this case. There is no doubt about your guilt, but I must recognize the lesser degree of your implication in this offense. I, therefore, sentence you to the maximum prison term provided by statute, to wit, 30 years.

While it might be gratuitous on my part, I also note at this point my recommendation against parole for this defendant.

KAUFMAN REFUSED TO LET REDS TOUR—YOUNGEST FEDERAL JUDGE HERE, EX-PROSECUTOR, DENIED PLEA IN FIRST MAJOR DECISION

Federal Judge Irving R. Kaufman, mild-mannered, soft-spoken but sharp in detecting legal trickery by attorneys, is the youngest jurist in the Southern District of New York.

Shortly after he took the oath of office November 1, 1949, the 40-year-old jurist decided his first major bench problem. He denied a motion by the 11 convicted Communist leaders to enlarge the jurisdiction of their bail. The defendants wanted to barnstorm the country.

Several months ago Judge Kaufman presided at the trial of Abraham Brothman and Miriam Moskowitz for conspiracy to obstruct justice. This was an offshoot of a Federal grand jury's espionage investigation. The jury found the two guilty and Judge Kaufman imposed the maximum punishment.

The judge was born here June 24, 1910. He has two brothers, one a doctor and the other a dentist, and two sisters. The youngest student to enter Fordham University at the age of 16, he was graduated from the university's law school at 21 and admitted to the bar in June 1932.

Two and a half years later he was appointed a special assistant to the United States Attorney in this district. In June 1936, he became an assistant United States Attorney. He prosecuted many publicized cases, including the McKesson & Robbins case.

He resigned from the United States Attorney's office in 1940 to enter private practice with Gregory F. Noonan, who was appointed a Federal judge the same time as Judge Kaufman was, and Col Edward P. F. Eagan, now chairman of the State athletic commission.

Judge Kaufman was assigned along with Federal Judge Harold R. Medina, before the latter's appointment to the bench, by the Association of the Bar of the city of New York to investigate, with a view toward disbarment, Magistrate Thomas A. Aurelio's nomination for the Supreme Court after it was made public that Frank Costello, gambler, had backed Mr. Aurelio's candidacy.

In October 1947, Judge Kaufman was appointed a special assistant to the Attorney General to set up and head a lobbying investigation under the Federal Regulations and Lobbying Act. He resigned this position in August 1948.

Occasionally Judge Kaufman has been confused in public with Federal Judge Samuel H. Kaufman, who presided at the first perjury trial of Alger Hiss, which ended in a hung jury.

Judge Irving Kaufman is married to the former Helen Rosenberg. They have three sons, Robert, 12, and James and Richard, 9-year-old twins.

Draft Exemptions on Basis of Scholarship Wrong in Principle

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. CHARLES E. POTTER
OF MICHIGAN
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES
Friday, April 6, 1951

Mr. POTTER. Mr. Speaker, under permission granted to extend my remarks, I wish to include the following editorial which appeared in one of Michigan's leading newspapers, the Escanaba Daily Press, on March 29, 1951:

DRAFT EXEMPTIONS ON BASIS OF SCHOLARSHIP WRONG IN PRINCIPLE

The proposal of Gen. Lewis B. Hershey, the Nation's draft director, that top-ranking students in high schools and colleges be exempt from military training is drawing a mounting tide of resentment around the country, as well it should.

The general's theory presumably is that the Nation's best brains, as measured in terms of scholastic rankings in the high schools and colleges, should not be subjected to the hazards of military life.

The proposal, of course, is a slur on the American armed services by conveying the idea that only second-rate brain power should be drafted for military service.

The plan is wrong in principle and wrong in application. It is contrary to American principles of democracy that a segment of our draft-age people should be exempted from service in the country's Armed Forces because of scholastic attainment. And it is wrong to assume that the bright boys of the classroom are necessarily the only hope of the Nation for leadership in the future. An examination of American history will reveal that a large percentage of leaders in every field of endeavor have come from the ranks of average scholastic attainment. Leadership and success require more than the ability to absorb textbook knowledge.

It has been expressed by military experts time and again that American successes on the battlefield have developed because American soldiers are intelligent, that they possess the ability to think quickly in emergencies without waiting for directions to filter down from the high command.

If the future of America and the safety of our people is dependent upon the protection that the armed services can give us, it surely is essential that we build our Army, Navy, and Air Force with the best manpower that we have available. We can hardly afford to place our lives and our heritage in the hands of those who have been chosen for service because they could not reach scholastically the upper one-third or one-fourth of their class.

Cost of Experimental Unit of Universal Military Training at Fort Knox, Ky.

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. GEORGE B. SCHWABE
OF OKLAHOMA
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES
Friday, April 6, 1951

Mr. SCHWABE. Mr. Speaker, on January 30, 1948, after obtaining unanimous consent, I inserted in the Appendix of the RECORD of that date an article entitled "Cost of Experimental Unit of Universal Military Training at Fort Knox, Ky."

Purely as a matter of information, I thought it might be interesting to the membership of the House to know the cost of the experimental unit of universal military training at Fort Knox, Ky., as reported in a letter to me from the then Army Comptroller, dated January 21, 1948.

Therefore I am inserting, by leave of the House, the insertion which I placed in the Appendix on January 30, 1948. The basis of cost may have changed, and doubtless has, since these figures were furnished me by the Comptroller of the Army more than 3 years ago. Just how much the cost has increased due to inflated values on everything, I am unable to state.

My former insertion in the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD of January 30, 1948, follows:

COST OF EXPERIMENTAL UNIT OF UNIVERSAL MILITARY TRAINING AT FORT KNOX, KY.

Mr. SCHWABE. Mr. Speaker, I think all are aware that an experimental program of universal military training is being conducted at Fort Knox, Ky. Various opinions have been voiced as to the cost of the training which has been envisioned and advocated by President Truman. The Department of the Army has set up a model universal military unit at Fort Knox, Ky., and I have had several inquiries as to the cost of this experimental unit. On December 8, 1947, I asked for the figures, and I am happy to give my colleagues the benefit of the information which I received.

The following is a copy of a letter addressed to me under date of January 21, 1948, by Maj. Gen. George J. Richards, the Army Comptroller, Department of the Army, which I think needs no explanation, but speaks for itself and gives us the information on the cost of the experimental unit of universal military training at Fort Knox, Ky.:

DEPARTMENT OF THE ARMY,
OFFICE OF THE ARMY COMPTROLLER,
Washington, D. C., January 21, 1948.

HON. GEORGE B. SCHWABE,
House of Representatives.

DEAR MR. SCHWABE: Reference your letter of December 4, 1947, relative to the operating cost of the universal military training unit at Fort Knox, Ky., and my interim reply of December 8, 1947, I now have additional information in this regard to transmit to you.

On January 16, 1948, Hon. Kenneth C. Royall, Secretary of the Army, sent a letter to the chairmen of the Armed Forces Committees concerning the cost of the Fort Knox universal military training unit. Mr. Royall's letter covers the question you asked in such a comprehensive manner I feel you would be interested in its entire contents. I am therefore quoting to you the Secretary's letter in its entirety:

"I have been asked for certain specific information regarding the universal military training experimental unit at Fort Knox. As similar inquiries have reached me from other sources, or have been addressed severally to various Army addresses, I am including in this letter all of the information presently available with respect to the size and cost of the project.

"The UMT experimental unit was organized for two purposes:

"1. To obtain experience of value in a universal military training system covering a special age group, on a national scale, if authorized by Congress as recommended by the President, the President's Advisory Commission on Universal Training, and the armed services.

"2. To obtain experience of value to the armed services in revising and modernizing their own training programs in the light of the Doolittle committee's recommendations.

"In pursuance of these purposes, a new training formula has been introduced at the experimental unit, with greater emphasis on education, moral controls, broader concepts of discipline, and close supervision of off-duty as well as on-duty activities of trainees.

"In computing the cost of the UMT experimental unit, no attempt has been made to separate the cost of training the 646 enlisted men in the experimental training battalion from the total cost of the unit, nor is such a separation possible. The figures which follow therefore represent a break-down of the over-all cost of an experiment undertaken for the purposes indicated. The figure given as the cost per trainee is likewise the pro rata cost of the unit as a whole, as applied to the men in the UMT training battalion, and not the cost of training these men alone.

"SIZE OF UMT EXPERIMENTAL UNIT

"Two cycles of training were completed by the Army Ground Force experimental unit on December 20, 1947. The first cycle extended from January to July 1947, the second from July to December 1947, inclusive. During this time the following personnel were involved:

"(a) Average number of trainees (privates, Regular Army battalion strength), per cycle, 646. For 2 cycles, approximately 1,292.

"(b) Average constant training cadre (military personnel):

Number of officer-instructors	77
Number of enlisted personnel	495
Total	572

"(c) Approximately 21 civilians were employed during the two cycles as members of the training staff, all but four on a part-time basis. For the second cycle an estimated 17 part-time instructors were required in teaching auto mechanics, radio, typewriting, Spanish, and bookkeeping. Of the four full-time civilian employees, one was an educational counselor, one an assistant educational counselor, and two were stenographers for the Educational Center.

"Cost of universal military training experimental unit, second cycle, July–December 1947, inclusive

1. DIRECT COSTS

Pay and allowances of trainees (Army pay rate)	$383,167
Pay and allowances of trainers (officers and enlisted men)	472,098
Costs of subsistence (enlisted men)	196,975
Costs of clothing (enlisted men)	73,311
Costs of transportation	52,320
Equipment replacement	171,182
Total	1,349,053

2. INDIRECT COSTS

Transportation	73,680
Repairs and utilities	24,705
Medical care	70,340
Supplies	230,532
Equipment maintenance	43,866
Administrative overhead and supervisory personnel	60,733
Total	503,256

3. ADDITIONAL INDIRECT COSTS NOT PROPERLY CHARGEABLE TO UNIVERSAL MILITARY EXPERIMENTAL UNIT

Appropriated funds for rehabilitation of post facilities for universal military training experimental unit, but not included in universal military training costs because available for other purposes later	200,000
Grand total, universal military training costs, second cycle (1 and 2 above)	1,852,309

Average over-all per 6 months enlisted trainee (at Army pay rate and including all other unit costs), $1,852,309 divided by 646 equals $2,867.

COST FACTORS IN UMT EXPERIMENTAL UNIT

Because of the nature of the experiment, and the fact that cadre training and orientation courses for officers and enlisted men of the several branches of the Regular Army, not connected with the experimental UMT unit, have been conducted contemporaneously with the training of the experimental battalion of 18-year-old recruits, the administrative and instructor personnel of the unit were larger than would be required for training either an ordinary tactical unit or a prospective UMT unit.

The ratio of trainees to trainers in the larger system, for example, would be more than double that indicated in the figures for the experimental unit. At Fort Knox the military personnel necessarily included all elements of a division staff, although only a single battalion of men were being trained for 6 months by the experimental UMT formula. In the first training cycle all arms and technical services were represented. Each training company had to be organized differently. The Information and Education and Special Services staffs were organized on approximately a regimental level. There were two chaplains. The personnel of the unit, in short, was organized to perform a multiple function, and not simply to train 646 enlisted men assigned to it for this purpose. As with any experiment, whether conducted by the military services or in industry, the cost of the pilot model is always higher than the cost of the subsequent product.

Since the trainees were all enlisted men of the Regular Army, and receiving an average of approximately $100 a month in pay and allowances, the cost also reflects this pay rate rather than the $25 a month recommended by the Compton Commission or the $30 a month provided for in H. R. 4278 for the pay of UMT trainees in the proposed national system. The pay differential alone represents an added cost per trainee of at least $70 a month, or $420 for the 6-month training period, while the other factors add substantially to the total cost of the unit.

For these reasons the cost figures given cannot be considered as in any sense a criterion of the per capita cost of training large numbers of men at a very much lower pay rate under a national plan. The Army estimates the cost of training 618,000 men by the UMT formula on a national basis, once the program is standardized to eliminate the added expense of current experimentation, at approximately $1,000,000,000 annually.

AUTHORITY AND COSTS OF BRINGING VISITORS TO FORT KNOX

It has been asked by what authority visitors were flown to Fort Knox, the amount and source of funds used for this purpose.

The few groups representing the press and national organizations, invited by the former Secretary of War as a matter of broad public interest to visit the UMT experimental unit at Fort Knox, were transported by Army aircraft pursuant to authority contained in paragraph 1C (1), Army Regulations 95-90, published on April 28, 1947, which provides: "Upon approval by the Commanding General, Army Air Forces * * * personnel of the following categories may be permitted to ride as passengers in aircraft * * *

"(1) Any individual, without reimbursement, when the flight is on matters of concern to the Armed Forces."

Acting under authority of section 5 of the National Defense Act (10 U. S. C. 34), making it the specific responsibility of the War Department to plan for the national defense, and appropriate Army regulations with reference to the maintenance of public relations, the Department of the Army as a matter of broad public interest continuously attempts to inform the Nation of planning developments relating to universal military training as well as all other Army operations.

In inviting individuals and groups to visit the UMT experimental unit we hoped to obtain and did obtain helpful suggestions from outside sources. We cannot obtain public reaction to our programs unless we take the people into our confidence.

TRAINING PROGRAM OF UMT EXPERIMENTAL UNIT

All trainees in the UMT experimental unit are enlisted men in the Regular Army. Every Regular Army enlistee is given 13 weeks of basic training. The additional training given in the experimental unit, and which is contemplated in the national plan, if authorized by Congress, is intended to qualify the trainee as a specialist in some arm of the service. It will be obvious that no matter whether the soldier receives the training in the experimental unit or in a tactical unit, it must be accomplished in any case. While not a characteristic training unit of the Army as now constituted, the UMT experimental unit by no means involves expenditures incurred for other than normal service requirements.

In addition to training the experimental battalion of 646 men (average constant enrollment), the UMT training cadre is currently required to instruct 480 potential UMT training cadre personnel each month. This instruction covers all the positions from platoon sergeant to division commander, and results in a peak load of 200. For the period August 11, 1947, to December 20, 1947, approximately 2,565 students were given such cadre instruction.

It is estimated for planning purposes that of the 1,200,000 men annually reaching the age of 18 years, a total of 850,000, or approximately 70 percent of this figure would be found physically fit and inducted for training under a universal military training system. Of the latter number, an estimated 618,000 would be trained by the Army and Air Force and the remainder by the Navy, under the plan currently recommended by the three services. By carrying on this cadre training now, we shall have made a substantial start in building the organization that would be necessary to train the larger load of trainees later should the universal training program be authorized by Congress.

ARMY PROFITING FROM UMT EXPERIMENT

Regardless of the final action on the proposed national universal military training program, all of this instruction and indoctrination at Fort Knox is of great benefit to the Army and already is being translated into training doctrine for the Regular Establishment. It is finding its way into replacement training centers and has been adopted as the training formula for the Third Armored Division at Fort Knox on a division level.

The modification of disciplinary training through the adoption of a special code of conduct for this special age group, built around a demerit and trainee-court system, is only one of the new methods whose usefulness has been demonstrated in the experimental program. Sound discipline is the first principle of military effectiveness, since without it any military organization would be little more than a mob. It is believed that under the UMT formula, subject to further testing, discipline can be improved, rather than weakened, by giving the trainee and in fact, all elements of the Army, a better understanding of its meaning and importance.

Thus the UMT experimental unit has served and is serving as a laboratory test of training methods and doctrines which will prove of increasing value to the military service as time goes on. It has permitted close study of the problems inherent in training men of the 18-year or minimum-age group not previously explored in any prior training. In fact, I know of no other single experiment in this field which has been so richly productive of constructive results.

I feel sure Secretary Royall's letter will give you the information you desire. However, if you need additional information, I will be glad to obtain it for you.

Sincerely yours,

GEORGE J. RICHARDS,
Major General, the Army Comptroller.

United States Marines Should Help Plan Wars They Must Fight

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. GORDON L. McDONOUGH
OF CALIFORNIA
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES
Friday, April 6, 1951

Mr. McDONOUGH. Mr. Speaker, I have long advocated that the United States Marine Corps be represented on the Joint Chiefs of Staff. This was the subject that I wrote President Truman on, which prompted his now famous reply to me last August in which he stated that the United States marines were the "police force of the Navy" and that they would remain just that as long as he was President. He further stated that they were represented on the Joint Chiefs of Staff by the Navy.

The marines did not agree with him, neither did most of the people in the Nation.

Many Congressmen have introduced bills to place the United States Marines on the Joint Chiefs of Staff, including myself.

I am submitting herewith a recent editorial from the Saturday Evening Post which urges that the United States Marines be so recognized which I am certain many Members of the House will be interested in reading:

MARINES SHOULD HELP PLAN WARS THEY MUST FIGHT

In their valuable and compendious volume, The United States Marines and Amphibious War (Princeton University Press), Jeter A. Isely and Philip A. Crowl start the proceedings with this wartime quotation from Gen. George Marshall:

"My military education and experience in the First World War has all been based on roads, rivers, and railroads. During the last 2 years, however, I have been acquiring an education based on oceans and I've had to learn all over again. Prior to the present war I had never heard of any landing craft except a rubber boat. Now I think about little else."

As Messrs. Isely and Crowl make convincingly plain, much of General Marshall's education was provided by the United States Marine Corps, which had been thinking of, and experimenting with, landing craft for 20 years before the war. "That the United States Army was so quickly able to train troops for crossing beaches held by hostile nations is attributable to its own flexibility and leadership and, equally important, to the availability for its guidance of a sound body of amphibious doctrine previously drawn up by the United States Navy and the Marine Corps." The hard work put in by the Marine Corps, often, according to General Vandegrift, in the face of uninterested or doubting military orthodoxy, paid off all the way from Guadalcanal to the beaches of Normandy.

This contribution to what turned out to be one of the basic concepts upon which Allied victory rests might be expected to earn for the Marine Corps better recognition than it has received from the other services. Leaving aside Mr. Truman's contemptuous and politically careless dismissal of the Marines as "the Navy's police force," the present mobilization plan provides for less expansion of the Marine Corps than its esprit de corps, competent planning and fighting record would justify. The brilliant use which the Marines have made of their own air units to support ground fighting in Korea is another testimonial to the hard-hitting efficiency and excellent coordination of this elite outfit. As the news from Korea makes plain, it is upon the Marine Corps that the country depends for immediate offensive strength in time of emergency or hastily conceived "police actions." As long as we prefer to keep wars at a distance from American soil, so long will skill in amphibious warfare be basic to our security.

Despite its remarkable record, the Marine Corps is not represented at all in the deliberations of the Joint Chiefs of Staff. This is a startling ommission in view of the debt which Army planning owes to Marine military concepts and experimentation, not to mention fighting spirit and thorough training which have always distinguished the USMC. Senator PAUL DOUGLAS, of Illinois, a Marine veteran himself, has introduced a bill to correct this defect by placing the Commandant of the corps on the Joint Chiefs of Staff. The present Commandant, Gen. Clifton B. Cates, who has a distinguished combat record through all ranks, would undoubtedly add solid military experience to the deliberations of the JCS. It should not take a "propaganda machine that is almost equal to Stalin's" to convince people that the Marine Corps will continue to provide leaders whose advice on military planning would be worth having. At any rate, the past service of the Marines is a reason to think so.

Farm Bureau and Grange Oppose UMT Proposal

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. PAUL W. SHAFER
OF MICHIGAN
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES
Friday, April 6, 1951

Mr. SHAFER. Mr. Speaker, as public understanding of the issues involved in the UMT proposal increases, there is also an increase in the expressions of grave concern and of desire to divorce this proposal from the needed draft-extension legislation. Under leave to extend my remarks, I include the following letters from the American Farm Bureau Federation and the National Grange which came to my desk today urging support of H. R. 3364, the Barden bill, for separation of the two proposals:

AMERICAN FARM BUREAU FEDERATION,
Washington, D. C., April 5, 1951.
To all Members of the House of Representatives:

The American Farm Bureau Federation, representing 1,449,000 farm families, is vitally concerned over the provisions of S. 1, already passed by the United States Senate, and H. R. 2811, now being considered by the House of Representatives. At the thirty-second annual convention of this organization, the voting delegates passed the following resolutions with regard to universal military training and selective service:

"We of the American Farm Bureau Federation believe that to add universal military training to the selective-service program would result in ineffective and inefficient use of manpower. However, with the need for strong military preparedness, we suggest consideration of expanded and improved military training in secondary schools and colleges."

We believe that the amendments proposed in H. R. 3364 (Barden bill) conform to the expressed wishes of the farmers of the United States, and we urgently recommend that the language in H. R. 3364 be substituted for the language in the bill now being considered by the House of Representatives.

Sincerely yours,
JOHN C. LYNN,
Associate Director, Washington Office.

NATIONAL GRANGE,
Washington, D. C.

Hon. PAUL W. SHAFER,
House Office Building,
Washington, D. C.

DEAR CONGRESSMAN: The National Grange believes that the selective service is meeting fully and to spare the emergency defense needs of the Nation; and the military concedes this. We have faith in our people, in democracy, and in Congress to support selective service to the fullest necessary extent as long as danger threatens; and we wish the armed services had this faith and would not try to pass peacetime UMT under the cloak of the present grave danger.

H. R. 3364 meets our officially declared stand on this profoundly vital problem in that:

1. It discards universal military training and calls for the fullest necessary use of selective service, with lowered physical and mental tests if needed;

2. Calls for induction at age 19 instead of 18, and for maximum of 24 months' service, or of not over 2 years of a boy's school life, and for release to Reserve status if national safety requires it;

3. Provides that Congress by concurrent resolution can change service requirements or suspend the draft when the danger is passed, and for a preservation of selective service machinery but a definite termination date for the draft which automatically gives you as an individual Congressman the right to review your present stand;

4. And provides for a democratically and economically sound occupational deferment based on obtaining maximum national service in the field in which each man is best fitted to serve his country.

The National Grange has no official stand on the provision of H. R. 3564 for services in racially segregated units.

We sincerely hope, for the sake of adequate provision for the present emergency, and for the preservation of democracy and the right of Congress to reflect that democracy, that you will support a bill carrying the four numbered items mentioned above.

We sincerely hope and pray also that every Member of the Congress, will put forth all possible efforts to bring about a safe and sound reduction of armaments for all nations alike, for a strengthening of law and order and a Christian peace for the world.

Sincerely yours,
J. T. SAUNDERS,
Legislative Counsel.

America in Her Hour of Test and Decision

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. BROOKS HAYS
OF ARKANSAS
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES
Thursday, April 5, 1951

Mr. HAYS of Arkansas. Mr. Speaker, at the recent conference of the International Christian Leadership, Inc., a group sponsoring the breakfast clubs, our Director of Legislative Reference Service, Dr. Ernest S. Griffith, presented an eloquent statement on the basis of the faith of the American people in the ideal of freedom and justice which distinguishes the free nations from the philosophy of government known as communism. I am sure that the Members of the House will be impressed by this document.

The statement follows:

We are a part of America—Christian men and women drawn from government, from business, from labor, from the professions, from agriculture—from diverse backgrounds, but united in humbly seeking the mind of Christ for America and for us as citizens of America in this hour of her testing and decision. What follows has been hammered out of our experience; it has come to us as we have prayed. We share it with you, not that we are sure we have the answers, but that we have tried, with God's help, to find them. We hope and pray that each of you will search your own heart also; that you and we together may keep faith with our Christian heritage; that we may be steadfast in the days and years that lie ahead.

We hold these truths to be self-evident.

Two ways of life are struggling for mastery today.

1. The Christian way sees the universe as God's handiwork. The Communist way sees it as blind mechanism, neither coming from anywhere, nor with any destiny save an ultimate oblivion.

2. The Christian way sees man a child of God with the gift of immortality. The Communist way makes him one with a mechanistic universe, and death the inevitable end.

3. The Christian way sees government the servant of man, an instrument designed to establish the great freedoms, whose policies are aimed at releasing man's inner powers. The Communist way has established the state as man's master, and in the name of man's well-being has created a regime of fear that stultifies the creative and withers the spirit.

4. The Christian way would establish world peace on a foundation of righteousness and the brotherhood of all peoples. The Communist way extends the false peace of terror and death wherever it prevails; toward those peoples who would remain free, it holds out the threat of aggression, sabotage, and war.

5. The Christian way recognizes the dignity of work and the function of industry, both in an atmosphere of freedom. The Communist way enslaves its millions in work camps; and forces its scores of millions to conform to a regimentation, the end of which is the perpetuation in power of its overlords.

6. The Christian way believes in political imperialism only as a temporary trusteeship, with freedom for all peoples—an urgent as well as ultimate goal—a freedom already the proud possession of India, Pakistan, the Philippines, Indonesia, and many another nation formerly in political tutelage. The Communist way, behind a false facade of words, would extend the ruthless imperialism of Moscow to every nation it subverts or conquers.

7. The Christian way holds all men brothers, regardless of race, alike entitled to live a life of freedom, of dignity, of service to humanity. The Communist way would seize these so-called colored races at the very moment they are achieving both freedom and creative nationalism; and would drag them into a world of terror under the control of an oligarchy far more ruthless than they have known in the worst days of colonial rule.

8. The Christian way believes in the sacredness of marriage and the family, husband and wife, parent and child. The Communist way claims the child for the state; it makes of marriage a thing of convenience.

9. The Christian way holds science the handmaiden of integrity. The Communist way bends science to propaganda; it substitutes party line for truth.

These are the ways of life that are struggling for mastery. This is the struggle which is the greatest single fact in the world today. In such a world, we call upon all individuals—

(a) To deepen their faith in God and His purposes for man.

(b) To deepen their faith in man and man's possibilities as end and not as means.

(c) To deepen their own personalities by prayer; by contact with the great and sacred things in literature, music, and art; by humility before the testing that lies ahead.

(d) To dedicate themselves to bringing about in our America better understanding and mutual help between groups, races, classes, and creeds.

(e) To see to it that their sense of obligation to serve others, their country, and their world, overrides any concern for their own selfish interests.

(f) To recognize their interdependence upon each other and upon those all over the world whose values include freedom, the dignity of the individual, his obligation to serve.

In such a world, we call upon our country as a unit—

1. To keep faith with Christ and its Christian heritage. Into our Nation and people have been built the prayers and struggles and selfless service of millions of Christian men and women. To them we owe much of our belief in freedom, much of our American dream of equality of opportunity, much of our constitutionalism with its responsibility of the governors to the governed. If these religious springs of actions wither, the days of our national strength are numbered. We gladly recognize the contribution to this same end of other faiths, notably that of Israel, who share with Christians the view of the fatherhood of God and brotherhood of man.

2. To rise to its responsibilities of leadership. So much of the world is terribly weak; so much is groping for new gods with its old gods in the dust; so much is under a cloud of terror. However reluctant we are to assume it; God has called America to leadership in this our day. May we answer the call.

3. To use its power only to serve. Our Nation finds itself with a material and economic strength unparalleled in all history. Power tempts to arrogance; the siren of self-centeredness beckons. May America be humble in this day; and know the inner meaning of the words of the Master of us all, "He that is greatest among you, let him be the servant of all."

Before concluding, we want to make a few other things clear.

(a) With the Russian people we have no quarrel. They like so many others are exploited and deceived by their masters.

(b) We favor military and economic strength as necessary, but believe that the final outcome of the struggle lies not with them, but rather in the field of men's loyalties; in the intensity and enthusiasm with which they believe in their way of life.

(c) We recognize the sacrifices already made by the free in other lands, and salute them as comrades in the great battle. So we conclude:

"God has sounded forth a trumpet that shall never call retreat
He is sifting out the souls of men before His judgment seat
Be swift, my soul, to answer Him, be jubilant, my feet.
Our God is marching on."

San Carlos Project

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. NORRIS POULSON
OF CALIFORNIA
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES
Wednesday, March 14, 1951

Mr. POULSON. Mr. Speaker, on a recent visit to Phoenix, Ariz., I had the opportunity of visiting the Pima Indian Reservation in company with my colleague, Congressman HARRISON, of Wyoming. This visit was in connection with the existing water conditions in Arizona.

We discovered that the Indians on this reservation had received a formal notice that their water allotment for the calendar year of 1951 would be only one-half acre-foot per acre for the entire San Carlos project. This meant, according to the letter of notification from the superintendent, Mr. A. E. Robinson, that they would only be able to plant from one-eighth to one-tenth of the acreage on the reservation and, as the letter stated, that any operator who planted more than 20 acres of cotton out of his 160 acres would not have sufficient water to even irrigate that 20 acres.

Now naturally this is a very serious condition when we consider that this land is exceedingly fertile and classed among the most tillable land in the San Carlos area. Added to this problem was the fact that the superintendent told us that the Indians had to haul in all of their domestic and drinking water. One of the Indian escorts stated that it took 1 day out of each Indian's week to hitch up the horses and haul sufficient water back for the week's use. They claimed that this shortage was due to the fact that the water level had dropped below the depth of their wells.

They then told us that this was largely due to the fact that the white men were drilling wells immediately adjacent to the reservation at a greater depth and drawing out the water to irrigate their cotton acreage.

When I asked the superintendent what they could do about it he stated there was not anything they could do because this was the responsibility of the State of Arizona.

While this area was declared a critical area, the present wells can still continue to draw water from this area for the cotton acreage of the white man at the expense of the original American, the Indian. The Indian, because he is directly under our wardship and is dependent upon us for money because we have made him that way, cannot get the money to drill his wells deeper and, therefore, the white man takes all of the water away.

To add to this tragedy we discovered that the man who drove us back to our destination was one of the men who has been practicing this artifice and taking water that rightfully belongs to the Indians, and has been working in Washington in an attempt to get the Government to expend a billion dollars to rescue him and others by bringing in Colorado River water to bring up these water tables.

The question I raise is, What are we going to do for the Indians? We turn around and tie their hands through our wardship and then allow the white man to steal the very thing which we supposedly are giving them.

PIMA INDIAN AGENCY,
Sacaton, Ariz., March 8, 1951.

To Indian Irrigation Committee and Indian Farmers:

This letter is being addressed to you so that you will all be fully advised of the present irrigation water supply. Under date of January 22, 1951, Mr. Warnock, project engineer, recommended to the office a first apportionment of one-half acre-foot per acre for the San Carlos Project for the calendar year of 1951. We have delayed writing this letter to you until this apportionment was approved in Washington. We have received this approval dated February 23, 1951.

At the present time there is no water stored behind the Coolidge Dam and the latest snow surveys show that there is little possibility of receiving any run-off from the upper watersheds. Therefore, for the present it appears that the only water which will be available will be the one-half acre-foot apportionment which of course will be made up entirely of water pumped from our irrigation wells. Those farmers who have planted wheat and barley crops have already or will shortly use up their first apportionment.

We are attaching hereto a copy of a letter dated February 21, 1951, that has been addressed to the farmers in the White District as to just what they can expect as far as planting is concerned and the conditions set forth in that letter will also apply to the Indian farmers, namely, that only one-eighth to one-tenth of the acreage on the Reservation can be planted.

The office is now working in Washington endeavoring to raise a sum of $150,000 for irrigation well rehabilitation. At the present time we are advised that the prospects for the approval of this appropriation seem favorable and with the receipt of this money there is a possibility that a small additional apportionment may be made at a later date, but not in time for cotton acreage.

You will be kept fully advised from time to time as to the water situation. But at the present time it would appear that we are facing the most critical water situation since the project was placed in operation.

Yours very truly,

A. E. ROBINSON,
Superintendent.

SAN CARLOS IRRIGATION AND DRAINAGE DISTRICT,
Coolidge, Ariz., February 21, 1951.

To District Landowners and Water Users:

On January 11, 1951, we wrote district owners and operators advising with respect to the outlook for irrigation water supply for the year 1951. The outlook was then critical.

This letter to you has been delayed in the hope that precipitation would occur during January and February which would give promise of some substantial run-off. Up to this time no such rain or snow has fallen on the upper watershed. Therefore we can report no improvement. Based on prevailing conditions the Gila River is expected to deliver less water during 1951 than in any previous year of record.

There is no usable storage in San Carlos Reservoir. At present we can expect to have no dependable supply except what can be delivered by pumping from project wells.

It is expected that the apportionment will shortly be made in the amount of one-half acre-foot per acre. No further apportionment can be expected. The delivery of this water will be limited to the amount which pumps can deliver during each day and will be limited further to lands which can be reached with such pumped water. Under these conditions the water supply appears to be sufficient for about one-eighth to one-tenth of the acreage of district lands.

It is our opinion that under the present outlook for water, the operator who plants more than 20 acres of cotton out of each 160 acres, cannot expect water enough to properly mature his crop. Between now and planting time there may be a change in the weather to bring some improvement. It is doubtful that change will come at this late date. Should there be substantial improvement in water supply prospects during February or March, we shall report the same promptly.

Yours very truly,

C. A. ANDERSON,
District Engineer.

Baskets of Groceries

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF

HON. CLARENCE CANNON

OF MISSOURI

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Friday, April 6, 1951

Mr. CANNON. Mr. Speaker, five Members of the House recently appeared on the floor with baskets of groceries and in a graphic and dramatic demonstration called attention to the increased cost of food and the small amount of groceries $5 buys today in comparison with what it would buy in 1919.

While no direct charges of farm profiteering are made, the inference is that farm prices are too high and the consumer is paying more for food than his meager income justifies. This widespread impression so generally accepted and so industriously disseminated, is being emphasized by determined campaigns to roll back farm prices and fix farm price ceilings below parity and below comparative incomes of all other industries.

Mr. Speaker, there are two glaring fallacies in this food-basket demonstration and in these covert drives to reduce the wages of farmers and the dividends on investments in farm lands and stock and equipment below the wages and dividends paid other workers and on other investments.

In the first place the farmer receives only a small part of the $5 paid by the consumer for that basket of food. A 16-cent can of tomatoes brings the grower 3 cents. A can of corn selling for 19 cents brings the farmer 2¾ cents. For a pound of onions selling at 6 cents the truck gardener received a penny. Wheat in a 16-cent loaf of bread sells for 2⅔ cents at the elevator. Milk doubles in price after leaving the farm. And while there were no shirts in these baskets, the price the planter receives for the cotton in a shirt is an infinitesimal part of the cost of the garment. So do not hold the farmer exclusively responsible for the cost of the baskets exhibited here on the floor of the House.

But the most specious sophistry, the greatest fallacy in the wood pile, is the fact that the yardstick is money when it should be income—dollars and cents when it should be dividends on investments and wages for a day's labor.

The real question is not how much food $5 bought in 1919 and will buy today but how much food annual dividends and a day's pay bought in 1919 and will buy today. Judged by that criterion—measured by that yardstick, farm products are today cheaper than they were in 1919 or 1929 or 1939.

Compare dividends. Sears, Roebuck & Co., a firm with a large farm clientele reports a net profit for the year ending January 31 last of $143,654,981, equal to $6.08 a share of common stock as compared with a net of $108,206,718 or $4.58 per share in 1949. But let us go back with the baskets to 1919. Here is a tabulation from the Department of Commerce:

Net income after taxes, selected large corporations in the United States, 1919 and 1950

[Thousands of dollars]

Firm name	Net income after taxes
	1919	1950

Firestone Tire & Rubber	9,307	33,208
Atlantic Refining Co.	8,871	40,852
American Telephone & Telegraph	44,396	286,802

And here are comparative tables on wages of other workers than farm workers for an 8-hour day prepared by the United States Department of Labor and the United States Civil Service Commission:

Occupation	Average daily rate
	1919	Jan. 2, 1951
Bricklayers	$7.08	$23.12
Carpenters	6.20	19.68
Electricians (inside wiremen)	6.36	21.28
Painters	6.12	18.64
Plumbers and gas fitters	6.60	21.20
Automobile workers (Michigan)	4.90	14.24
Federal employees (Washington)	1,928.00	3,938.00

[1] Per annum.

In order to get a cross section of the increase in the pay of Federal employees under civil service in the country at large, it is to be noted that the average annual salary of all postal employees during fiscal year 1919 was $1,175 and in fiscal year 1950 it was $3,488.

Mr. Speaker, the farmer believes these wages are fully justified. If anything they are not high enough. No one believes more firmly than the farmer that the laborer is worthy of his hire, and with the cost of living at its present peak workers and their families could not reasonably subsist on less. The only point on which the farmer insists is that he and his family are also entitled to a living wage and an American standard of living.

But it is evident that it requires less investments and less dividends and less working time, by far, to buy the baskets of food displayed here in the House the other day. The American consumer has never been fed so sumptuously at such small comparative cost as today.

And this does not take into consideration the vastly increased costs of production on the American farm.

The Bureau of Agricultural Economics reports that the prices of farm machinery in 1919 compared with the latest prices are as follows:

Twelve-tube grain drill: 1919, $149; September 1950, $426.

Five-foot mower: 1919, $34.50; June 1950, $197.

Disk harrow, 7-foot single section: 1919, $56.60; September 1950, $123.

Corn planter: 1919, $76; March 1950, $202.

And the cost of fertilizers, insecticides, and all other costs of production have advanced in proportion.

In the face of these added costs and the constantly advancing prices received by everybody else in the last few months farm prices have dropped. Wheat sold for $2.81 a bushel in 1943. On January 15 of this year it was $2.09 a bushel. Corn in 1948 brought $2.46 a bushel. On January 15 of this year it brought $1.54. Hogs, on the same basis of price comparison, were $27.40 and have dropped to $20 per hundredweight. Eggs are lower. So is butterfat. Though the typical diet of one person increased in cost from $112 in 1939 to $252 in 1950, 1950 consumers could buy for 17 percent of their personal income the same quantity and quality of food which cost 22 percent of that same 1939 income.

Yet there are those who want to push the farmer still further down and roll his income still further back by freezing his prices below parity levels.

The situation is admirably summarized by a statement issued April 4, 1951, by the board of directors of the Missouri Farmers Association:

CEILINGS ON FARM PRICES AT PARITY LEVELS

The farmer's economic position does not justify the agitation in Washington by some people for Congress to fix farm price ceilings below parity levels. If ceilings are placed on farm products, the lowest ceiling which could be imposed should be that which would give farmers purchasing power high enough to warrant a high level of farm production and adequate food supplies.

Income received by farmers is not abnormally high and is not likely to be even under present inflationary conditions. It is not likely that the 1951 net farm income will exceed $17,000,000,000. This would be below the 1947 net income which was almost $18,000,000,000. The net farm income dropped to around $16,500,000,000 in 1948 and to about $14,000,000,000 in 1949. In 1950 the net farm income, even after a period of increasing farm prices the last half of the year, was only $13,000,000,000. In 1947 the index of prices paid by farmers for commodities, interest, taxes, and wage rates was 259, in January 1951 the index stood at 272 or 14 percent higher than the 1947 level. Therefore, in 1951 the net income of farmers will buy considerably less than it did in 1947.

Although the farmer's price level is supposed to be 13 percent above parity, the farmer is far from parity so far as his income is concerned. In 1947 the income per capita of the farm population was $847 compared with $1,409 for the nonfarm population. In 1951, the income of the farm population probably will amount to around $825 per person while the income of the nonfarm population probably will exceed $1,600. Consequently, the farmer now is receiving only about one-half as much income per capita as the nonfarm population.

In comparison with corporate profits the farmer is still in an unfavorable position. Corporate profits have risen from $18,500,000,000 in 1947 to a record peak of $21,900,000,000 in 1950 after taxes. At the same time as the farmer's income was dropping from nearly $18,000,000,000 to $13,000,000,000, the incomes of corporations were rising from $18,500,000,000 to nearly $22,000,000,000.

Another indication of the disparity so far as farmers' incomes are concerned is the fact that the farm population is 18.8 percent of the total population, while the farmer in 1949 received only 7.8 percent of the total national income. In 1947 farmers received 10.1 percent of the national income while providing 19.3 percent of the total population.

Although food prices are high in terms of dollars, it must be remembered that they are not high in terms of purchasing power of wages. As of December, 1950, the latest date for which figures are available, prices of farm products averaged 8 percent above parity. In that same month the market basket of food, representing the typical purchases of a 3-person family for 1 year would have cost $681. The average rate was $1.54 an hour, which means that the city wage earner could have purchased that market basket with only 440 hours of labor. In comparison that market basket of food would have taken 461 hours of labor in 1949, 527 hours in 1947, 479 hours in 1942 and 609 hours in 1933. The 1933 figures are interesting because the market basket at that time would have cost only $277, but would have required 609 hours of labor or nearly 40 percent more than at present.

The recent publicity in some of the slick magazines has attempted to point out the exceptionally large incomes of so-called "typical farmers." According to available statistics these so-called "typical farmers" are considerably above average so far as incomes are concerned. In 1945 farm prices stood at 206 percent of the 1910–14 level, or about two-thirds of the present level, but the purchasing power of farm products at that time was only 9 percent above normal. In that same year, farmers were receiving only $685 of income per capita compared with $1,284 for the nonfarm population. According to census figures, less than 12 percent of the farms in the United States were returning their owners as much as $3,000 of net farm income during that year. It must be remembered that the farmer is not only a worker but a capitalist and consequently his net income must include a return for the capital which he has invested as well as for his own labor. In a year when prices were supposed to have been favorable from a purchasing power standpoint, the facts show that 88 percent of the farmers were receiving less than $3,000 a year as returns for their labor, capital and management and average incomes were much lower. In that same year wage earners in the manufacturing industry were averaging $2300 per year for their labor only.

If price ceilings are set on farm products, the parity level is one basis for making certain that farm prices are increased as costs of farming increase. Although rigid ceilings were in effect during World War II, it must be remembered that the index of prices paid by farmers for commodities used in production and living increased from a level of 152 in 1942 to 167 in 1943, 176 in 1944, and 180 in 1945. Thus, prices paid by farmers increased 12 percent during the 3 years from 1942 to 1945, or 4 percent per year. Unless farm prices had been permitted to rise the farmer would have been caught between rising costs and rigid price ceilings which would have forced many of them out of production.

The use of the parity price level as the lowest possible ceiling is one means of keeping farmers from being crushed between these two forces, as well as a means of insuring the adequate production of food.

Mr. Speaker, in this connection I append statements on the subject by the Secretary of Agriculture during a recent hearing before the Committee on Appropriations:

POSITION OF FARMER

Mr. CANNON. The farmers are in a much better position to cooperate in winning the war this time than they were at the beginning of the last war?

Secretary BRANNAN. They are, Mr. Chairman. On the other hand they are more dependent on things which must move to them from outside their farms than they were at the beginning of World War II.

As you go back to earlier in our history, the farmer was more and more self-sufficient. He did not use large quantities of fertilizer. He did not need complicated machinery and machinery parts. He did not need gasoline, rubber, and a lot of other things of that character. He did not have to go elsewhere for his hybrid seed each year.

Now the farmer is dependent upon the movement of all of these things to his farm each year. In one sense he is better equipped to produce for the emergency, but at the same time he is more dependent upon the balance of the economy to be able to carry out his job than he was in earlier history.

COST OF PRODUCTION

Mr. CANNON. Even though his productive capacity has increased, this change has increased his cost of production disproportionately to what it was in 1940?

Secretary BRANNAN. Very much, Mr. Chairman.

Mr. CANNON. The cost of production per unit is today greater than it ever was before on the American farm.

Secretary BRANNAN. Greater than it was at any time in all our history, and it is continuing to advance by the year and by the month.

PROFITS OF FARMS

Mr. CANNON. Are the farmers' returns or profits increasing in proportion as his costs of production increase?

Secretary BRANNAN. No, Mr. Chairman. From 1948, when farm operators realized incomes reached their peak, in net terms around $18,000,000,000, their net incomes have gone down until toward the end of 1950—it went from about $18,000,000,000 in 1947 to around $13,000,000,000 for 1950. It is just now turning back up again as a result of the improved price situation arising incident to the emergency.

COMPARISON WITH INDUSTRY

Mr. CANNON. How does that decrease in income compare with the income of industry, commerce, labor, transportation, banking, and so on?

Secretary BRANNAN. Well, Mr. Chairman, the nonagricultural income in this country, profits, margins, and all the rest of the major economic factors, have been on an uptrend since before the Second World War. It is still on an uptrend at this very moment.

During the period from 1948, when farm prices and farm incomes were failing off drastically, both wages and other forms of nonfarm income were going up. You will note on the charts in 1949 there was a small drop-off in corporate profits, but that was all regained and the graph goes right on up from then on.

Mr. CANNON. While the farmer is producing more for the Nation's economy every year he is being paid proportionately less or comparatively less for his services?

Secretary BRANNAN. Certainly, by comparison with other segments of the economy, that is true.

OBJECTIVE

Mr. CANNON. You mentioned the cost of formulating and carrying out programs. In what respect does your goal or objective at this time differ from what your goal or objective was at the beginning of the Second World War?

Secretary BRANNAN. The goal then was all-out production. The goal now is all-out production. The goal then was all-out production within the pattern of special needs. It is still so at this time. In other words, it is not an all-out production of everything.

If you will observe our production guides for this year, we suggested a little less emphasis on soybeans and greater emphasis on corn, because we are going to need increasing supplies of corn for increasing the livestock population, and the production of livestock products, which is the one good way, if not probably the only successful way, we will ever be able to reduce meat prices to the consumer at the market place.

Mr. CANNON. Really, the only available remedy for high meat prices is to increase the supply?

Secretary BRANNAN. That is right, Mr. Chairman.

Mr. CANNON. To more nearly meet the demand?

Secretary BRANNAN. That is right.

As the economy ceases to produce some of the other semidurable and soft goods, as we cease to produce as many automobiles, as a result of the cut-back orders of Mr. Wilson, and perhaps fewer radios and perhaps less of all other durable types of goods, and families have more money in their hands, they are going to spend more of it for food.

The very striking example comes to our minds each time we talk about this, when you remember that in 1946–47, when meat prices went up so rapidly, the per capita consumption was also close to the highest in our history. People simply did not have anything else to spend their money for. They were competing for meat. They were driving the price up, and all of them were eating more meat. Even the increased supply could not match the increased demand as a result of the shift of purchasing power from the durables into the food items.

HEALTH OF PEOPLE

Mr. CANNON. Would you say that that increase in the consumption of meat and of vital foods was reflected in increased health and efficiency of the people of the country as a whole?

Secretary BRANNAN. It certainly was, Mr. Chairman. There is world of evidence of that fact.

PROGRAM FOR FOOD PRODUCTION

Mr. CANNON. In the event of an all-out war, Mr. Secretary, which we trust will not materialize, what increase would be made in food production and how would it have to be applied?

Secretary BRANNAN. Mr. Chairman, I am not prepared to say that a great deal higher volumes of commodities would be required than we are shooting for this year. As a matter of fact we are asking the farmer to plant more acres this year than we really should from the standpoint of conservation.

Mr. CANNON. And to produce more hogs and cattle?

Secretary BRANNAN. And to produce more hogs and cattle. We are not asking them for more than we have previously asked. In other words we have requested higher acreages and production than we had last year; this year's request is higher.

Mr. CANNON. In other words, you are asking the limit?

Secretary BRANNAN. We are asking the limit. The problem which would come, in the event of an outbreak of all-out hostilities of some type, would be a shifting between the various commodities. Perhaps there would be less of one and more of another.

That will be true, anyway, Mr. Chairman. I referred to soybeans a little while ago. We very fortunately last year had the greatest soybean crop in our history, and I say very fortunately because soybean oil is a substitute for or concomitant to cottonseed oil. Last year we had one of the smallest cottonseed crops in our history. The slack in the oil market was absorbed by the very large supply of soybeans.

There will be, perhaps, a shift back and forth among those kinds of commodities, and a shift in other directions, as the defense effort indicates.

You will recall that at one time during World War II an all-out effort was made to secure flaxseed because we could not import flaxseed oil or linseed oil from the Argentine or other sources. To that end we used the price-support mechanism and placed a price support of $6 a bushel under flaxseed to get the amount needed.

We are now changing our emphasis very materially to get the fiber crops. We have been doing a considerable amount of work on that this past year or so, both research-wise and stimulating production through educational programs running out to the farmers.

ALL-OUT PRODUCTION OF FOOD PRODUCTS

Mr. CANNON. You are asking for the all-out production of food products; you are appealing to the farmers to produce to the limit, to the utmost. What would happen in the event that all-out war does not materialize, and you have this surplus thrown on a peacetime market? You are asking the farmer now to produce more than is required for normal consumption or domestic consumption, and the farmer is responding, as he always does, and is providing more than is required by the domestic consumption. Now, if there is no war, if there is no wartime demand, what effect will this have on the farmer's economy when all of this surplus food that you are appealing to him to produce must be consumed at home in the normal channels of trade?

Secretary BRANNAN. Well, Mr. Chairman, you have touched on a point that has been a very worrisome point for us. I am not so much concerned about the fact that our production is geared to the possibilities of all-out hostilities as about the fact that our production has been geared to a very high level of economic activity in this country which is putting purchasing power in the hands of many, many millions of people, very adequate purchasing power. If, for example, there was a very drastic cut-back in the production program as now outlined by Mr. Wilson, and people began to be laid off, and I certainly do not anticipate anything like it, but if that were to happen, probably then we would have some troubles in agriculture, Mr. Chairman, but our troubles in agriculture would not be any more severe, I am sure, than the troubles which would come in the other parts of the economy, too.

Mr. CANNON. Just there, Mr. Secretary, you do not mean that we are also producing automobiles, tractors, and fertilizer at a rate which would be embarrassing in that it would produce a surplus which would be thrown upon the market in case of permanent peace?

Secretary BRANNAN. Oh, no, Mr. Chairman, I was referring to a cut-back in the production of tanks, guns, and things of that character.

Mr. CANNON. They do not affect other industries as adversely as a surplus of food would affect the farmer's market.

Secretary BRANNAN. That is right. If we curtail the production program for tanks, guns, and the rest of the things that are now scheduled, as a result of which there is a very high level of employment, then there might not be such strong competition for the American farmer's products in the market place, and he would stand to suffer some price depreciation and, except for the very fine price-support program which the Congress has provided—I mean the very fundamentally sound theory of price supports which this Congress has continued to provide—the American farmer might start into a tail spin that would be comparable to the one he led the whole country into and which resulted in the situation we had in 1929–32.

Mr. CANNON. Then, the national program is subjecting the farmer to a danger to his postwar price structures, such as you very aptly say, produced devastating results in previous agricultural depressions, notably 1920 and 1921. No other industry or class of business in the United States is being asked to assume a similar risk, is being asked to accelerate its production program to a point that would depress its price structure following the days of war. The farmer alone is being singled out to run that risk.

Secretary BRANNAN. That is correct, sir.

In the event of a very substantial decrease in purchasing power in the United States, there would be some commodities which would be adversely affected pricewise. Our price-support programs would then come into play, and perhaps some of these commodities could be utilized in the implementation of our foreign-program objectives. We now have facilities for storing a good quantity of the grain and to keep a considerable quantity out of the market place and relieve its depressing pressures, but it would certainly be foolhardy to say that we would not be faced with some new and serious problems. Of course, we would be faced with some problems in the way of the perishable commodities, just as we were a short time ago.

STORAGE FACILITIES

Mr. CANNON. What provision are you making for storage facilities to take care of this expected surplus?

Secretary BRANNAN. Mr. Chairman, we have built approximately 550,000,000 bushels of grain storage in 1949, and it is now out there, dispersed over the country, and it is available to carry some of our large stocks. Simultaneously we have encouraged private trade to increase its storage capacity, and there have been increases and approved facilities in the hands of the private trade.

FOOD RATIONING

Mr. CANNON. What is the food-rationing outlook at this time, the prospect that supplies will have to be curtailed at the market place, such as was done in the last war?

Secretary BRANNAN. Mr. Chairman, we do not contemplate an early application of any kind of rationing program. We certainly are not talking about it, and we are bending every effort in the opposite direction, attempting to put enough on the market that no rationing program will be necessary.

Mr. CANNON. Would you have authority to establish ceiling price below the legal rates, the legal prices under the law supporting the price of farm products which fall below parity?

Secretary BRANNAN. I think not, Mr. Chairman. I hope that problem never arises, and the probability that it will arise is pretty remote, because, as you recall, the Defense Production Act sets the legal minimums at 100 percent of parity or the prices prevailing during 30 days prior to Korea, whichever is higher. We might get into a situation in which there would be conflict between a desire to set ceilings at the legal minimum, which is 100 percent of parity or pre-Korea, if the Department decided that in order to stimulate production we would need to increase or maintain prices above the parity or pre-Korea level.

If we said, for example, that we wanted to set the support level at 110 percent of parity, and the legal minimum would be 100 percent of parity, and Mr. DiSalle insisted on the price being at the minimum of 100 percent of parity, there would be a 10-percent overlapping there which might give us trouble; but I am reasonably sure, Mr. Chairman, if we ever had a situation in which we had to do something extraordinary to stimulate production in this country, there would be little tendency to try to fix the minimum price below our support level.

Mr. CANNON. Your statutory support level?

Secretary BRANNAN. No; the support level designed to induce production. We do have the authority to use support prices above the fixed statutory levels under certain circumstances, where it is in the national interest.

DEFINITION OF PARITY

Mr. CANNON. What is the Department's interpretation of the term "parity"; what is parity?

Secretary BRANNAN. Well, there are many definitions, Mr. Chairman.

Parity, in one word, is equality for farmers; in an effort to achieve economic equality for farmers.

A little more extended definition is that parity represents the relationship between the cost of the things that farmers have to buy, for production and family living, and the prices which they get for their commodities in the market place. It is tied to a base period which was established as 1910–14 and is then projected down to date. For example, the parity price for a bushel of wheat today is enough to allow the farmer to buy the same amount of goods as would have exchanged for a bushel of wheat in 1910–14.

Mr. CANNON. In brief, parity means equality, the farmer's equality with other industries?

Secretary BRANNAN. That is right, sir.

Mr. CANNON. Summarizing it still more briefly, parity is fair? It is equity.

Secretary BRANNAN. That's right, Mr. Chairman.

Mr. CANNON. Whenever you reduce the farmer's price below parity, you are not being fair to the farmer. Then you are giving him an unfair price?

Secretary BRANNAN. Yes, sir; that is right.

Mr. CANNON. You are favoring other industries at his expense?

Secretary BRANNAN. Yes, sir; that is right.

I am also including an excerpt from the testimony of Mr. DiSalle, the Director of Price Stabilization:

Mr. CANNON. You have additional livestock regulations in contemplation?

Mr. DISALLE. Yes, sir. We have a beef regulation being written and a pork regulation.

Mr. CANNON. Does that apply at the counter, in the market place, on the farm, or at the point of distribution?

Mr. DISALLE. It will apply from the point of production to the point of sale.

OBSERVANCE OF PARITY IN DETERMINING PRICES

Mr. CANNON. Every effort will be made to arrive at an equitable price, and you will observe parity in determining prices being imposed?

Mr. DISALLE. Yes. Beef is at 141 percent of parity right now.

Mr. CANNON. What about hogs?

Mr. DISALLE. They are right about parity. They have been below parity most of the time. It keeps fluctuating back and forth.

Mr. CANNON. It is axiomatic, Mr. Director, that in an inflation the farmers' prices rise last and fall first. That was true in the last war and in recent wartime developments. Since 1945 industrial prices, dividends, freight rates, price of farm machinery, fertilizer, wages of all classes of labor, especially farm labor, and the national income and the Federal revenue have reached peaks never before attained. I suppose you might say they are now at the highest point of many years.

Mr. DISALLE. That is right.

Mr. CANNON. With one exception, however. The price of hogs has been dropping until recently. It went up above $30 and went down to below $18.

Mr. DISALLE. That is right.

Mr. CANNON. Well, while everything else was going up together including the cost of producing the hog, the price was falling. You will take that into consideration so no step will be taken to place it lower than parity?

Mr. DISALLE. Under the law we are bound to observe parity.

Address Delivered by Dr. Percy L. Julian at Sixteenth Annual Patriotic Award Dinner of the Chicago Decalogue Society of Lawyers

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. SIDNEY R. YATES
OF ILLINOIS
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES
Monday, April 9, 1951

Mr. YATES. Mr. Speaker, each year the Decalogue Society of Lawyers, one of the distinguished bar associations in the city of Chicago, commendably presents its coveted award of merit to an individual who, in the opinion of the society, has done most to advance the cause of humanity and democracy in our community.

This year the award was appropriately given to one of Chicagoland's most civic-minded citizens, the world renowned chemical scientist, Dr. Percy L. Julian. More than 1,300 people, including numerous dignitaries, crowded the grand ballroom of the Palmer House on March 3, 1951, to pay tribute to Dr. Julian on the occasion of his receiving the award.

Dr. Julian, as is known, is the discoverer of numerous life-giving drugs arising from his research on the soya bean. Among them are cortisone, the hormone compound used in the treatment of arthritis; physostigmine, used in the cure of the eye disease, glaucoma; prostigmine, used in the treatment of paralysis; synthetic male and female hormones credited with saving the lives of countless unborn babies by protecting expectant mothers from miscarriage, and others.

From the soya bean, Dr. Julian also discovered the use of aero-foam, the fire extinguisher which saved so many lives aboard ships during our naval war in the Pacific.

At the present time, he is working hard on pregnenolone to combat fatigue and amino acids for the treatment of infection and starvation.

By his brilliant discoveries in the field of chemical research, Dr. Julian has demonstrated unusual service to mankind and dynamic leadership in his chosen field. The award of merit given him by the Decalogue Society takes cognizance of the fact, moreover, that Dr. Julian is also unselfishly and continuously at work on the critical problem of improving the science of human relationships which exist between man and man, group and group, and for his avowed championing of the cause of decency and the progress of a free America.

Reprinted below are the remarks made by Dr. Julian after acceptance of the award:

THE IMAGE OF OUR NATIONAL CHARACTER

Mr. Chairman, friends of the Decalogue Society, distinguished guests, I would not be a realist at all if I failed to appreciate the inspiring and typical American flavor of this occasion. For my children I must honestly record that this testimonial transcends anything that has to do with the feeble efforts of their father to be a good American citizen; it is rather a part of the traditional and finest American spirit—that we are never too coldly critical in our appraisal, that we never set our standards of worth so high, that we cannot pause and extend our love, our generosity and our food to the spirit of the humble who need it, that their spirits may be rekindled and their faith deepened. And my children will remember the spiritual of their forefathers, "Let us cheer the weary traveler." I can only say with deep humility that I shall strive someday to be worthy of only a small part of your outpouring, and I thank you from the bottom of my heart for this symbol to my children of the ties that bind them to the hearts of their fellow Americans.

You who have gathered together at this feast of love and human generosity represent the custodians of an image which hundreds of millions of people in this hour are attempting to bring into focus to discern clearly its real and basic outline. It is an image around which the ferments of an entire world are today seething. With mingling feelings of fear, of trembling, of yearning, of futility, of resignation, of despair, and of hope, the millions of surging humanity, standing upon the brink of a new age, are seeking a view of this image. For you are the custodians of the image of our national character. Honest recognition of its inescapable fact, with deep humility, involves at the same time an acceptance or a rejection of significant and history-making responsibilities. Whether we, as custodians of this image, can be entrusted and will be entrusted by the gracious God of human destiny to lead humanity with intelligent humility and understanding into the promised land of beauty of which the prophets have prayed and the angels have sung—or whether mass hysteria, fed upon the love of confusion, which is the essence of satanic glee, shall make of the struggles of humanity nothing other than the Shakespearean cynicism that "day by day we ripe and ripe, and day by day we rot and rot, and thereby hangs the tale"—this is the basic issue of civilization's conflict today. Is so-called human progress a delusion? Is human history to be considered as horses moving in a theatre but getting nowhere? The answer to these questions depends, to no little extent, upon the basic outline of the image of our national character, as that image emerges into the focus of the gaze of the trembling children of this earth.

No nation in world history ever had a more peculiar and strategic rendezvous with the gracious God of human destiny. A Nation that has gathered itself by its own bootstraps from the sea-level of the jungle to the amazing elevation of unparalleled order, beauty, and power; a Nation that juts above the tableland of world morality as a massive peak; a Nation that has dared to keep the flame of freedom burning within the breast of the lowliest child of this earth; a Nation whose tortuous struggles toward articulation of this freedom have involved it in a maze of paradoxes, but has nevertheless stolidly maintained its determination to replace uncertainty by certainty, vagueness by definiteness, and confusion by order; a Nation that approaches its present historical rendezvous as a crown in the nobility of the ages. To such a nobility must its great debate in this historical hour address itself, and the greatest treason that its thinking citizenry could commit in this dark hour of uncertainty would be to approach its challenge with anything but unflinching honesty.

Sometime perhaps in the thirtieth century A. D. a world historian is going to write a chapter entitled "The Age of Approaching Honesty." A part of that chapter may be devoted to an apparently trivial portion of the American scene and may read as follows:

"And it came to pass that one day in this approaching millennium, a wise city father listened with patience but with determination to the angry protests of a few of his assembled councilmen. 'Sir, you bring ruin upon our beloved city with your unrealistic policies. These enterprising men of wealth and holdings will bring millions to the coffers of our fair city if you will but let them do so; there will be jobs for thousands; parks and terraces of untold beauty shall blend with the matchless beauty of our metropolis; no city of our land may boast of more beautiful homes for its citizens. All they ask is that in making land available to them for this glorious crowning feat of free enterprise, you give them the freedom to reserve these institutions of beauty for those whom they consider bone of our bone and flesh of our flesh. Without this freedom, we fear they may take their capital elsewhere for investment.' And the city father answered them, saying 'It is not freedom these men covet, it is license. The concept of freedom is too precious to every American to be subjected to such idle mockery. My message which you will take to your clients is clear and unequivocal. Tell them to take their money and go elsewhere, for I do not intend to preside over a city whose social citadels do not point always to the impregnable battlements of a city of God.' And the remaining councilmen stood up in one body of acclaim for their wise leader, and assemblies of freedom-loving men the world over burst forth in thunderous applause. Perhaps the heavens smiled and the angels sang, for had not Glaucon said to Socrates ages ago: 'Socrates, I do not believe that there is such a city of God anywhere on earth.' Socrates replied, 'Whether such a city exists in heaven or ever will exist on earth, the wise man will live after the manner of that city, having nothing to do with any other, and in so looking upon it, will set his own house in order'."

Now our most intimate concern, Mr. Chairman, is with the dream of this city of God in the evolution of the image of our national character. It seems appropriate that we consider for a moment the peculiar identity of the roles which science and the law share in this evolution. These two, apparently distinct, and apparently unrelated intellectual disciplines have a remarkably similar operating base, for the cardinal essence of the approach of each of these disciplines at its best is the use of the human imagination. We speak here of imagination not in terms of the nostalgic and mystic beauty of Alice in Wonderland. We speak rather of imagination, as Walter Kerr recently expressed it, as the power to construct images of truth and goodness that render the truth and concomitant goodness more intense—that make truth and goodness more identical with reality in its broadest sense. The imagination of an Alice in Wonderland is not imagination at all; it is rather invention—"the invention of hypothetical states beyond and even contrary to any reality or any truth we have ever known." In the history, both of our disciplines, the products of such invention have unfortunately posed as truth and as reality, and if, indeed, the image of our national character is in this moment in any wise blurred, the confusion resulting from the substitution of invented pictures for reality itself, bears a large part of the blame. There is grave danger that the contagion of such a confusion will sap the vitality and robustness of our national character in a manner that will lead to disaster. Dr. Fred Hoskins told an intriguing story a few days ago, which aptly illustrates how prone is the human mind to accept invention as a substitute for reality and truth.

A little boy was running along the street as fast as his feet would carry him and came upon a woman who stopped him, saying "Now, my lad, where do you think you are going in such haste?" "Why, I'm going to fetch a doctor for Granddaddy; he is very ill." "Oh, your Grandfather is not ill at all; he only thinks he's ill, and you just go back home and tell him so." Whereupon the lad did as he was told. A few days later he met the same woman again. "Oh, how is your Granddaddy, my young man?" "Oh, he's fine; he thinks he's dead and we're burying him on Saturday." Now, the imagination which we identify with the core and cardinal essence of these two disciplines to which you and I are devoted—science and the law—strives to keep before us a vitalizing and impelling picture of ultimate truth—yea of eternal verity.

Now I am perfectly aware that the down to bedrock, pragmatic intellect will object to the introduction of such resilience in what to him is a comfortably static discipline of conveniently fixed reference points. He will complain that only chaos can result from a confusion of the isness of the law with its inevitable oughtness. And he will take pride in recalling for you the story of the student who allegedly cried out to Dean Pound, "But, professor, that is not justice," whereupon the learned Dean is reputed to have replied, "My boy, we are teaching the law; if you want justice, go to the divinity school." Now most of us believe that Dean Pound was libeled by his story. Certainly, however, when mature devotees of legal discipline are impressed by this reduction to absurdity it is a blot upon the high calling of your profession and another contribution to the blurring of the image of our national character. For, if justice is consistent with truth in an ordered world, there can be in the long run no basic conflict between justice and the law.

If then, such is the essence of legal objectives, then the first and most sacred duty of the judiciary, and its high calling, is to seek at all times the synonymity between the intent of the law and an image of eternal verity. And beyond this comes the determination to expand the law so as to bring it into consonance with such an image. Enslavement to custom, enticement by the opportunism of the moment; fever psychology should then be considered a disease by an enlightened judiciary and should never thwart the emergence of the true imaginative force. A beloved man of the Chicago bench, in supporting the validity of restrictive covenants some years ago is known to have said "Though my decision runs directly counter to my personal convictions as a Christian and contrary to the basic concepts of our American democratic faith, I can make no other decision for such is the law." Here on the part of a good man is a striking illustration of this disease of enslavement to custom of which I have spoken. As a Nation we are beginning to feel the effects of this all-too-prevalent reluctance to apply the true imaginative force to our social problems, this reluctance to travel in the valley of the shadows beyond the calloused husk that hides the force of inevitable truth. And yet nothing is more imperative to us at this crisis in world history than that we accelerate this very process. Indeed the stern lessons of history teach us that nothing is more tragic than the reluctance of mortal man to face the stark realism of cumulative truth. That Newton's revelations were like an earthquake to the foundations of the intellectual world of the eighteenth century is well-known history; it is equally well-known history, however, that Newton's victory was inevitable. For Newton has attempted the construction of an image of cosmic order in applying his laws of gravitation to the apparently wayward movements of the shooting stars. The victory of the ordered over the wayward; the victory of reality over the apparent—just had to prevail. Likewise the struggles of Galileo with the church over the truth or falsity of his heliocentric doctrine is an historical tragedy which none of us likes to recall.

Now what does all of this have to do with the evolution of the image of our national character? To begin with, whether we will it or not, we have come to the point in world history where we are literally expected to be the torch-bearers of world morality. The image of our national character must be consistent with the dreams and aspirations of mankind down the ages for an ordered world. It matters not how comfortable may be the concept of our geographical position as that of an island arsenal; the stark truth is that we are just as harnessed to the remainder of the world today, as the wayward planets of Newton were harnessed to one another by his universal laws of gravitation. The social forces of a dawning new age are constituting a geocentric system as inevitable as the planetary system of the physical world. To assume anything to the contrary is sheer, nonsensical invention. And the great debate needs more than anything else the application of that genuine imaginative force that constitutes the essence of the disciplines of science and the law, the willingness to identify our concepts of the future with the reality revealed by the cumulative lessons of human history.

Perhaps the most explosive paradox in world affairs today is the danger that the American Nation may take an excursion away from the cumulative historical realism of the past few centuries, and thus inadvertently attempt to stop the clock of human progress. Paradoxical because for centuries the dominating force in the image of our national character has been a vigorous frontier motif—aggressive and progressive change—ceaseless, restless, disturbing change. The world has come to recognize these positive elements of our national character as healthy elements in social, economic, and political progress. Now all of a sudden when the social forces of the world need badly a unifying or regulating concept, when the wayward movements of these social forces threaten the scheme of things to which we have become accustomed, we do not present a calm faith in the identity of our structure with history's long cherished aspirations. We develop instead an hysteria that spends much of its energies in thought control movements—in the feverish efforts to convince ourselves that we are all right just as we are. Few men in public life today dare a candid examination of these facets of hysteria that blur the image of our national character. We are jittery; we are frantic with fear, and we want no part of anything new. It is not a healthy, courageous, positive faith which we offer the world today; it is an uncertain and jittery negativism. Indeed some of us would go so far as to suggest that in the realm of interacting social forces, we have made all the discoveries; we are paragons of virtue—there are no more frontiers ahead of us.

To such a thesis no scientist can subscribe despite his pride in the historical greatness of our Nation. Our present American tendency toward smug refuge in omniscience and a sense of physical power is the direst disease that ever set upon our spirits as a people. We cannot be reminded too often of the scientist of something more than a hundred years ago who voiced the opinion that all of the great fundamental discoveries of science had been made, that it only remained for future generations to polish them, refine them, and adapt them to our practical needs. That man had reached the zenith of his capability for exploring the fundamental unknown.

Almost as if God, Himself, had been angered by such arrogant skepticism there descended upon this pronouncement an avalache of the most glorious discoveries that have ever been credited to the human intellect. For shortly thereafter Michael Faraday drew a living spark from the lifeless magnet. And Daniel, Grove, and Bunsen, following close on the heels of Faraday's discovery, gave us an enduring source of electrodynamic power. And Ohm in Germany taught us how to measure such a power when obtained. Yes, hardly had the ink dried upon this pronouncement when Bessel detected the parallaxes of the fixed stars, and Adams and Leverrier threw their grapples out into space and felt the influence of unseen planets trembling along the delicate lines of their analyses. Draper, Daguerre, and Talbot revealed the wonders of actinism and gave us the new science of photography. Yes, in another field, almost bordering on the aesthetic, Agassiz in Italy rode down the Alps upon the backs of the glaciers and proved their steady flow. And Darwin lifted the veil from the mysteries of organic development.

I like to think of Stokes as he stood one afternoon in the English countryside gazing at a rainbow—and as he looked from the red to the violet end, he wondered what became of yonder violet as it faded into the invisible. And lo. Stokes with this dream had discovered for us the ultraviolet—beyond the violet—and blessed us unwittingly with vitamin D, the sunshine vitamin, so that today our children need not grow up with the crooked bones of rickets. So that today we have thrust deep at the heart of arthritis or rheumatism. And so today, they tell us, a hen that used to lay you 150 eggs a year now lays you 300 eggs a year because du Pont's deisterol. All because Stokes gazed at a rainbow and had the courage to dream of good things yet to come.

And in our own country Edison discovered that hot bodies give off electricity—fast-moving electrons. And with this discovery he had written the first—even if relatively insignificant—chapter in the history of the atomic bomb. And when Roentgen in Germany read of Edison's discovery, he decided to place a piece of tungsten metal in the path of these electrons. And when did, he noticed new types of penetrating rays emitted from the tungsten target. And lo and behold. Roentgen had discovered for us the X-day enabling our eye to see where hitherto we had not dreamed it would.

And when Becquerel in France read of Roentgen's discovery he decided to look at his uranium from a new point of view. Yes; Becquerel's uranium from the pitchblends of mountain Austria, known to man partly because a poor Russian, Mendeleef, had struggled through the university and, out of the brilliance of his intellect, harnessed the wayward masses of the atoms into a system of periodicity, leaving a blank space which one day a metal, uranium, was to occupy. And now Becquerel had it; he wrapped a photographic plate up in a piece of black paper and laid it near a piece of uranium. And when he opened up the paper a short time later the photographic plate was as black as if it had been exposed to the direct rays of the sun. And Becquerel had written a second and very significant chapter in the history of the atomic bomb.

And when Pierre and Marie Curie read of Becquerel's discovery, they knew where to look for radium, and they went straight to that pitchblende from mountain Austria, and there they found it, and gave to humanity not only the first concrete remedy against the malady of cancer but to us a new image of a whole new science of rapidly moving particles charged with electricity—electrons, protons, and alpha particles. And a third and most significant chapter had been written in the history of the atomic bomb.

And when Rutherford in England read of the Curies' work, he bombarded an atom of nitrogen with their alpha particles and converted the atom of nitrogen into an atom of hydrogen and an atom of oxygen. And Rutherford had written a fourth and vital chapter in the history of the atomic bomb.

And the years pass on with increasing perfection of the image of ultimate truth. When Marie's daughter, Irene Curie, working with Joliot, learned of Rutherford's work, she reexamined the beloved uranium of her mother, and there she found something that her mother's eyes had not seen, that there were other fast-moving particles emitted, not charged with electricity, not susceptible, therefore, to deflection in the electromagnetic fields of Faraday and Daniel, Grove and Bunsen, but fast-moving particles which went straight to their target. And a fifth and crucial chapter had been written in the history of the atomic bomb. And these workers had brought us close to the basic building stones—and some say the obliterating stones—of our material existence, ever closer and closer to reality, to ultimate truth.

This chronology of genius at work is but a striking illustration of history's summary rejection of any attempt to bottle up cumulative wisdom into a fixed and static formula of human behavior. I have often recalled a story told by Harry Emerson Fosdick of a minister who went into his study and found his little daughter busily sketching something on paper. "Why, Anne, what are you drawing?" he asked. "Oh, Daddy, I'm drawing a picture of God." "But, Anne, no one knows what God looks like." "Well, they will when I'm through."

We need gravely to ask ourselves whether we are tending toward a people with the mentality of Anne. Have we become so smugly satisfied with ourselves as we are that we reject any picture that we cannot reconcile with our man-sized God? Shall we allow the image of our national character with a devotion to the mere husks and rinds of good?

And Socrates replied "Whether such a city of God exists in Leaven or ever will exist on earth, the wise man will live after the manner of that city, having nothing to do with any other, and in so looking upon it, will set his own house in order." We cannot escape our historical destiny. Our house must be so set in order that the image of our national character will be identified with the image of order and truth for which noble men have bled and died down the ages.

I would be faithless to my strongest convictions as an American citizen did I not tell you that the image of our national character is severely blurred for the rest of the civilized world by the miserable eighteenth and nineteenth century European-like ghettos which choke the honor and human decency out of nearly every major metropolis of this Nation. It is symptomatic of our smugness that we expect to weld Americans together in a unity of purpose, while we subject the spirits of 15,000,000 of Americans to the horrors of a Dachau and Buchenwald psychology. In the sense of the Thracian maiden's evaluation of Thales of Miletus, some of us have been so busy studying the stars of freedom that we have literally fallen into the wells of spiritual degradation at our feet. We cannot hold the garment of God in our right hand and raise it to our lips while a left hand behind our back is clasped firmly in the grip of Satan, and expect a world of people to discern a coveted image of our national character. I warn my fellow citizens that no true patriotism can emanate from the American ghetto. It has only served to create a house bitterly divided against itself, and though the house may stand, its strength and fiber are vitiated. Someday someone will write a dramatic story for the rest of the civilized world of the detailed horrors of the American ghetto and the peculiar helplessness of its innocent victims. I say unto you now that the forces which have fought to maintain American Negro ghettos must be destroyed. Foremost among these forces is that section of the real-estate group which spreads the doctrine that if a Negro moves next to you no matter who he is, the value of your property goes down. This insidious propaganda and incidentally, this vicious lie, has ceased to carry the flavor of privileged speech. It has become vile slander, incitement to arson, to murder, and to the wildest forms of mob violence. But for a half hour delay, by the grace of God, I would today be a mute victim of this propaganda. The time has come when Federal and city statutes may well be necessary to insure citizens against first degree or premeditated murder by these members of the real-estate clan. I have never witnessed a more subtly generated hysteria than that created daily in the mind of the American property owner by the so-called respectable real-estate dealer. A few months ago one of my coworkers went with her husband to Elmhurst to look for a piece of property. Anxious to get the best for their youthful and sacrificial savings, they were told, as the first of their assets, by the real-estate dealer, "You need never have any fear of any Negroes living in Elmhurst!" One is prone to ask how long must decent Americans die in Korea and still be the subject of such slander?

It is not worthy of citizens of a great nation like this to make an already sorely harassed minority the scapegoat in vital issues that affect the image of our national character. For example, the issue of public versus private housing has degenerated into unreasonable slander of the Negro minority. We cannot in this city apparently meet squarely and honestly the issue as to whether public housing is consistent with the spirit of our free-enterprise system and our American desire for beauty in our cities, simply because demagogs insist upon keeping before the public the invention that public housing is designed primarily for the Negro population. It is almost inconceivable that a great people like ourselves should allow such a discussion to degrade into spurious logical sequences such as "You are for some public housing, eh?" "Then you are against free enterprise." "Then you are for the Negro." "Then you are for the destruction of white neighborhoods." "Then you are a Communist."

It is to the great credit of our mayor that he is reputed to have stated last year in the fever of this hysteria, "There is no such thing as a white neighborhood in the city of Chicago." I hope, and there are thousands who hope with me, that we may have that statement repeated by our mayor. It is a good statement, and if the image of our national character is to be a real world force it is a patriotic statement. We certainly cannot weld together a nation of one people by reminding 15,000,000 Americans constantly of white neighborhoods any more than by asking them to die for a white country. Such behavior is unworthy of the nobility of our Nation and blurs the image of our national character.

And, speaking of dying in Korea, let me quote you from a recent segment of the American Negro Press: "Meanwhile, a news story broke which was given scant editorial attention in the daily press, but was a matter of considerable concern in the Negro press: South Koreans were being integrated into white units of the American Army. Robert Bennyhoff, UP correspondent wrote, 'They are being incorporated into American platoons and squads on an equal basis with American soldiers. The Koreans wear American uniforms, live and eat with the GI's, and get the same treatment.' The order came from MacArthur; it was, according to the general, 'in keeping with the true concept of a United Nations army.' Meanwhile the Twenty-fourth Infantry regiment was listening to the following words from its commander, 'You people have a history of running from battle. You ran in the Ninety-second in the last war. Now you are the frightened Twenty-fourth Infantry regiment. I intend to change that to the fighting Twenty-fourth.' And the Twenty-fourth remains a Jim Crow outfit while the Pittsburgh Courier writes to 15,000,000 Negro Americans, 'This is an insult which burns deep into the soul of every black American.'"

Whether all of this represents moral indifference, ignorance, or downright moral turpitude, we who are gathered here this evening must, of necessity, be determined to erase these elements of disgrace from our national character. The image of that character must stand unblemished as a beacon light of hope to a confused world. It has been too hard earned and is too precious to be tampered with. I fervently hope, Mr. Chairman, that I may record for my children that you have done me this great honor because we share in common these concepts of the sacred mission of our respective disciplines to which we have alluded. That the ideals implied in these concepts are those by which we live and for the defense of which we would gladly die. And that one and all here this evening we share this coveted image of our national character as the most precious heritage for our children. That we are assembled here to pray that that image may blossom forth in a new birth of freedom, a unity of purpose, a dauntless faith, so that the peoples of this earth may see that we have no fear, for that which we seek is the kingdom of God.

Migratory Farm Labor

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. SAMUEL W. YORTY
OF CALIFORNIA
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES
Monday, April 9, 1951

Mr. YORTY. Mr. Speaker, the President's Commission on Migratory Labor has now filed its report, and I should like to include in our RECORD an article published in the New York Times yesterday explaining said report. I should also like to direct the attention of the membership to an editorial from this morning's Washington Post entitled "Migrant Farm Labor."

The recommendations of the President's Commission are strikingly similar to those made by a California commission appointed by Gov. Earl Warren. In view of the fact that all impartial and nonpartisan agencies which investigate the problem tend to arrive at the same conclusions and to make the same recommendations, it is difficult for me to understand why our own Committee on Agriculture seems blind to the obvious facts, and has brought forth no comprehensive legislation aimed at a satisfactory solution of the migrant farm labor problem.

Of course, the reference of bills dealing with migratory labor is made to the Agriculture Committee in obvious disregard of the law, as set forth in Public Law 601, Seventy-ninth Congress. The whole subject matter legally and rightfully belongs in the Committee on Labor and Education.

[From the New York Times]

TOP FEDERAL AGENCY URGED FOR MIGRANT FARM WORKERS

(By Louis Stark)

WASHINGTON, April 7.—The President's Commission on Migratory Labor reported today that the industrialization of agriculture had brought with it all the social evils that accompanied the earlier industrial revolution. In an 80,000-word report to the White House the Commission pointed out that while workers in industry had derived benefit from the rapid increase of productivity in mine, mill, and factory, similar strides in production on the farm had, on the contrary, thrown the farm and migratory workers backward.

The Commission's principal suggestion for corrective action centered about its proposal for an entirely new Federal Committee on Migratory Farm Labor.

This group, as recommended in the report, would coordinate all Federal activities concerning itinerant farm workers. The body, to be named by the President, is not intended to be a permanent new agency, but rather a top functionary unit to unify all the efforts of Federal agencies that have to do with the itinerant problem. The ultimate goal of the new set-up would be complete elimination of farm-labor migrancy by gradual steps.

Current approaches to the problem, according to the Commission's findings, have been to deprive the migrant of the benefits of farm mechanization and the advances in social legislation. Some of the migrants, it was stated, live in a state of "virtual peonage."

TRUMAN SEES ULTIMATE BENEFIT

On receiving the report President Truman issued a statement in which he said that it "makes an impressive contribution to a subject which should be of serious concern to us all."

Mr. Truman thanked the members of the Commission for their efforts and said that "their contribution will assist greatly in developing fair and practical solutions to what is admittedly a complicated problem."

The Chairman of the Commission is Maurice T. Van Hecke, professor of law, University of North Carolina. The other members are Noble Clark, College of Agriculture, University of Wisconsin; William N. Lieserson, economist, Washington; the Most Reverend Robert E. Lucey, archbishop of San Antonio; and Peter H. Odegard, professor of political science, University of California, at Berkeley.

The report deals with the plight of 1,000,000 migratory farm workers, of whom half are domestic migrants. The other half is made up of 400,000 illegal Mexican "wetbacks" (persons who cross the border by swimming or wading or just walking) and 100,000 Mexicans legally here under contract and a small number of British West Indians and Puerto Ricans.

BLAME IS WIDELY SPREAD

Some of the evils which the commission says it found during its eight months' investigation were pinned on the large industrial growers, many of whom deal with so-called contractor and crew leaders. These last-named bear no direct responsibility to the migratory workers.

The commission, too, discovered an anomaly in the employment conditions of migratory farm workers. Alien workers, such as those who come here from Mexico, for example, are, by intergovernmental treaty, guaranteed employment, minimum wages, workmen's compensation, medical care, housing, and sanitation standards. But domestic migrants not only have no protection through collective bargaining but employers refuse to accord to them the guaranties they extend to imported alien farm workers.

This leads the commission to conclude that the importation of foreign contract labor be undertaken only on the basis of intergovernmental agreements which should be uniform for all foreign governments.

This recommendation is based partly on the fact that from some regions, notably the West Indies, alien farm workers arrive "on whatever terms these foreign governments were able to secure in negotiation with private employers of the United States." In these cases this country has "given no official scrutiny to the terms of the work contracts or their enforcement."

PROBLEM NOT A SMALL MAN'S ONE

It was emphasized by the commission that the problems under study were not primarily those of "the poor little farmer" but were largely confined to conditions on about 125,000 farms which "amount to 2 percent of the farms of the Nation and produce crops equal to approximately 7 percent of the value of all farm products."

While governmental agencies do not escape criticism in the report, the commission finds that, primarily, the failure of Federal and State agencies to remedy conditions affecting migratory farm workers is traceable to the fact that virtually all social legislation exempts agricultural workers on the assumption that they are employed on small family farms.

The commission submitted a series of specific recommendations for raising the standards of life among the migrant farm workers.

FINAL CHANGE OF POLICY ADVOCATED

It is suggested that dependence on foreign labor for farm work be reduced until this source is no longer required. When it is necessary to import labor, first preference should be given to United States citizens from Puerto Rico and Hawaii.

The conclusion that it is not necessary to import aliens in large numbers during the present emergency is supported broadly by this argument:

Estimated farm output for 1951 is 3.6 percent above 1949. If this additional output were to require an equal percentage increase in man-hours then we would need about 700,000,000 additional manhours to produce the 1951 output. These additional manhours could be supplied by the present domestic labor force, including farm family labor, if each worker put in 6½ more days per year. And, even at that, they would be working 3 days fewer per year than in 1945. The average hired farm worker who in 1949 was getting only 90 days of farm work—23 fewer than in wartime—would be willing, if given the opportunity, to contribute this amount and more.

In a chapter on alien contract labor the report refers to the difficulty of negotiating the intergovernmental agreement for farm labor importation from Mexico.

Mexico and the United States do not approach the negotiations with equal freedom for bargaining, according to the Commission. This is so because Mexico prescribes minimum standards for nationals leaving the country for employment abroad, while we prescribe no minimum standards for domestic farm workers.

STATE DEPARTMENT HINDERED

Then, too, the Commission notes, the State Department is handicapped in negotiating the treaty with Mexico by not being able to consult all interested groups. Farm employers who are well organized and articulate are consulted, but farm workers with virtually no organization, are not in a position to set forth their views.

The Commission heard a sizable volume of testimony which indicated that imported Mexican labor in the southwest encroached on domestic labor, while illegal wetbacks and also the legalized worker of the same category further depressed already low standards.

So vast was the wetback invasion by Mexican nationals from 1947 onward, that the Republic south of the border opposed the recruitment of workers from its interior regions when large numbers of its nationals already were illegally in the United States.

To meet this condition, the United States agreed to legalize wetbacks in 1947, 1949, and 1950. These illegals received identification papers from the United States immigration service, after which they stepped over the border as a token deportation, then stepped back and were permitted to become contract workers.

From 1947 to 1950, according to the Commission, Texas, with a large supply of wetback and contract labor, reduced its wages 11 percent; California, with little contract labor and relatively smaller wetback saturation, raised its wages 15 percent.

The conclusion is drawn from these and other figures that the Government agencies responsible for importing and contracting foreign labor have not protected domestic farm labor from detrimental effects of imported, contract alien labor.

The report describes what the Commission considers the inadequacies in the method of ascertaining whether a farm labor shortage exists.

The farmers, it was pointed out, meet at the beginning of the season and decide unilaterally what the prevailing wage is to be. The rate is usually low before the season begins, and so, the report finds, it is possible that insufficient domestic labor is attracted. Therefore a labor shortage can be said to exist at that price.

Since foreign workers cannot be imported until the United States Employment Service certifies that a shortage exists, this apparent lack of applicants becomes the basis for the necessary certification.

HOW TO CERTIFY A SHORTAGE

To safeguard the interests of domestic farm labor and to avoid, so far as possible, discrimination that favors imported alien contract labor, the Commission proposes that no certification of shortage of domestic labor should be made unless and until continental domestic labor has been offered the same terms and conditions of employment as are offered to foreign workers.

The official vigilance during World War II that provided for temporary admission of alien farm workers was abandoned in the postwar years, the report points out.

Since then, responsible Government administrative agencies have ceased putting forth efforts to preserve national immigration policy, the report continues.

The Commission, in fact, found that the importation of alien farm workers since the war had been on a larger scale than during the war.

The result is that temporary foreign laborers have come to furnish the very competition to American labor that it is the purpose of the immigration law to prevent.

The responsibility for organizing an orderly and expeditious movement of farm workers to successive jobs with minimum loss of time between work opportunities is the responsibility of the Farm Placement Division of the United States Employment Service. But the report offers the opinion that hardly a dent has been made in the disorder that accompanies the migration of domestic farm workers across the country, and [that] the Farm Placement Service has made little progress toward its goal.

SMOOTH SYSTEM NOT DEVISED

While the normal procedure of public employment offices in placing industrial and commercial workers is to have employers file applications for the personnel they seek, the Commission notes that the Farm Placement Division believes it impractical to devise a system for taking employment applications from migratory workers and orders from employers for seasonal or migratory laborers.

But the Farm Placement Division, according to the Commission, is more successful in winning the confidence and cooperation of employers than of the migratory workers.

"This seems to be due to the fact that in practice the service places greater emphasis on its function as a recruiting agency for farm employers than it does on the equally important function of a work-finding agency for the migratory farm laborers," the Commission points out.

In some areas migratory workers who apply at the public placement offices of the Farm Placement Division are actually referred to crew leaders and other types of labor solicitors, according to the report.

These practices have convinced the Commission that the employment service conceives its functions as rather narrow and limited. Moreover, its activities are marked by a certain one-sidedness in favor of corralling supplies of migratory farm workers to meet growers' labor demand regardless of the effect on the workers.

The general attitude of the Farm Placement Division which impressed the Commission as one-sided was that although Congress, in establishing the United States Employment Service, provided for a Federal Advisory Council representing workers, employers, and the public, the Farm Placement Service (a part of the Federal Employment Service) has disregarded this tripartite principle. Instead, it has organized and depended for advice on a special farm labor committee, composed wholly of farm employers and their representatives.

The Commission, however, softened these strictures by absolving the Placement Service of sole responsibility for present unsatisfactory labor-placement practices. It points out that while the Government has been responsible for two decades for labor placement, administrative transfers of the Emipoyment Service to various Government departments in those years may have interferred with the development of a well-rounded placement program.

ONLY TWO LABOR PACTS UNCOVERED

Only two instances of farm employees being covered by collective-bargaining contracts were found during the Commission's study.

The Commission said it was convinced that balanced organization and effective collective bargaining would be of great assistance not only to farm workers but that it would also contribute to more orderly management of labor. Adoption of the system would, for instance, eliminate the labor contractor and middleman and the "sweatshop conditions that are frequently associated with them," the report said.

As a result, it was recommended that the Taft-Hartley Act be amended to cover employees on farms having a specified minimum employment.

A widening inequity between wages paid to migratory farm workers in nonagricultural employment, was noted by the Commission.

Comparing the hourly earnings of farm laborers and factory workers the Commission reported that during 1910–14, the period designated by Congress as the base for the farm parity price system, farm wages were two-thirds of factory wages. Today they are a little more than one-third.

Actual average hourly earnings of farm workers in 1950 was 55 cents and those of factory workers $1.45. In 1910–14 the comparable figures were 14 and 21 cents.

Notwithstanding perquisites furnished by employers such as housing and transportation, the Commission finds that farm workers' annual earnings, compared with the pay of factory workers, are even worse than is suggested by relative wage rates because factory employees get more work than farm employees.

Whereas average cash earnings of factory workers in 1949 were $2,600, average earnings for both migratory and nonmigratory farm workers were only slightly more than $500.

Thus, while average factory workers' wages were two and a half times the average pay on farms, the average annual factory earnings were five times the average farm earnings.

The Commission condemned most of the on-the-job housing offered to migratory farm workers as "below minimum standards of decency." As to the so-called permanent housing in which the migrants live for the 6 to 8 months of the year when they are not working on the crops, the Commission characterizes them as "among the most deplorable in the Nation."

The Government, according to the report, does not assume any responsibilities concerning conditions of work for which it recruits farm labor.

This was emphasized to the Commission again and again by officials of the United States Employment Service.

HEALTH CONDITIONS NOT AT ALL GOOD

The summary found, too, that migratory workers were more subject to sickness and had a higher death rate than most other segments of the population.

The diet of migrant farm laborers was described as insufficient to maintain health.

Also, the growing trend toward mechanization of agriculture, according to the report, has substantially increased the risk of injury in farm employment.

The use of tractors and other machines, of mechanized blades and other cutting tools, and of noxious gases in fumigation, as well as the truck transportation of farm workers, all have contributed to make the accident rate in agriculture one of the highest in the United States.

With this in view, the Commission proposes that the United States Departments of Labor and of Agriculture lay the foundation for a safety program in agriculture.

In this connection it was pointed out that safety programs and workmen's compensation legislation have proved of benefit to employers and employees in industry and that no responsible spokesman for either group would question their value or seek their repeal. Most State workmen's compensation laws exclude farm workers, the report showed.

While child labor has all but disappeared from American industry, the Commission found, nevertheless, that it still was a serious problem in agriculture.

The Commission found evidence, too, that some employers had put pressure on school authorities to permit children to work in the fields.

Following the President's directive to inquire into the educational conditions among migratory workers, the Commission reports that "migrant children are among those with lowest educational attainments found in the United States. * * * Nor are they likely to get educational opportunities so long as they work during school hours and move from place to place with their parents in search of employment."

At the same time the Commission also found that children of migrants suffer from the discrimination and social stigma which excludes them from full participation in the community.

After describing a few educational experiments for migrant children in New Jersey, Michigan, and California, the Commission proposes joint educational programs by the Federal and State Governments for migrants and their children.

TEXT OF THE PRESIDENT'S STATEMENT

WASHINGTON, April 7.—Following is the text of a statement issued today by President Truman on receiving the report of his Commission on Migratory Labor:

"I have today received the report of the Commission on Migratory Labor which I appointed in June 1950. I asked this Commission to investigate the whole range of problems associated with the use of migratory labor to meet agricultural labor needs.

"This report makes an impressive contribution to a subject which should be of serious concern to all of us. It will be useful to Government officials and the general public alike.

"The report contains a careful and painstaking collection of the basic facts about social, economic, health, and educational conditions among migratory workers. It analyzes in detail the forces which have caused increasing use of migrants, particularly foreign workers, in agriculture. It deals systematically with basic public policy issues.

"The report suggests that primary reliance must be placed on the use—and better use—of our domestic farm labor force. The report makes a number of suggestions and recommendations for Federal and State legislative and administrative action.

"The report represents diligent and careful work on the part of the Commission and deserves the careful consideration of all of us—of the Congress, the executive agencies, and the general public.

"I want to thank the members of this Commission for their efforts. Their contribution will assist greatly in developing fair and practical solutions to what is admittedly a complicated problem."

SUMMARY OF MIGRANT RECOMMENDATIONS

BASIC PREMISES

1. That agriculture, like industry, is capable of providing decent jobs.

2. That the recurrent shortage of manpower for seasonal agricultural work is basically a problem of job standards.

WHAT RECOMMENDATIONS COVER

A coordinated public program, the emergency, alien contract labor, "wetback" labor, recruitment of farm workers, labor relations, minimum wages, housing, unemployment compensation, health and welfare, child labor and education.

A COORDINATED PUBLIC PROGRAM

A Federal Committee on Migratory Farm Labor, to be named by the President for the purpose of coordinating and stimulating the activities of the Federal Government relating to migratory farm workers and to coordinate programs undertaken by the States and private groups.

The committee to consist of eight members—three public members and one each from the Departments of State, of Agriculture and of Labor, the Immigration and Naturalization Service, and the Federal Security Agency.

THE EMERGENCY

1. More effective use of the domestic labor force is necessary.

2. Number of contract alien workers should not be increased to more than the 1950 figures, and all efforts be made to end dependence on foreign labor.

3. Where importation of labor is necessary, preference be given to citizens from Puerto Rico and Hawaii.

ALIEN CONTRACT LABOR

Foreign contract labor be imported only on the basis of intergovernmental agreements which should be uniform for all foreign governments. This aims to avoid lowering of standards by competition of foreign governments to get their laborers into this country. The United States Employment Service should certify the existence of farm labor shortages and administrative responsibility for their importation should be the sole function of the Immigration and Naturalization Service.

"WETBACK" LABOR

There is no legal penalty for employing or harboring an illegal immigrant. Legislative measures making it unlawful to employ such aliens should be adopted. The Immigration and Naturalization Service should have the right to enter places of agricultural employment to search for illegal aliens and penalties should be provided for harboring, concealing, or transporting them.

The present practice of legalizing aliens who entered this country in defiance of the law should be forbidden.

RECRUITMENT OF FARM WORKERS

Adoption by the United States Employment Service of safeguards in public recruitment of farm workers. These safeguards to include written terms of employment so that growers will advise the employment service what they will pay, what housing they have, and other employment conditions.

Federal legislation to ban the interstate recruitment of farm workers except under license by Department of Labor. This is designed to regulate so-called crew leases and contractors and to avoid sweatshop conditions for migratory farm workers.

LABOR RELATIONS

Farm workers should have legal assurance of their right to organize by extension of the Labor-Management Relations Act of 1947 (the Taft-Hartley law) to employees on farms having a specified minimum number of workers.

MINIMUM WAGES AND UNEMPLOYMENT COMPENSATION

Minimum wage and unemployment compensation codes should be extended, through legislative measures, to migratory farm workers.

HOUSING

No foreign farm workers should be imported nor domestic farm workers be sent by the Federal Employment Service from one State to another until the State in which employment is offered has established minimum housing standards which meet those prescribed by the Federal committee.

The Department of Agriculture should extend grants-in-aid to States for establishing labor camps in areas of large and sustained seasonal labor demand.

Development by the Public Housing Administration of a rural nonfarm housing program for migrants during period of the year when they are not on the road.

HEALTH AND WELFARE

Amendment to the Social Security and Public Health Service Acts to provide matching grants to States for (1) general assistance including medical care, provided that no needy person be excluded for lack of legal-residence status, and (2) health programs and clinics for migratory labor to be conducted under the supervision of the Surgeon General.

CHILD LABOR

Retention and vigorous enforcement of the 1949 child labor amendment to the Fair Labor Standards Act and further amendment to restrict employment of children younger than 14 years outside of school hours.

EDUCATION

Development of an adequate program of education for migratory workers and their children, to be undertaken by the Federal committee through cooperation of public and private agencies. A study to be made of how interstate provisions can be formulated for education of migrant children since educational authority is necessarily local.

[From the Washington Post of April 9, 1951]

MIGRANT FARM LABOR

The exhaustive survey of social, economic, health, and educational conditions of farm migrants made by the President's Committee on Migratory Labor is a shocking exposé of official neglect and private exploitation—a story about men and women living in insanitary camps without community ties and usually beyond the reach of local school, health, and welfare authorities. There are at least a million of these migrants, about half of whom are domestic workers. The other half is made up of approximately 100,000 Mexicans legally under contract, 400,000 so-called Mexican wetbacks who have illegally entered the country by slipping across the land border or wading or swimming across the Rio Grande, and a small number of British West Indians and Puerto Ricans. These migratory workers supply only 3 to 4 percent of the man-days of work used to produce the Nation's farm output. The great majority are employed on some 125,000 large farms producing cotton, fruits, vegetables, and sugar beets. Nevertheless, they make important contributions to farm output and are in great demand at critical periods of crop production.

Since more farm labor will be needed this year to replace men entering the military services and to harvest an extended acreage, pressure for increased importation of foreign labor, chiefly Mexican, is mounting. However, the Commission concludes that no special measures should be taken to increase the number of alien contract laborers beyond the number admitted last year and that legalization for employment purposes of aliens illegally in the United States should be discontinued. "We are convinced," it declares, "that by better recruitment and placement of domestic labor we would have eliminated most, if not all, of the occasion for the certifications of labor shortage during the years 1947–50."

In that connection the report sharply criticizes the practice of legalizing the status of wetbacks and giving them employment in preference to workers who have not violated our immigration laws. It charges, too, that field officers of the Immigration Service have been under pressure from Washington to go easy on deportations until crops have been harvested. It further implies that if the Farm Placement Division of the United States Employment Service had done a more effective recruitment and placement job at home there would not have been a labor shortage requiring the importation of large numbers of aliens. As a matter of fact, the Commission received evidence that last year some American workers were actually dismissed to make way for contract Mexican labor.

Numerous recommendations are made by the Commission designed to raise the living standards of migrant farm labor, such as minimum-wage legislation, establishment of Federal and State minimum housing standards, grants to the States to conduct health programs among migratory workers, and vigorous enforcement of child-labor laws. These recommendations, which cover both alien and domestic migrants, provide evidence, if any were required, of shameful neglect of this group.

The problem growing out of our dependence on alien labor is only one aspect of the general problem of migratory labor, but it is an important one. For cheap foreign labor creates the very scarcities that lead to an influx of aliens willing to work for wages that are indecently low according to American standards. We agree with the Commission that our efforts in future should be directed toward increasing the number of our own farm workers and eliminating dependence on foreign labor.

Dragon by the Tail

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. DANIEL A. REED

OF NEW YORK

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Thursday, April 5, 1951

Mr. REED of New York. Mr. Speaker, just how long is the Congress of the United States going to suffer and permit through its inaction the hands of General MacArthur to be tied where he can neither advance nor retreat?

Under leave to extend, I am inserting an article in the RECORD which appeared in the Wall Street Journal of April 4, 1951, entitled "Dragon by the Tail."

If Secretary Acheson were tied to this dragon's tail for the rest of his life that would be one thing, but instead our boys are tied to the dragon's tail, the consequence of which is that thousands of our boys are being either injured or killed every week.

DRAGON BY THE TAIL—LIMITED WARFARE IN KOREA PLACES MILITARY STRATEGISTS IN UNEASY POSITION; THEY CAN'T ADVANCE OR RETREAT

(By William Henry Chamberlin)

The stern, commanding voice of General MacArthur has been no more successful than the mild pleading voice of Sir Benegal Rau and other would-be United Nations mediators in bringing about a cessation of hostilities in Korea. Yet MacArthur's proposal for a conference with the Chinese commander in the field with a view to arranging a Korean cease-fire without discussing such questions as a seat for Red China in the UN or the disposition of Formosa was worth while, for several reasons.

It is a new intimation, and from the man who is most prominently identified in public opinion with a tough, unyielding policy, of willingness to stop the present fighting on reasonable terms. And it has again focused attention, in the United States and abroad, on the question of what aims are being pursued in Korea, and what is the prospect of realizing these aims.

TWO UNDESIRABLE EXTREMES

Exasperating and frustrating as it is, the kind of limited warfare which General MacArthur's forces are waging in Korea today is the only visible alternative to two undesired extremes. One of these alternatives would be an evacuation of Korea lock, stock, and barrel. Objection to this is that the spectacle of a United Nations army with heavy modern equipment taking to its heels before a Chinese Army very inferior in firepower and without substantial air and sea power would be a terrific blow to western prestige. It might well be the prelude to the conquest by Mao Tse-tung of French Indochina and the lands of southeastern Asia, rich in tin, rubber, and other strategic materials. It could set in motion the process of crumbling that would bring down the prowestern or neutral governments in Japan, the Philippines, and Indonesia.

The other alternative—all-out war against the Chinese mainland—is apparently ruled out both by the limitation of American military power and by the fears and inhibitions of the countries with which America is associated in the United Nations. It is one of the many illogical aspects of the present situation that the UN vote to condemn Red China as an aggressor was apparently obtained only on the condition that no sanctions should be imposed.

ANOTHER INCONSISTENCY

Still another inconsistency is that, although most members of the United Nations have given very lukewarm support to American action in Korea, the maximum ideal of the Korean campaign, the creation of a unified, independent, and democratic government of Korea is based on a United Nations resolution. It would be only fair if the critics of General MacArthur, who have been especially vocal in Great Britain, would bear in mind that the United Nations vote on the issue of crossing the thirty-eighth parallel was 47 in favor (including Great Britain and France), 5 against (the Soviet bloc), and 7 abstentions, including India, Egypt, and Yugoslavia.

So long as the Chinese refuse to show the slightest inclination to talk peace, strategic, rather than political, considerations should determine whether and how far the parallel should be crossed. Under General Ridgway's leadership, at once aggressive and careful, the UN Army has been clearly outfighting the Chinese and the North Koreans and inflicting disproportionately heavy casualties during the last 3 months.

If it were possible to establish a strong defense line along the thirty-eighth parallel there would be a good case for stopping the advance there, digging in and helping the South Koreans to carry out elementary reconstruction and build up an army strong enough to defend themselves against future attacks. There may also be convincing military arguments for moving northward approximately to the thirty-ninth parallel, taking in the important cities of Pyongyang and Wonsan and fortifying the narrow waist of the Korean Peninsula.

NORTHERN FRONTIER

There would seem to be little advantage in launching another drive for the Yalu River. Korea broadens out in its northern reaches and in the type of war which is now being fought the army with the longest communication lines is at a disadvantage. Even if all Korea could be cleared of Chinese and North Korean troops, the prospect of holding a long northern frontier with Manchuria and Siberia would not be inviting.

It seems reasonable that considerations of military security should decide how far the recent slow, grinding advance should be pressed. It would be a good thing if voices of timidity and division could be muted; these are only calculated to encourage the Mao Tse-tung regime to prolong the struggle, even though it now seems that a decisive victory is beyond its grasp.

Meanwhile several political lessons may be drawn from the Korean experience. First, the United Nations has proved itself an extremely weak reed on which to lean, and the worst possible agency for conducting a war. The campaign in Korea is much more justifiable as a defense of American strategic interests in Japan and in the Pacific area generally than as a crusade for United Nations ideals.

ENLIST ASIATIC ALLIES

Second, situations of regional strength are far more valuable than UN resolutions, however imposing, which lack the backing of armed force. It is high time that we consider the more effective utilization of those forces in the Far East which are on our side, even if they are not on our side for what we might consider the right reasons. There is something wrong and unnatural about a situation in which Americans, with a sprinkling of Europeans, constitute the main striking power of an army in an Asiatic theater. There would seem to be a case for reexamining the decisions that have led to rejecting the aid of the Chinese Nationalists and to disregard the large pool of trained military manpower in Japan. In the long run, it must be Asiatics who will defend Asia against Communist aggression.

Finally, we may as well recognize that we are in the awkward position of having caught a dragon by the tail. Our associates are unwilling to cooperate in trying to give the dragon a knock-out blow. But if we let him go there is no reason to expect that he will be any friendlier than a dragon normally is.

Make Assaults on United States Soldiers a Federal Offense

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. FRANCK R. HAVENNER

OF CALIFORNIA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Monday, April 9, 1951

Mr. HAVENNER. Mr. Speaker, at an appropriate time, during the further consideration of Senate bill 1, authorizing universal military training and service and the extension of selective service, I shall present the following amendment:

PROPOSED AMENDMENT TO SENATE BILL 1

Whoever forcibly assaults, resists, opposes, impedes, intimidates, or interferes with any member of the Armed Forces of the United States while engaged in or on account of the performance of his official duties shall be fined not more than $5,000 or imprisoned not more than 3 years, or both.

Whoever in the commission of any such acts uses a deadly or dangerous weapon shall be fined not more than $10,000 or imprisoned not more than 10 years, or both.

Whoever kills any member of the Armed Forces of the United States while engaged in the performance of his official duties or on account of the performance of his official duties shall be punished as provided under sections 1111 and 1112 of title 18, United States Code.

Mr. Speaker, the purpose of this amendment is obvious. It would make it a Federal offense to assault or murder a member of the armed services. At present, members of the Coast Guard have this protection in law, but members of the other branches of the armed services do not. If a member of any of these other branches of the armed services is beaten or killed by civilians or local peace officers, and the local community does nothing about it, no action can be taken to punish the guilty party.

The problem is one of long standing, and the Department of National Defense and the Department of Justice have been officially on record for nearly a decade in support of legislation to provide protection for all members of the armed services against such felonious assaults. Under existing law, it has long been a Federal offense for any person to kill or assault any Federal officer, such as a United States marshal, members of the Federal Bureau of Investigation, Secret Service agents, post office inspectors, personnel of the Coast Guard, and other similar officers.

I attach hereto a letter addressed to the chairman of the Judiciary Committee of the United States Senate on November 8, 1943, by the then Attorney General Francis Biddle, stating that such legislation as is here proposed would be in the interest of protecting military personnel:

NOVEMBER 8, 1943.

Hon. FREDERICK VAN NUYS,
Chairman, Committee on the Judiciary, United States Senate, Washington, D. C.

MY DEAR SENATOR: This acknowledges the letter dated November 1, from F. J. Mattice, Esq., clerk of your committee, concerning a bill (S. 1227) to amend section 1 of the act providing punishment for killing or assaulting Federal officers.

It is my understanding that this bill was introduced at the request of the Secretary of War.

Under the existing law, it is a Federal offense for any person to kill or assault any Federal officer belonging to one of specifically enumerated groups ,while engaged in the performance of his official duties or on account of the performance of official duties (U. S. C., title 18, secs. 253, 154). Generally, the enumeration consists of law enforcement officers such as United States marshals, personnel of the Federal Bureau of Investigation, Secret Service agents, post office inspectors, personnel of the Coast Guard, and other similar officers.

It is the purpose of the statute to protect Federal law enforcement officers in the performance of their duties and, thereby, enable a more effective enforcement of the law than might otherwise be the case.

In response to a question contained in the foregoing letter, I desire to say that this law applies throughout the United States being an act of Congress, is not dependent on State legislation, and does not vary with State laws.

The bill under consideration would add persons in the Armed Forces to the enumeration contained in the existing statute. The result would be that to kill or assault a person in the Armed Forces of the United States while he is engaged in the performance of his official duties or on account of the performance of his official duties would be a Federal offense.

The question is propounded in the foregoing letter, "Why this legislation was desired when the Military Establishment could usually handle a situation of the kind itself without going into the civil courts."

In reply I desire to call your attention to the fact that, while the Military Establishment could handle itself without going into the civil courts any offense committed by a member of the military personnel, it has no jurisdiction over offenses committed by a civilian against a member of the military personnel. A civilian in such a case would be tried in the civil courts. Under existing law, if the murder or assault was committed in an area other than on a Federal reservation, the appropriate State court would have jurisdiction over the offense. If the abovementioned bill is enacted, the Federal courts would have cognizance of the matter.

As the Secretary of War deems that this legislation is desirable in the interest of protecting military personnel, I find no objection to its enactment. I suggest, however, that there be deleted from the bill the following words: "Any member of the auxiliary military police of the Army of the United States." It is understood that the auxiliary military police as distinguished from the regular military police is composed of plant guards who are paid by owners of plants and not by the Federal Government. This Department is of the opinion that the proposed legislation should not include any person whose compensation is not paid by the United States.

Sincerely,

FRANCIS BIDDLE,
Attorney General.

Mr. Speaker, I also attach a letter dated June 10, 1943, addressed to the chairman of the Military Affairs Committee of the United States Senate by the then Secretary of War, Henry L. Stimson, reading as follows:

JUNE 10, 1943.

Hon. ROBERT R. REYNOLDS,
Chairman, Committee on Military Affairs, United States Senate.

DEAR SENATOR REYNOLDS: There is enclosed herewith draft of a bill to amend section 1 of the act providing punishment for killing or assaulting of Federal officers, which the War Department recommends be enacted into law.

The purpose of the proposed legislation is to extend the scope of section 1 of the act of May 18, 1934, as amended (48 Stat. 780; 54 Stat. 391; 18 U. S. C. 253), so as to include officers and enlisted personnel of the Army, Navy, and Marine Corps, and members of the auxiliary military police of the Army of the United States, while engaged in the performance of official duties or on account of the performance of their official duties.
